The War.—The most important fighting of the week took place in Flanders. East of Ypres, Field-Marshal Haig launched a powerful and successful offensive. Alarmed by his previous gains along the Messines and Passchendaele Ridge, the Germans kept up a series of violent counter-attacks in an effort to regain the lost ground. They directed their fiercest assaults against Polygon Wood, two miles south of Zonnebeke, as it was considered the pivot on which rested the defense of the Belgian coast. They succeeded in occupying a portion of the Wood somewhat to the east of its central part.

Bulletin, Oct. 1, p.m.-Oct. 8, a.m.

On the morning of October 4 counter-attacking German troops were caught in a heavy British barrage fire. The British troops then surged forward on a front lying between a point just north of Langemarck and Gheluvelt, penetrating the enemy's lines to a depth of 2,500 yards. On the north they reached Poelcapelle and Gravenstafel and occupied most of the Gravenstafel Ridge. South of the Ypres-Roulers railway the British advanced up the eastern slopes of the main ridge. As they now command the Menin-Roulers railway, the movements of the German forces along that line become exceedingly dangerous and their retirement from this territory is now foreshadowed. The heights dominating the Ypres basin from Warneton to Broodseinde are held by the British. The German losses are said to have been heavy. The British claim about 5,000 prisoners.

Delayed reports from Mesopotamia announce another great success for the British arms. Moving up the southern bank of the Euphrates, General Maude surprised the Turkish commander, Ahmed Bey, at Ramadi, just as he was preparing to move against him, surrounded his forces and captured him with his staff, together with several thousand prisoners, a large supply of ammunition, guns and military stores.

On October 3 the President signed the $2,534,870,000 War Revenue bill. Owing to the individual excess profits tax—the "joker" written into the bill in the secret session conference—the measure has provoked great criticism and it is feared will bring about widespread injustice. The joker adds an eight per cent tax on all earnings exceeding $6,000. Section 209 of the "War Profits Tax" division of the revenue bill in which the joker is embodied reads as follows:

The Earnings Tax

> Sec. 209. That in addition to the taxes imposed by existing law and by this act, in case of a business or trade having no invested capital or not more than a nominal invested capital, there shall be levied, assessed and paid in lieu of the tax imposed by this [the excess war profits tax on corporations] a tax of 8 per centum of the net income only of such business or trade, in excess of $3,000 in case of a corporation, and $6,000 in case of a particular individual.

Literally the law apparently imposes upon every person in the United States engaged in an "occupation," whether an indepedent profession like that of the lawyer or doctor, or that of a salaried subordinate a tax of eight per cent on all his earnings above $6,000 a year; and that in addition to the heavy income tax. In introducing this tax, the conferees had in mind lawyers making large fees, contending that the $100,000-a-year corporation attorney should pay an excess-profits tax, as well as a corporation earning that money. But the effect of the measure is to "discriminate heavily in favor of the man who receives an income from invested money, the remittance man and the idle rich with plenty of income and no occupation." This bit of legislation is the result both of the hurry and worry of the last moments of the conference between the Houses and of the determined action to get a bill before the two Houses to raise a definite sum of money. Members of Congress look upon it as a sample of the evils to be expected from measures framed in secret proceedings and then thrown before each branch of Congress to turn into law with all possible speed.

When slipping the joker into the bill care was taken by its sponsors that members of Congress should not be subject to the provision, as far as it applied to their salaries. The first exemption made in the law under the excess profits section relieves Senators and Representatives of the payment of the tax on eight per cent on their salaries in excess of $6,000. The salary of a Senator or a Representative is $7,500 a year. The doctor or lawyer who has an income of that amount derived from his professional earnings must pay the Government, in addition to the individual income tax, $120, which is eight per cent of $1,500, the difference between $6,000 and $7,500. The Senators and Representatives will save this $120. The plea made by Mr. Kitchin, who seems to be largely responsible for the introduction of the obnoxious provision, was that members of Congress were not, in their official capacity of Senators or Representatives, engaged in a business, in the strict meaning of the word.

On Saturday, October 6, with demonstrations of patriotism and evidences of unanimity of opinion, seldom equaled in any legislative body, the first war session of the Sixty-fifth Congress came to an end. Before going to Congress to sign the bills passed in the few hours before adjournment the President issued this statement from the White House:

Congress Adjourns

The Sixty-fifth Congress, now adjourning, deserves the gratitude and appreciation of a people whose will and purpose I believe it has faithfully expressed. One cannot examine the record of its action without being impressed by its completeness, its courage and its full comprehension of a great task. The needs of the army and the navy have been met in a way that assures the effectiveness of American arms, and the war-making branch of the Government has been abundantly equipped with the powers that were necessary to make the action of the nation effective. I believe that it has also, in equal degree, and as far as possible in the face of war, safeguarded the rights of the people and kept in mind the consideration of social justice so often obscured in the hasty readjustment of such a crisis. It seems to me that the work of this remarkable session has not only been done thoroughly, but that it has also been done with the utmost dispatch possible in the circumstances or consistent with a full consideration of the exceedingly critical matters dealt with. Best of all, it has left no doubt as to the spirit and determination of the country, but has affirmed them as loyally and as emphatically as our fine soldiers will affirm them on the firing line.

The more important measures passed are as follows: Declaration of a state of war with Germany on April 6; war bond issues aggregating $15,538,000,000; war appropriations and contract authorizations totaling $14,390,000,000; war loans aggregating $7,000,000,000 to the Allies; the Selective Draft bill, making 10,000,000 men liable to military service; the Espionage bill, including the embargo provision; the $2,235,000,000 War Revenue bill; the Food Control bill; the Trading with the Enemy act; the Soldiers' and Sailors' Insurance bill.

Belgium.—Reports have been assiduously circulated by the press of various countries or by that portion of the press which is inimical to the Holy See and never loses an opportunity to try to discredit it in the eyes of the world, to the effect that the Pope's peace proposals produced a most unfavorable impression in Belgium. The facts prove the very contrary. From the text of the Pontifical document it is obvious that the Holy Father was desirous of procuring for that harassed country nothing less than complete evacuation, and unrestricted independence in political, military and economic affairs. Fair-minded people could find no other meaning in the words of the Pope. That the Belgian Government understood it in this sense is clear from the subjoined official answer of that Government, which the Belgian Minister to the Vatican handed to the Cardinal Secretary of State.

Gratitude to Pope

The Royal Government has had the honor of receiving the message in which the Holy Father has made known to the heads of the belligerent peoples his views concerning the basis which should underlie the reorganization of the future relations of the nations actually at war. With the greatest deference it will study the proposals which the Papal document sets forth in language of marked elevation. The Government of the King is pleased to discover in it a new and precious proof of the special interest which the Holy Father manifests for the Belgian nation, so cruelly and unjustly scourged by the war which is afflicting all mankind. It is happy to have an opportunity to express its lively and profound gratitude.

The Belgian note speaks for itself. So far from being unfavorably impressed, it testifies to deep appreciation of the special interest of the Holy Father in Belgium, and to profound gratitude.

France.—The declining birth-rate in France has long been a menace to France. The disproportion between deaths and births has increased to an alarming degree since the war began. According to the statement made on October 4 of the present year, by the American Fund of the Charité Maternalle de Paris there were annually before the year 1914 about 724,000 deaths to 775,000 births. In 1916 the deaths increased to 1,100,000, and the births fell to 312,000; in other words, there was in 1916 a deficit of 788,000 births as compared with deaths. The significance of these figures, as has been pointed out, is that whereas in 1916 the birth-rate was about one in every thousand of the entire population, the death rate among the civilian population alone, was more than twenty in every thousand.

Declining Birth-Rate

The investigations into the activities of Bolo Pasha to influence the French press have brought in their train very serious accusations against M. Louis J. Malvy, until recently Minister of the Interior for France. Of all the Ministers he was the only one who continued in office throughout the years of the war, notwithstanding the changes in premiers. About two months ago he resigned in consequence of violent attacks made on him by the press, and especially because of the scathing denunciations of his tolerance of certain elements supposed to be hostile to France. His principal assailant was Senator Clemenceau. Although a cabinet crisis resulted at the time, during which M. Malvy resigned, there was no hint that he had been guilty of treason.

The Malvy Scandal

On October 4 the Chamber assembled at Paris to take up the case of Bolo, who had been arrested on the charge of German propaganda in France. During the meeting the Prime Minister, M. Painlevé, accused M. Malvy of treason. M. Malvy had protested against certain accusations brought against him in a letter sent to the President of the Republic. The Prime Minister replied by saying that M. Malvy had been accused of having betrayed secrets of France to Germany for three years, and that M. Daudet had affirmed there was superabundant proof to substantiate these charges. The latter's letter of accusation was read, and the Chamber decided on immediate investigations, which, however, are to be made in secret session.

Ireland.—Sinn Fein still continues its agitation for the exercise "of the right claimed by President Wilson for all peoples to determine the sovereignty under which they shall live." Within the last few weeks enthusiastic meetings have been held all over Ireland. Though the assemblies were in every instance orderly, yet the Government, in some cases, appears to have been alarmed. The Irish Weekly Independent has this to say of a meeting proposed for Mitchelstown:

Sinn Fein and Liberty

> Large crowds assembled at Mitchelstown on Sunday, where a meeting had been announced to be held to celebrate the thirtieth anniversary of the death by shooting of four men there during the land war. The authorities proclaimed the meeting, and took ample precautions to prevent it being held.
> Over 200 police, under the command of the County Inspector and five District Inspectors were drafted into the town, together with a large force of military. Armored cars and a motor ambulance paraded the streets, machine-guns were placed at various points of vantage in the town and military snipers were posted on several trees in the neighborhood.

The trenchant Leader, commenting on this incident, remarks: "After all there is nothing like being a free people in these days of the cause of small nationalities."

Despite these repressive measures Sinn Fein has become the party of the people. In a recent private letter to AMERICA, a scholarly unprejudiced Irishman writes:

> You mention the Dublin Convention, I hope some good will come of it. It will be all the better for the peace of mind of England, if it settles the question on the widest lines of freedom. The nearer the freedom approaches the demand outlined by John McNeil and the Sinn Feiners, the better, namely, interdependence. The word expresses two things; independence of Ireland and England, with interdependence of one on the other. The former, namely, a full measure of independence, will allow this island-race to work along its own lines of life, a full-grown youth setting up house for himself, with, secondly, friendly, brotherly relations and interdependence on a big brother. Such a solution would be good for both. Ireland doesn't want to be the slave of the Kaiser or any one else. Will all this work out for Ireland? I don't know.
> The Sinn Feiners, I might say, are a very excellent lot of young men and women and their policy is not red revolution. It may interest you to know that the first thing most of the Sinn Fein leaders did, on their release, was to go on a pilgrimage to Loch Derg (St. Patrick's Purgatory), and do the three days' religious fast. McNeil did this; De Valera, Cosgrave, etc., also Cosgrave, the new Sinn Fein M. P. for Kilkenny City was at Mass and Communion every morning during the days of the election campaign here. The Sinn Feiners during the election kept perfect order, no drinking, no disorder being permitted by them. You may take it that all the young people of the country are Sinn Feiners, and the older people are fast becoming the same. The self-restraint and intelligence they show is a convincing proof that they are well fitted to manage the affairs of their own country right well. The American people know that too.

Just what effect all this agitation is having on the English mind it is hard to say. As a result of observations in Ireland, Austin Harrison, editor of the English Review and one-time Unionist and conscriptionist, is writing sympathetically of Irish aspirations. In referring to Mr. Harrison's attitude the Leader writes:

> What, then, are the discoveries which have changed an avowed conscriptionist and anti-Irish Englishman into one who is, to put it at the lowest, frankly sympathetic to Ireland's claim for independence? They are, I think, (1) the utter failure of Castle rule in Ireland; (2) the absolute impossibility of the only alternative to Irish freedom—the continued holding of Ireland by an army of occupation. What the nature of Irish "independence" is which Mr. Harrison would be willing to grant, he does not make absolutely clear, but certainly it approximates more nearly to Professor McNeil's or Mr. de Valera's ideal than it does to that of Mr. Dillon or Mr. Redmond. When an Englishman groups Ireland's claim to freedom along with that of "Alsace-Lorraine, Slavdom, and Serbia" he has advanced a very long way on the road to the Sinn Fein ideal.

Meantime the Convention is proceeding with its work, not, however, without bitter criticism on the part of the Belfast Unionist press. The Dublin correspondent of the Manchester Guardian writes his paper that "These comments were plainly in contravention of the Realm Act regulations" and that they may have an important reaction on the Convention itself.

Mexico.—Despite the glowing reports of Carranza's financial agents, who are making desperate attempts to obtain a loan for the First Chief, Mexico is still in a deplorable condition A new revolution has been started, by Porfirio Gonzalez, in the territory between Aldama and Ramones station, near Monterey, thus making thirteen in all. The following letter written by a traveler, at present in Mexico City, throws light on the present state of affairs:

Revolution and Tyranny

> And now what shall I say to you regarding the political situation? Here, among good, responsible people, after a long period of absolute depression, there is just now a certain revival of hope and expectation. Carranza and his crowd of generals and friends seem to be going to the wall. They have no arms to speak of, no more ammunition, and, still better, no money. They seem at last to have been left to their own fate by their friends. They are heartily detested by the whole nation, poor and rich; they are in great disfavor among all the diplomats and frightfully divided among themselves, despite the necessity of holding together. Their failure after so many months to obtain money is a crushing and decisive blow from which they won't recover easily. Of course, this drives them still more to theft and persecution. But this has at least one good result, it provokes everybody against them, and prepares the work of reform. You will be interested, I know, in the various revolutions still in progress here. It now appears pretty certain that great activity is being displayed by Diaz and many others in the south and east of Mexico; great preparations are going on in Jalisco also, Michoacan, Zacatecas, Guanajuato, and other central States. Money, arms and munitions which do not come to Carranza, are being supplied, they say, in fair quantities to his enemies, and already terrible defeats have been inflicted on his troops and those of his pet generals, such as Alvarado, who was beaten by the forces of Felix Diaz. There has been a general advance from the south toward the capital, and I hear, on good authority, that Diaz himself is making his way in this direction. It appears that all the chiefs in Tehuantepec, Tabasco, Chiapas, Oaxaca, Veracruz and the Huasteca are agreed and united. The Pelaez brothers are being paid $250,000, Mexican money, by the oil companies "to protect" their interest. They are serious, good people, but I don't think they will join a movement away from their own zone. I must also tell you that in Yucatan and Campeche, the sisal planters are sick of the revolution and of Alvarado, and would give a large part of their profits for a decent government. Hunger and disease are still with us, Morelos is especially afflicted. The Carranzistas on evacuating last year burned all the villages and reales of the haciendas and carried off all they could, forcing the miserable inhabitants to emigrate.

This city (Mexico City) has recuperated wonderfully, in spite of the Government. Half of the republic is here with its savings. It is the blood reflowing to the heart while the extremities are dying, but here it keeps the pot boiling and residents are greatly benefited. The condition, however, of the Church is deplorable. Nothing stops the plunderers. The churches of Corpus Christi, San Juan de Dios, Santa Teresa, and others have been seized, and all the investments and sacred vessels of La Profesa were stolen only a few days ago. All foreign priests have been ordered out of the country, etc., etc. I could never end if I had to tell you all they are doing against religion. May God have mercy on the poor Mexicans!

A further account of the persecution now going on is contained in this document sent to the Revista Catholica of Las Vegas, N. M., by the Catholics of Campeche:

All the parishes not under the care of native priests have been closed since September 22, 1914, the day when the churches were profaned and interdicted by the Governor, Mucel, who has just relected himself against the will of the people of this unhappy State. Moreover, after the Bishop and his clergy had been expelled, one priest was permitted to return, later three others joined him, thus giving us four priests for the whole State. Today the Governor expelled one of these four, the man who attended the large part of the territory of Quentana Roo, which is part of the diocese. Hence all the unhappy people lack spiritual aid, with the exception of those in the city and on the Isle of Carmen where the three priests are. We could tell you a great deal more about this new offense, and about the sacrileges which are committed, but I prefer to say that recently the Governor was petitioned to allow a priest to come to the help of the Faithful of the parishes formerly taken care of by foreign-born clergy, and he replied that he would not permit the service of priests either native or foreign. As this state of affairs, so prejudicial to the salvation of souls, threatens to be permanent, we beg you to make it known to the Catholic press of the United States, and to protest against the Governor's injustice. We can do no more.

Such are the conditions in other States too, as for instance in Sonora, where there are no priests at all.

Russia.—The meagreness of the reports that come from Russia makes it difficult to follow the course of events there. It would appear, however, that the Democratic Congress, which, at the instance of the Petrograd Soldiers' and Workmen's Council, assembled in the capital September 27, declared itself, on October 3, in favor of a coalition government by a vote of 766 to 688, which indicates that nearly all the 1,500 delegates cast ballots. The Congress then voted as an amendment to the resolution that the bourgeois element, particularly persons concerned in the recent Korniloff movement, and all members of the Constitutional Democratic party should be excluded from the coalition. Then a third resolution was passed by a vote of 813 to 180, repudiating the very idea of a coalition government. This third vote was considered a triumph for the Bolsheviki, or extremists, who oppose the propertied classes. But it is clear that a large number of the delegates were either absent or that they abstained from voting. Later the Main Committee of the Congress announced a plan to augment itself by adding representatives from all groups and parties. A resolution was passed that the Congress should remain in session until the organization of the Government was effected.

A Capricious Congress

In the hope of settling Russia's political and economic disorders the Government Council's representatives from Moscow's industrial interests and five peasant and soldiers' delegates from the Democratic Congress had a conference in the Winter Palace. After a six hours' session, during which they were unable to agree about the admission of Constitutional Democrats into the Cabinet, a point the Congress's delegates would not yield, a recess was taken. On October 6 the Democratic Congress adjourned, after appointing a preliminary parliament of 305 members who are to continue their sittings until the Constituent Assembly meets. The Petrograd Council of Soldiers' and Workmen's Delegates, in which the Bolsheviki are very strong, ordered a general council of the delegates to meet in Petrograd from all Russia, and passed a resolution declaring that the country is in grave danger from a counter-revolutionary movement and charging the conservative forces in the Congress with blocking the advance of true democracy. So it would seem that thus far Premier Kerensky has prevented the Bolsheviki from securing control of the Government.

Premier Kerensky's answer to the Democratic Congress' demand that no cabinet should be made without its sanction was the announcement to the Main Committee of the Congress that he had already formed a new cabinet, and on October 5 the following "unofficial" list of ministers was announced:

New Coalition Ministry

Premier, A. F. Kerensky; Minister of Foreign Affairs, M. I. Terestchenko; Minister of the Interior, M. Nikitin; Minister of Agriculture, M. Masloff; Minister of Labor, M. Skobeleff; Minister of Supplies, M. Prokopovitch; Minister of Finance, M. Bernatzky; Minister of Religion, M. Kortasheff; Minister of Public Welfare, M. Kishkin; Minister of Trade and Industry, A. I. Konovaloff; State Controller, M. Smyrnoff; Minister of Justice, M. Malyantovitch; Minister of Education, M. Salaskin; President of the Ecumenical Council, M. Tretyakoff; Minister of War, Gen. Verkhovsky; Minister of Marine, Admiral Verdervski. The Constitutional Democratic party, against which the Democratic Congress has been in opposition, is represented by Kishkin, Konovaloff and Smyrnoff. The portfolios of Foreign Affairs, War, Marine and Interior remain unchanged. The Social Revolutionists are not represented.

A Convert and the Lay Apostolate

JAMES LOUIS SMALL

DURING the past two or three years we have been in what may be termed the "Chautauqua clutch." The opening of the summer season sees a mushroom growth of red and yellow tents throughout the length and breadth of the land. Culture, highly concentrated and ready for instant use, is about to be diffused among the people.

Now the Chautauqua is primarily a business institution. If it did not meet expenses it would shut down. It is therefore pertinent to inquire what the elements are that make it what it is and without which it could not and would not be. The answer is simple:

First, the talent that informs and entertains; second, the audience that turns out to be informed and entertained. You will notice that the latter is quite as important, in its way, as the former. The finest talent obtainable is of no use if it fails to enlist the support and co-operation of an audience.

I trust that I may be acquitted of irreverence if I take this as an illustration, albeit rough-and-ready, of the Church. When the Spirit of the living God descended at Pentecost, He descended upon a body that awaited but the breath of life that He was to give, before going out into the world and doing its work. There was everything needful for spiritual efficiency, a ministry prepared to perpetuate itself, Sacraments that should act as channels of grace, a visible Head who was to live in his successors. But, mark you, the Church's work was to be pre-eminently one of salvation. She was to deal with the souls of men. "Go ye into the whole world and preach the gospel to every creature"—that was the Divinely given commission. To that commission she has ever been faithful, from the day that saw 3,000 added to the household of the Faith to this moment, when multitudes are coming to a knowledge of the truth, in Africa, in India, in our own America, and in the far-off islands of the sea.

Obviously, then, where the Catholic Church is, there will also be a Catholic laity. They are the sign, the symbol of her fruitfulness, and where there is to be found nothing that resembles a Catholic laity, there, it is to be feared, the Catholic Church is not.

This has been insufficiently emphasized in connection with the validity, or non-validity, of Anglican orders. The argument, to speak colloquially, is lopsided. Controversialists have been at enormous pains to prove or disprove the orders of the Church of England, without appearing to take greatly into consideration the way in which they have been viewed by the laity for whose benefit they were exercised.

For a space of nearly 300 years we find nothing at all approaching a Catholic consciousness in the rank and file of the Anglican laity. Whatever outcroppings of Catholic sentiment appeared were, at best, sporadic. Contrast with this the situation encountered in Japan about the middle of the last century, when Catholic missionaries discovered some 50,000 lay folk who in the face of espionage and devastating persecution had received the Faith, as handed down from father to son, for 200 years. The comparison speaks for itself.

If I were asked what has surprised me most as a Catholic I should probably say the lack of a sense of corporate spiritual responsibility on the part of our American laymen. Kindly notice the indictment. It includes men who are pious, men who possess the deep individual faith that is the glory of the Church, that has produced saints and moved mountains, but which in its self-effacement is prone to overlook or undervalue the advantage of association with others of like mind. It includes also a large class of Catholics who feel they have done their duty by receiving the Sacraments with greater or less regularity, principally less, and by giving liberally of their means when asked; and a third class who think it presumptuously Protestant for a layman to acknowledge responsibility for any soul but his own. He is not his brother's keeper. All that is the affair of the priest.

I have said, in referring to my personal experience, that "the former things are passed away." In a measure this statement is inaccurate. No convert is required upon coming to the Church to leave all behind. He is asked to abjure his errors only. It is most important to observe that a not inconsiderable number of Protestant institutions are really Catholic in spirit, a mercifully undestroyed portion of the old birthright. Some of them, while strictly speaking unnecessary to Catholic life, would be none the less valuable, and I, for one, have wished, frequently and fervently, that the skeleton of dry bones might be clothed with living flesh. If it has proved serviceable to Protestantism, to what uses might it not be put in a Catholic environment and under Catholic patronage.

As this paper is of too brief compass to deal at all exhaustively with the lay apostolate, I shall cite but one non-Catholic society as an instance of what I mean. My readers will bear in mind that as I am a convert, this is the only comparison I am able to institute.

There is in the Protestant Episcopal Church a lay organization known as the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. Its work is distinctly spiritual and is done under the direction of the ministers of that denomination. Beginning with a mere handful in 1883, it now numbers 10,000 men in this country, which is approximately one per cent of the adult membership of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The rule is exceedingly simple and is elastic enough to comprise all kinds of lay endeavor: Men's communions, Sunday-school classes, prayer-book distribution, hospital and hotel visiting, Lenten noon-day services, etc. Anyone who has ever attended one of the Brotherhood's yearly conventions will not soon forget it. It means a gathering of several hundred men, many of them prominent in their respective callings, who have come long distances at much sacrifice of time and money, for a spiritual purpose. They are there not to sit at banquet boards or to listen to bursts of fervid oratory, but to talk soberly and earnestly of the things of God.

Translate all this into Catholic terms and what do you have? An organization of say 100,000 men banded together to do spiritual work under the direction of the clergy: to teach classes in Christian doctrine; to go to isolated country missions on Sundays when a priest is not available, say the rosary with the people, instruct the children, and read a sermon or a meditation from an approved source; to look up Catholic hospital patients and supply them with papers and magazines; to be in readiness to serve Mass when the altar boy fails to appear. In these, and innumerable other ways, the energies of such a society could work themselves out. The prospect that spreads itself before one's eyes is stupendous and startling.

There are hundreds of devoted Catholic laymen discharging these duties, or duties very like them, today, but they need to be brought into contact with one another, to have their activities correlated, and to gain the inspiration that comes from a common, but a simple rule. Too, there are hundreds, nay thousands, of others, who are capable of such work but have not had its possibilities indicated to them. If a Protestant banker or lawyer or merchant can teach a class in Sunday-school or distribute religious literature, and it is a matter of common knowledge that they do these very things, then the Catholic can do the same, only better.

That man, be he bishop, priest, or layman from the ranks, who will start such a movement as this will be rendering a service to Holy Church that will be among the choicest of a future rich in promise. There will be opposition, of course. The early struggles of the Church in the United States, with their unsavory record of the trustee system and its abuses, have created a prejudice which is hard to overcome and which causes us to look askance at what seem to be, but really are not, new and novel forms of lay endeavor. We sometimes fail to realize that the river that floods the countryside, destroying buildings and laying waste the fertile fields, when properly harnessed moves the wheels of industry and becomes a blessing to the land. And after all, you know, Our Lord Himself has said, and we believe it if we believe anything, that the gates of hell shall not prevail against His Church.

Euthanasia and the Quack

AUSTIN O'MALLEY, M.D.

ON September 25 the papers had a report of a meeting in Chicago of the "American Association of Progressive Medicine," in which this association, by a vote of thirty-seven to thirty-four, passed a resolution recommending that a law be enacted in every State permitting euthanasia. The Association would have Federal or State commissions established with authority to kill off the aged when a social burden, and those suffering from incurable diseases at any age. A doctor from Iowa read a paper on the subject, and as it sounded somewhat progressive the Association passed a resolution. Fortunately the American Association of Progressive Medicine is neither American nor progressive, nor is it medical, but a group of the camp followers of medicine in the class of an ethical culture society, which on Sunday afternoon babbles in a theater where the night before somebody's Follies risked pneumonia; the Follies of Saturday followed by the Follies of Sunday. Agitators of this kind, however, too often can persuade the politicians whom we send to our legislatures to put any legal vagary into the digests, from prescriptions as to the length of bed-clothes to convent-visitation in darkest America.

The discussion of euthanasia through the use of narcotics in cases of incurable diseases recurs periodically. A few years ago the Medical Review of Reviews restarted the debate, and it published the opinions of novelists, college professors, physicians and others. The physicians were opposed to euthanasia, the others commonly were in favor of it. Those in favor of killing off the unfit gave no reason, but talked sentimentally; the reasons offered by those opposed to the notion invariably missed the central truth. The advocates of euthanasia thought either that the passing of a law by a legislature removes all moral difficulty, or that morality is a trifle which should not stand in the way of expediency except when the orator's own ox is gored. Those who oppose euthanasia commonly base their argument, first, on the fact that many patients supposed by even good diagnosticians to be incurable, recover health; and, secondly, that the grant of the power of life and death to physicians is liable to grave abuse. These reasons are secondary and accidental. Whether it is expedient, humane, or impolitic to kill an incurable patient are almost irrelevant considerations; the reason lies deeper than these.

for June, 1913, was a list of postmortem examinations reported from a leading eastern city where the diagnoses had been made by men with a reputation for fair work. In 100 cases of acute inflammation of the kidneys, 84 were false; in the same number of abscesses of the liver 80 were false; in 100 cases of inflammation of the sac in which the heart lies 80 diagnoses were false; in chronic inflammation of the heart-muscle 78 were false; in tuberculosis of the spine 77 were false; in broncho-pneumonia, 66; in tuberculosis of the kidneys, 66.7; in active tuberculosis of the lungs, 41; and so on. In small towns the diagnoses are much worse. Of course many physicians have immeasurably better diagnostic averages than these; some internists are practically always correct in their diagnoses; but these men are very rare, there are about three in Philadelphia; the ordinary man goes on through a lifetime of gross errors and calls his homicides "medical experience." These ordinary men are not quacks; they are called our reputable physicians; but what they do not know in medicine is appalling. There is such a fact as extraordinary scientific precision in medical work; also such a fact as extraordinary scientific talk by men who cannot tell the difference between an attack of indigestion and the end-symptoms of arteriosclerosis—those important citizens who die suddenly in the newspapers from "acute indigestion," always die from arteriosclerosis and a doctor—there is, too, such a fact as that the ordinary county medical society knows little more of medicine than a convocation of Methodist preachers knows of theology. Nor is the scientific fraud indigenous to America alone; one meets him as a practitioner or a Kongres-Bummler in every nation of Europe. If euthanasia were legalized what a boom in that postmedical activity, the undertaking business, there would be!

There are vagaries of our lofty American civilization called osteopathy, cheiropraxis and empiricism, compared with which even Christian Science and homeopathy are profound wisdom, and these "professions" are taken up lucratively by ambitious barbers and bankrupt druggists, and legalized by legislatures. These doctors strut in high places; they have suites in office buildings which a real physician could not pay for; they foregather in what they call medical congresses. They stroke and pummel the tremulous awnings on alcoholic and gouty pillars of Church and State commendably, after the manner of any rubber in a Turkish bathhouse. They manhandle women who have strange notions of decency; they maltreat defenseless children; they rob the ignorant; they are a disgrace to Christianity; yet if euthanasia were set on the statute books they would be allowed to murder with impunity. The only reason euthanasia has not been put on the books is because the attention of the feminists in the fool-belt between Milwaukee and Kansas City has not been called to it often enough; they have put everything else on they could think of.

Euthanasia has two phases, one wherein the patient permits his own death, another wherein the patient is killed against his will. When a patient compasses his own death he commits suicide directly or indirectly. Direct suicide is an evil fundamentally not because it injures society, or is against the charity due oneself, or against the obligation we have to preserve life as the necessary condition of good, or because it is cowardice, but it is evil primarily because it is an usurpation of the rights of God.

The natural law gives no rights except such as are finally founded in human nature itself, but human nature cannot give a title to dominion over one's own life. If it gave such a title it would thereby establish the power of destroying that life and thus of removing the basic title to all rights. Nature, however, exists as the foundation of rights, not for the subversion of rights. Again, if nature even remotely established the power of self-destruction there should be in nature itself some natural tendency to such destruction, but the direct contrary is the fact.

Dominion over his own life implies the power in man of rebelling against the subjection which he owes to God, his absolute cause and owner. Dominion is a relative thing essentially; a man cannot own himself any more than he can be his own aunt or lift himself over a fence with his own boot-straps. Life is not a gratuitous gift; it is an onerous gift.

The ultimate tendency of man is toward happiness, and, of course, happiness, or any other perfection, is impossible without existence; hence the instinctive recoil from the destruction of our life which is the requisite condition for happiness. Even those that abnormally destroy their own lives do so with horror for the destruction itself, and act thus unreasonably to escape evil, not to escape life; or they seek what they think will be a better life. The greatest injury in the natural order we can do a man is to deprive him of his life, for that deprivation destroys every right and possession he has. He can recover from all other evil, or hold his soul above every other evil, but death is the absolute conqueror. No matter how debased or how diseased a man's body may be, no one may dissociate that body from its soul, except in defense of individual or social life under peculiarly abnormal conditions; but even such defense is permissible only while the defender respects other human life and the social life, while he is innocent, has done no harm to society commensurate with the loss of his own life. Existence, no matter how sordid, is immeasurably better than non-existence, for non-existence is nothing; and eternal life, even as a probability, after separation from the body raises existence to infinite possibilities above the void of non-existence. A human life, even in an Australian Bushman, in a tuberculous pauper, in the vilest criminal, is in itself so stupendously noble a thing that the whole universe exists for its upholding toward betterment. The raising of human life toward a higher condition has been the sole tendency of all the magnificent charity, sacrifice, patriotism and heroism of the best men and women of the world since time began. The necessary First Cause itself is Life, and unending life is the greatest and most desirable reward of the just.

To kill a human being is to destroy that nature, by separating the vital principle from the body; to destroy anything is to subordinate and sacrifice that thing absolutely to the purposes of the slayer; but no one has the right so to subordinate another human being, because man and his life are solely under the dominion of God; no one but God may own a man absolutely, but absolute ownership is involved in slaying a person. Man is a person, an intelligent, free, independent creature. No other creature may hold dominion over his body and soul. Hence our hatred for the oath-bound society which exacts blind obedience. All morality depends on human freedom, all peace in life, all civilization and society itself, and there is no thraldom so vile as that which seizes dominion over life itself, no usurpation so abhorrent to human nature. Even the irrational reflexes of the body itself react quickest in protecting us from that thraldom. There are occasions when life may be taken indirectly, in self-defense, in protecting a ward, and it may be taken directly in a just war, but euthanasia is not such an occasion.

Some Irenic Journeys

DAVID GOLDSTEIN

AS extended lecture tours by Catholic laymen are not so common, one may, perhaps, be permitted to speak of his work without laying himself open to the charge of self-laudation. I therefore venture an account of my recent tour under the auspices of the Knights of Columbus. It was my fourth season's work. The Supreme Officers of the Order assigned me to West Virginia, Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, South and North Dakota, Northern Michigan and New York. About 100 lecture dates were arranged in as many cities, covering a railroad mileage of five times the distance from coast to coast.

The meetings were surprisingly well attended, the halls and theaters in many places being unable to accommodate those seeking admittance. All classes were represented, and all sects and shades of opinion, all the thousand and one divergent creeds that have developed since the Protestant rebellion tore away so many from the unity of Christ's Church. Never did my audiences seem more receptive to Catholic doctrine. Yet never before had it been so firmly my deliberate policy to set forth frankly the teachings of our Church, though in a manner that could give those of other religious beliefs no reasonable ground for offense. As a reward for this self-restraint the press frequently called attention to the fact that I had Catholic doctrines and practices to announce and defend rather than non-Catholic doctrines and practices to denounce and disprove. Thus the Daily News of Alpena, Mich., in its leading editorial observed:

> How such a delicate question could be discussed before a mixed audience without giving offense to non-Catholics was beautifully demonstrated by Mr. Goldstein. . . . He compromised nothing; he offered no apologies; he straddled the fence on nothing; he spoke straight from the shoulder in defense of the faith that is in him, clearly giving the reasons why, but always [as] a gentleman.

My formal lecture on "Peace and War" dealt with the individual, the family, our industrial relationship and our governmental life. What Catholic laymen can do and should do to make the Church better known and loved was the topic enlarged upon before my Brother Knights, with the primary object of encouraging the study of Catholic doctrine and history, hoping thus to awaken the propaganda spirit in laymen.

Socialism was introduced but incidentally. Its influence seemed to be at a very low ebb in most of the cities visited, a result, no doubt, of the internal dissensions regarding the international conflict now going on. Yet, although Socialist opposition was almost nil during this past season, I have no delusion as to its force. I believe it must be reckoned with in the not very distant future.

In spite of the fundamentally vicious principles of the Marxian doctrines, it would not be amiss, I venture to think, to endeavor to bend Socialist energies to the practical support of some just measures, to the advantage of social justice, without of course relenting in our opposition to Socialism.

However, my enemy came out in force in one city, Anderson, Ind. The local organization brought on from Dayton, Ohio, a Socialist minister, Rev. F. J. Strickland, "to trim Goldstein" and "to give the other side." Mr. Strickland was thoroughly "competent to represent the principles of the international Socialist movement." He came, and made just a little noise by asking a few stock questions and by trying to frame a few tricky ones. In the words of the Grand Knight of the local council: "Mr. Strickland's questions were so effectively answered that the gentleman immediately subsided amid the cheers of the audience and left the city before Sunday night."

The questions asked at the meetings frequently took a wide range, from higher criticism to personal conduct. "Mr. Goldstein, now don't you think higher criticism has done some good?" "Some good, yes, in this way: The attempt to discredit the Bible as the Word of God has called forth a defense of the books that make up the Bible, and has brought out added historical testimony about Our Lord's life and His Church." The term higher criticism is so "mouth-filling" that it seems to throw some people off their guard. The fact is that higher criticism never rises higher than objection, because it is not founded upon right reason nor does it employ sound argument, for it would reach spiritual things through merely physical means. Brother Caleb, who denied all that was miraculous, illustrates humorously the mode of the higher critics. "But Caleb, how about the Hebrews crossing the Red Sea?" "I'll 'splain dat. Dey crossed over on solid ice; and next day it was very warm, and de 'Gyptians just broke through de rotten ice." "But, Caleb, ice doesn't form so near the equator." "Dat objection is nuffin. In dem days there was no equator."

At another meeting a different tack was taken. An impassioned patriot, standing in the balcony of a hall where 2,500 people were gathered, demanded to know why the Pope did not condemn the Kaiser for thanking God for his victories, as though thanking God were a vice, not a virtue. At another place a renegade Catholic demanded assent to the proposition that the Church should have freed a woman from her drunken husband. He was shown that the Church safeguards the welfare of women, but that his anti-Christian method of absolute divorce would release the drunken husband and so enable him to make some other woman's life miserable. Another questioner was enlightened as to the probable reason why the privacy of the convent opposite his house was protected against his ungentlemanly inquisitiveness. He learned that the shades were not kept down from a "love of darkness." A Lutheran minister, evidently with feministic instincts, arose and suavely inquired whether Our Lord did not use the feminine word Petra instead of the masculine Petros when He spoke to Simon Bar-Jona. Of course, the gentleman was politely told that our Lord used neither the one word nor the other, as He spoke the Syro-Chaldaic, not the Greek language.

Time and again it was urged that the Catholic Church was in honor bound to declare for prohibition. This gave an opportunity to distinguish between temperance as a virtue and the political issue of prohibition. Stress was laid on the fact that Catholics are morally bound to obey God's law of temperance, while they are free to choose or reject prohibition in accordance with the dictates of an enlightened reason.

The chaos that afflicts the public mind as to Catholic opinions may be indicated by citing a few of the questions and objections that were offered. Many inquiries were doubtless sincere but some were animated by a hostile spirit: "Why is not 'Old Glory' permitted in Catholic Churches?" "Why cannot a Catholic be a Mason?" "Why did the Church chain the Bible in the Middle Ages?" "Why should Christ be called the Prince of Peace when He said He came to bring a sword?" "Did not Christ tell Peter to put up his sword, then why doesn't the Pope tell Catholics to do the same?" "What is a living wage?" "Wasn't it fear of the King of Spain that prevented Henry VIII from getting a divorce through Rome?" "What about the Hague Tribunal? England and the Vatican? Woman Suffrage?" "Why don't priests wed?" Frequently came the personal inquiry: "Why did you become a Catholic?" On the whole, whether the question arises from a good or a bad spirit, a prompt and courteous reply has a good effect upon the eager listeners, though the interrogator himself may not be convinced.

Although it is now six years since the Central Verein called me into the lecture field, yet the strangeness, on arriving in a city, of finding myself the first layman to address a public meeting in defense of Catholic truth has not worn off. So surprised are the people at the "boldness" of it that it is a common thing to have an audience remain for two and a half and three hours listening with intense interest to things unfamiliar to non-Catholic ears.

What the result of a season's hard work may be, is not mine to tell; though, of course effects are not immediately manifest. However, indications may be gleaned from communications received to the effect that many Councils of the Knights of Columbus were encouraged to attempt to lead in the intellectual and civic activities of their communities, to take up the study of Catholic doctrine and history, to distribute Catholic literature, principally Our Sunday Visitor, to place literature in racks at railroad stations and in hotels. Also it must be assumed that my work stimulated the various activities that have from time to time been inaugurated by the different divisions of our Order. By personal efforts some delinquent Catholics were induced to make their peace with God and in one instance an energetic and truth-loving young Hebrew was induced to go under instructions. Surely it is no slight privilege to be permitted to represent a great Catholic fraternal Order in its work of strengthening the Faithful in the Faith and in trying to get others into the one place on earth where truth abides in its entirety. As the privilege is great so too is the responsibility great.

The System of Capitalism

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

THERE is a vast difference between the system of capitalism and the mere fact of private ownership in the means of production. The former is antagonistic to the entire spirit of Christianity, the latter, in its broadest sense, has always existed and always will continue to exist, maugre Socialism and its exaggerated theories. By obliterating this distinction radicalism has gained its hold upon many earnest minds.

"It is ordained by nature," wrote Pope Leo XIII in reference to the forces of capital and labor, "that these two classes should dwell in harmony and agreement, and should, as it were, groove into each other, so as to maintain the balance of the body politic." Such is the teaching of the Church, and such is the ideal of all labor unionism which has not been perverted by radical influences. But the harmony and balance here described were violently interfered with by the system of economics which came with the invention of machinery, the passing of the gilds, and the growing power of the Reformation. That system is known today as "capitalism" and must not, we repeat, be confounded with the mere fact of capitalist production. It has recently been designated as "commercialism," since the name capitalism is doubtless often used in a sense that is unobjectionable.

The two essential elements of this system are the domination of capital, particularly "money-capital," over the entire economic field, and secondly the subordination of all the interests connected with production to the one consideration of personal gain. It has therefore been properly defined as "economic rationalism." The Gospel rule of charity, the laws of justice and the sanctions of religion were all obliged to yield place to the overmastering considerations of profit, rent and interest; in a word, to the one absorbing idea of personal gain. This became the sole motor power of the entire system as the idea of religion was eliminated from its business transactions.

It may perhaps be objected that the inordinate amassing of riches was not unknown in the Middle Ages, which immediately preceded the capitalistic system, and that then as now men could be found who were ready to sacrifice charity, justice and religion itself for the sake of gain. This is perfectly true. But the essential point of distinction is that there was then no system of economics which sought to justify such a course, or which, like the pagan capitalism we have described, did not even deem a justification necessary. Its law is still summed up in the materialistic motto: "Business is business," which means that the considerations of humanity and religion may have their proper time, but must not be allowed to interfere with the interests of personal gain. A man may grind and crush the poor, paying starvation wages to labor and exacting starvation prices for his products, and yet stand justified by the principles of this system. He may even, if he chooses, be crowned as a philanthropist and public benefactor, should he desire to satisfy his craving for publicity. Such a code of morality was impossible in the Middle Ages. It could never be tolerated while the Church exercised her power over the people. For men like these she had but one word, and that was the word of St. James in the Holy Scriptures:

> Go to now, ye rich men, weep and howl in your miseries, which shall come upon you.
> Your riches are corrupted and your garments are motheaten.
> Your gold and silver is cankered, and the rust of them shall be for a testimony against you, and shall eat your flesh like fire. You have stored up to yourselves wrath against the last day.
> Behold the hire of the laborers who have reaped your fields, which by fraud hath been kept back by you, crieth: and the cry of them hath entered into the ears of the Lord of sabaoth. (St. James, v: 1-4.)

Supreme consideration for the common good always remained the ideal of the Middle Ages, however much men might offend in practice. Egoism was the sole ideal of the new economic system that followed upon them. It was an economic liberalism, with no interest save such as might eventually augment personal gain. There was no limit to be set to this. There was no delicacy to be observed in the choice of means for accumulating it. The oppression of labor, the exploitation of women and children, the destruction of family life, were all normal methods that never caused the lifting of an eyebrow. There was to be absolute freedom of competition and absolute liberty of personal contract between employer and employee, in order that the weaker competitor might be relentlessly crushed to the wall and the laborer might be hopelessly enslaved by the powerful employer. Yet the men who practised these enormities were not considered criminals, but gentlemen.

A rational and perfect system of large-scale production would have been possible under the influence of the Church; not so the system of capitalism. The spirit of the Church's laws, directed against usury, would not have prevented the taking of reasonable interest or profit in modern industrial life, and so the upbuilding of a sound and prosperous economic system, but it would have rendered impossible the usurious profits exacted under the reign of commercialism. Again, the spirit of organization, which the Church communicated to her gild system, would have helped to bring about the widest diffusion of private ownership, but would not have allowed the paralyzing and destruction of labor organization which now took place under capitalism, consistently with the principles of a ruthless, relentless and unscrupulous struggle for gain.

The Reformation, without any doubt, is mainly accountable for the system of capitalism as here outlined. We make this statement while fully aware of the apparently conflicting theory put forth by Werner Sombart, which attributes its origin to the Jews. The following is his own summary of the five factors which he believes contributed to help towards the development of the system of capitalism, which he describes as somewhat restricted in its earlier period by Christian customs and morals, but as later entirely unembarrassed by any restraints of Christian morality and traditions:

> (1) Natural science, born of the Germanic Romance spirit, which was the mother of modern inventions. (2) Speculation, born of the Jewish spirit. Modern technical progress allied with modern speculation provided the necessary forms for the limitless efforts of capitalist enterprise. The process was still more accelerated by (3) the general Jewish influence which since the seventeenth century has made itself felt in the economic life of Europe. From its very nature this influence could not but strive to extend its economic activities without let or hindrance, regardless of considerations; and its religion, far from restraining it, gave it free rein. The Jews were the catalytic substance in the rise of modern capitalism. (4) As religious feelings became weaker and weaker among the Christian peoples, the old bonds of morality and tradition that had held capitalism in check in its earliest stages gave way, until (5) they were completely removed when through emigration the most capable business types settled in new lands. And so capitalism grew and grew and grew. Today it is like a mighty giant striding through the land, treading down all that stands in its path. (The Quintessence of Capitalism, p. 357.)

Were we to admit this entire analysis the fact would still remain that it was the Reformation which made the acceptance of this system possible after it had been originated by the Jews; for Sombart admits that non-Jews in course of time equaled their instructors. Never could the Church have tolerated its introduction. It does not reflect the spirit of the Old Testament, but is the economic expression of liberalism and rationalism, and therefore of modern paganism pure and simple, whether practised by Jew or Gentile.

The system of capitalism began by disregarding the sacred rights of the laborer to a reasonable family wage. It continued its work by the warfare of unrestricted competition in which all means were fair that might crush a weaker rival. It completed its task with the concentration of enormous fortunes in the hands of single individuals and the coalition of mighty interests that swept everything before them. It ended in the establishment of gigantic foundations to carry its domination from the economic sphere into every other field of human activity, seeking to control and monopolize charities, schools and municipal and national governments themselves. For this purpose it became the custom for leading capitalists to purchase or otherwise secure their own papers that they might the more surely, though covertly, influence and control public opinion, elections, civic or national movements and enterprise, and so the entire life of the people.

Such is the system of capitalism. Catholic condemnation of it is no less severe than that of the Socialist could be. To convince ourselves of this we need but read the social Encyclicals of Pope Leo XIII. But we differ sharply from the Socialist agitator in that we do not condemn capital itself, but the rationalism which thus misused it. There is no moral evil in the axe wherewith a murder is committed, but in the evil heart which gave the evil counsel. Under Christian direction capital, like other things in themselves indifferent, can be used for the economic and even the moral and spiritual welfare of the world. So it would be used, and so it has been used even at the present day under the direction of the Church and the guidance of the principles which she lays down. It is the task of every Catholic to combat the spirit of capitalism and to see that it is supplanted, not by a compulsory and equally dangerous and destructive communism, but by the widest and most equitable distribution of private ownership; not by Socialism, but by Christian democracy as taught in the great encyclicals of the Sovereign Pontiffs.

Cosmic Dreams of Modern Philosophers

HENRY A. DOHERTY, JR.

THE modern purveyor of cosmic explanations dwells in the realm, not of fact, but of imagination. Like a child fresh from his first fairy tale and eager to try his own powers of invention, he plunges into the misty land of fancy and emerges with an ecstatically beautiful, romantic, exciting, thrilling new story; and he is confident that no one could be so cruel as to dash it to pieces on the hard rocks of reality. There is, of course, Catholicism with its insistence on cold matter-of-fact investigation, its views surviving for many centuries, its slavery to fact; but he discounts its opposition, for he believes it to be merely ancient, ignorant superstition, incapable of appreciating the fervid ecstasy of original thought and out of sympathy with the subtle refinement of the modern mind.

Eventually he nerves himself to give his intellectual child to the world, where it is baptized with the applause of thinkers like himself, and confirmed by its adoption into the coterie of the cultured few, and dispatched on its mission of doing its part in wrecking the frame of human knowledge. It is all so inspiring. The intellectual father stands there with his babe in his arms and a pathetic gleam of intellectual mother-love in his eyes. "See what I have produced," he seems to say; "even I, son of parents of flesh and blood, yet parent of a child beyond the fondest hopes of flesh and blood. Dissect it if you will, condemn it if you dare; but if you do so, I shall produce another which shall defy dissection and condemnation." So the dream is told.

The great universe, whirling in space, inhabited by countless living things, acknowledges no power above and apart from itself; it is nothing more nor less than God evolving Himself in matter. What could be more self-evident or satisfactory? Why not accept fascinating theory for fact? How foolish to insist on elaborate proof! The problems affecting living and inert matter need but a little imagination to be solved. There is in matter, so the new fairy tale runs, a life-force which gives it form and is its law and order. This force is God, dwelling in all living things. Ah, romance, thou art rampant! Life-force trickling through the cosmos in deep, mysterious channels of power! What can exhaust the excitement of this progress of material things to perfection? But what of the inert matter? The answer is simple. Matter existed from eternity, and in it life originated in a germ. The wonder grows. We have the thrill of order germinating in disorder and evolving the latter into complex perfection; the chaos becomes the cosmos, and all things, man included, move forward to perfection. There is, however, a troublesome question concerning this germ, this original seed. Whence did it come? Was it created? Banish the thought. Germs germinate, they are not created; they are. What a glorious, what an enlightened concept! The germ contains within itself all that is ever to happen. Chaos grows into cosmos, plant into animal, animal into man, man into God. Intelligence is gradually developed in the process. Matter develops sensation, sensation grows into instinct, instinct into intuition, intuition into knowledge, knowledge into truth, or whatever progression you choose.

But the puzzle is not yet wholly solved. All things are adapted to their surroundings; only man seems to be an exception, for his desires conflict with his capacities, he aspires to perfection, but is still imperfect. The modern philosopher has a ready explanation for this anomaly—the conflict of matter with life-force. But the question immediately arises, Why should there be a conflict if life-force and matter are both the homogeneous unfolding of a single idea? The modern philosopher's answer is not far to seek. Matter, he informs us, conflicts with spirit; spirit is the law of matter, and works in it and through it; but a struggle is inevitable, for spirit is infinite, matter finite; spirit eternal, matter temporal. And if we ask whence is this spirit, we are assured that it was sown in matter, but when and how will not be clear until spirit has finally discarded its manifold disguises.

It would appear, therefore, that spirit does not really need matter for its self-expression, that it is above and beyond matter, and that in the hands of its manipulators it has worked itself into something not wholly unlike the God of the Christians. Shall we soon hear hints of a vague possibility of Christianity being true? Christianity certainly deserves some consideration from the dreamers of dreams. It has not shirked facing the difficulties of the riddle of the universe; its solution is very detailed and comprehensive. Eternal Spirit, creating matter and infusing into it the spark of life, and in the case of man, a spiritual, immortal soul; the loss of the God-given preternatural harmony between the lower and higher parts of human nature, due to disobedience of Divine law and entailing internal conflict; the Incarnation, Redemption and the restoration of man to his supernatural destiny, to be worked out with the assistance of grace, and finally attained by the possession of the Beatific Vision for eternity; this is a system that at least challenges attention by its very completeness, its explanation of facts, its cohesiveness, its age and its cloud of witnesses.

Let man, for a change, postulate the whole orthodox Christian system as a theoretical explanation of the world and of man. Then let him array the facts of human discovery and experience, of which he is certain beyond a doubt, against this theory. He will find never one fact to conflict with it. For the real truth of science never conflicts with the real truth of Revelation. When they seem to be at variance, one or the other of them has undergone some misunderstanding or exaggeration. Man has tried either to make Revelation explain more than it is intended to explain, or to make human science explain more than it ever can explain.

Two Much-Needed Books

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I would like to call attention to the urgent need of two books and also to suggest that some of your learned readers take up the work of writing them: The History of Nursing and the Ethics of Nursing, both to be written from the Catholic standpoint. These two subjects were introduced this summer into the list of requirements for registered nurse-training schools. On the former of these subjects, I know of no book that is satisfactory for Catholic schools. As for the latter, "Ethics for Nurses," by Aitken, published by Saunders, is excellent, but it would be seventy-five per cent better, if the element of the supernatural were incorporated into it. I use the book in connection with DeHarbe's "Advanced Catechism." The need of books on these subjects written by Catholics is very great, and I believe that every Catholic nurse-training school in the United States would adopt them and be very grateful to their authors.

Chaplains' Aid Association

To the Editor of AMERICA:

With a view to furthering the work of the Chaplains' Aid Association, the following brief account of the organization and efforts of the Newark Chapter is submitted. At the request of Father Burke, who had just organized the association, the attention of the Bishop of Newark was brought to the matter by three ladies of the diocese. He at once approved the proposal that the work be started in his diocese and appointed a spiritual director, at whose residence a meeting was called. No methodical selection of members was made, but such women as could be reached immediately, and who seemed likely to be interested in the project, and have time and means at their disposal, were communicated with. The chapter was organized with a president, four vice-presidents, a secretary and a treasurer. The others who attended the meeting were put on the Executive Board.

Within a week the names of eighty prominent Catholic women were published as composing an honorary committee, and letters were sent out in the name of the Spiritual Director to every pastor in the diocese, in which the nature of the work was outlined and a request was made that the pastor should appoint a member of his parish to co-operate with the association. A chairman, who was also made a member of the Executive Board, was appointed for each county, whose task it was to follow up the letters with a personal visit and to beg the pastors either to organize the work themselves or to allow us to do so. In most cases the pastors designated a parish chairman, who makes her returns to the county chairman.

We have met with most encouraging response. Headquarters were put at our disposal by a leading hotel, and were also offered us by the Knights of Columbus. The "A Kempis" at once donated two kits and a thousand prayer-books; many parish organizations also have made donations. We have been enabled to furnish the nine chaplains from this diocese with kits, as well as three chaplains from the Trenton diocese, where another chapter is now being organized. We have the assurance of acting chaplains in the New Jersey camps that our assistance has been valuable to them.

We have had able direction, but we feel that the success of our work has been due mainly to its appeal to the faith and patriotism of our women. There should be no difficulty in starting a chapter in any diocese. We shall be glad to offer the benefit of our experience to any one desiring it.

"Queen of Peace, Pray for Us"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

"Queen of Peace, Pray for Us." Let that be the watchword of a phalanx of prayer formed to assist the Pope in his tremendous task of bringing peace to a war-swept world. The intention of uttering this prayer at least once a day would be the sole requirement for membership in this spiritual army. For does not this prayer comprise it all? The words are those of the Vicar of Christ. To utter them signifies submission to his authority to whom Our Blessed Lord entrusted His Church, and rebellion against whose spiritual guidance has been a great underlying cause for the present world-cataclysm. They are words addressed to Our Blessed Mother, the Mother of Christ Jesus and Our Mother. It is meet that we should address our heartfelt prayers to her at this, the hour of our extremest need. If we had offended a great and powerful king, should we not gladly welcome the intercession of his gentle mother? And how grievously has all mankind offended Almighty God!

God is infinitely merciful, but He is also infinitely just. He will forgive, but we must ask His forgiveness. Nor will any mere perfunctory asking suffice. Great has been our offense, great should be our sorrow. We must ask, ask with all our heart. And can any plea be more powerful with Our Lord than that of His Blessed Mother?

The more each soldier in this phalanx of prayer does in this storming of Heaven's gates, the better. If he will say "Queen of Peace, Pray for Us," morning and evening, or thrice a day, or oftener, so much the more will he be doing to hasten the coming of peace. And best of all will it be, if he will receive Our Lord in Communion and lift up this prayer from a pure heart.

How evident will be the transcending catholicity of the Church, when the blood-drenched world sees millions of devoted Catholics, devoted to country and to God, fighting valiantly against one another, each for his native land, and yet breathing a common prayer to Her who is the Blessed Mother of them all.

Denial of Rights

To the Editor of AMERICA:

From the clipping herewith submitted from the New Orleans Times-Picayune of September 8, 1917, it would appear that the very foundations of religious freedom have been construed to be without the pale of Oklahoma law as regards the Mass:

> OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., Sept. 7.—In an opinion made public today, S. P. Freeling, State Attorney-General, held that the prohibition laws of Oklahoma made unlawful the use of wine even for sacramental purposes.

I have no brief in defense of Lutheran and Protestant Episcopal rights, likewise blanketed under this comprehensive interdiction of their communion wine, although, if I am correctly informed, a great many Lutherans and nearly all Episcopalians accept wine and not grape juice as alone valid in the terms of the Eucharistic institution. But I am simply staggered and confounded in my first rudiments of reason to think that such point-blank tyranny can be solemnly registered as the law of Oklahoma by Oklahoma's official expounder of the State law in the person of her Attorney-General.

Our national Attorney-General Gregory has an extremely serious and honest countenance, to judge from current newspaper portraiture. Does he, perhaps, take cognizance of the flagrant subversion of the Federal guarantees granting freedom of worship? Or is it a case of policing wine from the altar under the head of prohibited "intoxicants"? Vox dei!

Masses, Not Flowers

From time to time communications have appeared in your paper in reference to substituting Masses for flowers as an expression of esteem at funerals. A practical demonstration was made in this respect in Atlantic City last week. A man died who was very popular but without very much social prominence, and who did not leave any surviving relatives. He did not care for flowers in his life, and his friends thought it would be unfair to him to load his casket with flowers. So a quiet effort was made to secure Masses for him as a substitute for flowers. As a result cards were prepared which provided a space for the signature of the donor and a place for the priest to sign acknowledging that a contribution had been made for a Mass or Masses. It was an edifying sight at his funeral to note that forty such cards, tied with purple ribbon, were distributed on and about his body, indicating that forty Masses at least would be offered for the repose of his soul. The action taken was freely and favorably commented upon. The ease with which it was accomplished is an evidence that all that is required to make the substitution of Masses for flowers popular is some well-directed effort.

The Catholic Press

Your editorial entitled "A False Economy" is timely and to the point. It is to be deplored that the interest in Catholic papers and magazines is not what it should be, yet there are a few who are doing their share toward carrying on the work of the press by their own subscriptions and their efforts to induce others to become subscribers. The difficulty could be surmounted if the word "many" could in truth be substituted for "few," but how are we going to get the many? This is an old problem and many solutions have been offered, but whether or not they were successful, we can keep on trying until we find the best answer.

My method is to remail all the Catholic magazines that I get hold of, and in each one of them is a small slip requesting the reader to become a subscriber, or if he is already a subscriber or cannot afford to become one, he can at least give the magazine to a friend and help to promote the circulation. If those into whose hands the magazine falls will do as requested, some result is bound to follow.

It is gratifying to see that some of our societies are actively interested in this problem, but would it not be a good plan to have a league for the support of the Catholic press, not to multiply or add to the organizations already existing but to act in conjunction with each one of them, that they may grow in number and develop in spirit? If each Catholic family gave a written promise that at least one Catholic paper or magazine entered the home, the purpose would be accomplished in a short time. Many people are not subscribers for no other reason than that they have never been asked, no effort has been made to reach them.

If the readers of AMERICA would use each number for propaganda as I have suggested, wonders might be wrought. Why not try it? Nothing would be lost and much might be gained. A reprint of your editorial or strong argument to the same effect in leaflet form could be circulated in many different ways and places. Anyone who can buy a magazine at all can afford to buy AMERICA; it is the best of the entire lot. Keep on urging them.

Knights of Columbus

As one instance of the activity of the Knights of Columbus in behalf of our Catholic soldiers, the following excerpt from the Free Press of Burlington, Vt., will doubtless prove interesting to your readers:

> A three days' mission for the Catholic soldiers at Fort Ethan Allen closed Tuesday evening. The Knights of Columbus building was crowded, as it had been on the two previous evenings. The Rev. Father W. J. Stanton, S. J., of New York, preached an inspiring sermon on "The Flag and the Cross." Following the sermon, the soldiers renewed their baptismal vows and dedicated themselves to the flag as the symbol of their allegiance to country, and to the cross as the symbol of their loyalty to God. The eager, manly faces of the soldiers sent a thrill through the onlookers. The flower of the country's manhood renewing its pledges of fidelity to country and flag by a promise of loyalty to the cross of sacrifice could not but be inspiring.
> It is estimated that about 800 attended the evening devotions and sermon. Father Stanton was assisted by the Rev. Father Bernier, S. S. E., of St. Michael's College, who has been given charge of the work among the Catholic men at the fort. Father Stanton wishes also to give public expression of his thanks to Colonel Rivers, who courteously received him and encouraged the work of the mission.
> This mission work among the soldiers constitutes the essential part of the labors of the Knights of Columbus at the government encampments. The stirring sermons delivered by Father Stanton, who is nothing if he is not virile, and the attention paid to the spiritual side of the men are a distinct patriotic service, for the knights feel that service to God begets love and loyalty to country. Similar missions will be given at the various camps throughout the country.

It might be added that the Vermont State Councils of the Knights of Columbus erected the recreation hall referred to in the above notice on the camp grounds of Fort Ethan Allen under the inspiration and direction of the Rt. Rev. J. J. Rice, D.D., Bishop of Burlington. It is used on Sunday as a chapel.

Our Service Flag

OVER the entrance to the building that the editors of AMERICA call "home," hangs a service flag, bearing a single star. AMERICA is proud of that flag. It means that one of the staff, the Reverend Gerald C. Treacy, S.J., who received his commission as First Lieutenant on September 8, is "off to the wars." For the last few months, Father Treacy has instructed and edified the readers of this review by his articles on the relief work of the various Sisterhoods in the Civil War. The brilliant pen is now laid aside for the time, and henceforth Chaplain Treacy will devote his days, and many of his nights, no doubt, to the welfare of our brave men in the field.

Since the days of John Carroll, sometime Jesuit and patriot of revolutionary days, "U. S. A." and "S.J." have been titles singularly akin. As the philosophers would say, the two are notes that are completely congruous. That a religious man should leave the quiet of the cloister or the study for spiritual work in the army, is no new thing either in this country or abroad; but both as the son of a Society from which the military idea is not absent, and as an editor, AMERICA's contribution to the army should find himself singularly at home in his new career. An editor who tells the truth, and it is proverbial that all good editors are painfully veracious, may hope for surcease of sorrow beyond the grave; but on this side of the dark river he must be content to be the target of many a malign and baleful eye. If, in addition, he is a Catholic editor, he soon begins to realize the true inwardness of St. Paul's phrase, intus timores, foras pugnae, conflict without and a certain fear within. For his fighting is indeed against principalities and powers that know not God, and he must often conduct his campaign, alone, misunderstood, misrepresented.

The domestic note has never been struck in these pages, but as times change, old customs cannot remain precisely what they were. In great measure the life of those who fix and guide the policies of this review is, and must be, militant; but as they turn to the work of the day, they are encouraged by the thought that in a new and acceptable sense, their efforts are centered against forces, visible and unseen, that would tear down Church and State alike. Therefore do the editors of AMERICA, with feelings in which admiration and wistful envy combine, stand at attention as from their company passes a gallant man and zealous chaplain, Lieutenant Gerald C. Treacy, S.J., U. S. A.

Free Speech and the Professors

ENLIGHTENED by the dealings of the Government of the United States in connection with the I. W. W., with the pacifists and other misguided persons, a great Eastern university has at last concluded that speech is not absolutely "free." The gowned magistrates of New York concur in this decision which, indeed, they reached one month in advance of their brethren of the academic close; while the police of the metropolis have long been of the opinion that the intelligence of the ordinary Madison Square Garden variety of soap-box orator is in inverse ratio to the strength of his lungs and the speed of his language. Thus does intelligence slowly leaven the mass, proceeding from the lower classes, and arriving by slow degrees at the learned and the literati, the frosted layer on the top of the community cake.

Probably the savant who invented the phrase "free speech" and made it popular, is not urging his claims in these days when war, a reality, if a cruel one, has suggested a return to real thinking and common-sense. How so many Americans ever came to believe that the Constitution justified them in freely expressing an opinion, their own or someone else's, on any subject whatever, and on all occasions, must remain a puzzle to worry the philosophers and the historians of the future. No decent man ever acted on that principle or ever will; put into complete effect, it would mean the destruction not only of life's amenities but of civilized society. With the return of peace, the old formula will, no doubt, reappear, but in a modified form. The course of current events has marked indelibly upon many minds, the fact that neither the truth of one's cherished "message," nor the sincerity with which it is held, authorizes its utterance at all times and places. There is a time for speech and a time for silence, and every sane man soon learns that not even the most salutary truth is to be preached without due regard for circumstances. It may be true that the theater is really on fire, but only a fool will hasten to shout that fact to a crowded audience. Unfortunately, more than one American college has been afflicted for years with professors who have been shouting "fire," when there has been no fire at all, and justifying their course on the plea that academic freedom of speech entitled them to present as objective truth whatever they, measuring the universe by the confessedly fallible yardsticks of their intellects, deemed to be the truth.

The university in question is to be congratulated on its courage, somewhat belated, it is true, in dropping two professors who have long made themselves particularly obnoxious by ill-considered and forcibly-expressed criticisms of the Government's war-policy. It is somewhat amusing to think of the horror that would have swept the country, had these two professors been allowed to preach their doctrines from the pulpit of a Catholic college, and also decidedly instructive. It seems to show that while the country is apt to set a low value on the utterances, patriotic or ethical, of teachers in non-sectarian institutions, it expects precise thinking and well-considered statements from the holders of chairs in Catholic colleges.

American Manners Again

WHEN a social lioness was once asked to explain how she managed to keep sweet-tempered and serene even when subjected to the most exasperating social inflictions, she simply answered: "St. Teresa's bookmark, a robust sense of humor, and a well-cultivated talent for admiring and marveling." That is an excellent recipe for maintaining agreeable social relations with the neighbor, and perhaps if it were more widely used by the young people of today, there would not be so much justice in the strictures Mr. Robert Grant passes on American manners in an article which he contributes to the current Yale Review about "The Tired Business Man." For that creature of our modern social system, according to Mr. Grant's indictment, is largely responsible, not only for America's bad manners, but for other evils that are now very rife in this country. He writes:

> The tired business man may disclaim responsibility for our continuous crop of murders and accidents, divorces and hasty legislation, but surely to him more than to anyone else is directly traceable our middle-class craving for the gay but inane and salacious compound which theatrical managers find to be their best drawing-card. And to whose discredit if not that of his wife and daughter—especially his daughter, once aptly described as "the iron Madonna who strangles in her fond embrace the American novelist"—are we to charge the pink lemonade popularity of most of our "best sellers"? With both father and daughter the process is subconscious; a case of glorifying what one likes because one likes it and thus choosing the paths of least resistance. The easy-going optimism, which in the name of naturalness fosters a craving for cheap vaudeville or to be sentimentally titillated, can be due to nothing but mental torpor—reluctance to think, which is only another term for atrophied imagination.
> As for manners, we are kind-hearted as a people and civil when appealed to, but no one would suspect it if our bearing in thoroughfares and street cars be a criterion. The spirit of the age is first come, first served; to be waived only in favor of the crippled and the positively infirm. Courtesy in the old-fashioned sense—the deference of the young for their seniors, of the stronger for the weaker sex, of the vigorous for the frail—if not extinct is so sporadic as to be noticeable when manifested. The young men who push their way to the fore in public conveyances retain without compunction the seats for which they have struggled. Here again we have the philosophy of the tired business man: "I got there first; we are all equals in the United States, and I want to read my newspaper." The apotheosis of naturalness, and in self-defense we all more or less subscribe to it; but after all it is natural for pigs to struggle for places at a trough. Well may we ask ourselves if it is impossible to safeguard independence, initiative, and equality except at the cost of all the social graces that prevailed when society was more artificial.

If the tired business man is chiefly to blame for the general lack of consideration for others and the deplorable lowering of taste with which he is charged in the foregoing passage, let us hope that one salutary result of the present war will be his complete reformation, and that when peace returns our countrymen will prize more highly than they now seem to do the old-fashioned graces of courtesy and refinement.

Make Your Dollars Pray

SOME modern critics have said that the war will be brought to a victorious end by the country that "is able to continue producing." If this be true, it would seem that Germany's defeat will be the result of an economic, rather than of a military collapse. Hence it is of prime importance, that the United States and the Allied Powers not only raise armies, build fleets, and equip both with engines of destruction, but that with at least equal care, they guard and increase the productive factors of their respective countries. To build with one hand and to tear down with the other, but to make construction more than counterbalance destruction, is the precise but puzzling business of war. The puzzle finds an answer only when the nation is able to reform wasteful processes, or to bring to light productive forces hitherto unknown. These forces, human, animate, and purely material, are manifold, but the importance of a proximate factor was stressed by a popular American who wrote, "It's dollars that will win this war." There is, therefore, a store of good advice in the slogan, "Make your dollars work."

But our dollars can do more than work. They can pray. More than anything else, in these times of stress, do we need to get down on our knees and implore the protection of Almighty God for ourselves and for our beloved country. Too long have those of us who possess much of this world's goods, devoted the surplus not to the service of God and of His poor, but to the bondage of pleasures that are superfluous or illicit. These are the acceptable days, the hour of reformation. "Let my counsel be acceptable to thee," said Daniel to the iniquitous king, "and redeem thy sins with alms, and thy iniquities with works of mercy towards the poor; perhaps He will forgive thy offenses." Rich or poor, all of us can do something to aid the many worthy charities at our very doors. No one ever came to woe through generosity, for "he that giveth to the poor, shall not want."

Possibly it may seem invidious to recommend one above any other of the many worthy organizations that have sprung up since the beginning of the war. Yet, surely, charity will suffer no hurt, if it is pointed out that when insistent business methods are adopted to raise funds for non-sectarian charities, our distinctively Catholic charities, whose policy is to work and suffer in silence, may be passed over in their great need. There is probably not an organized Catholic charity in this country that does not face the coming winter with forebodings, but the times bear cruelly, and with particular insistence, upon our homes for children and the aged. There is nothing spectacular about these institutions; on the other hand, few agencies are more important than those which care for the little ones, and few should appeal more deeply to all hearts than those homes which strive to bring peace and calm after a weary life into the evening of old age.

Laudable self-interest as well as the need of these institutions, urges generosity in almsgiving. If we wish Almighty God to help us, let us make the mouths of little children pray for us, and ask that the trembling hands of old age be lifted up to Him in our behalf. In the measure that we mete, shall it be meted to us. To bring down God's blessing upon ourselves and our country, let us make our dollars pray. They cannot be better occupied. "Shut up alms in the heart of the poor, and it shall obtain for thee help against all evil. Better than the shield of the mighty, and better than the spear, it shall fight for thee against thine enemy."

Learning, Earning, Yearning

TO the trusting New England farmer of thirty years ago the mail would sometimes bring a gaily-printed circular which set forth by means of contrasting illustrations the superiority of a certain kind of lawn-mower to all others. On half the page was pictured a farmhouse rapidly going to ruin, a slatternly wife was scolding her unkempt children, while a shiftless husband sat on the doorstep, his head buried despondently in his hands, apparently contemplating suicide. Under the picture were printed the illuminating words: "This man did not buy our lawn-mower." But the other illustration on the circular represented a prosperous farmer. House and barn were in excellent repair, and on the well-shorn lawn stood a smiling wife and romping children, while a cheerful-looking husband caressed affectionately the handle of a new lawn-mower. Under the picture was written: "This man did buy our lawn-mower."

Who would have thought that a mere lawn-mower could have caused such happiness, or such misery! But it is a matter of common knowledge that in domestic life the most far-reaching effects are sometimes produced by the character of a house's furniture and decorations. Once upon a time, for instance, there was a young couple who received as a wedding present a fine Madonna by Murillo, and the daily contemplation of the masterpiece wrought such a marvelous change in the characters of its two beholders that from frivolous and worldly things they became serious and devout and eventually sent three of their daughters to the convent and two of their sons to the seminary. It has also been observed that children who always dine at a Louis Quatorze table and take their morning porridge from old Sèvres china grow up with a most enviable air of breeding and distinction, for they ever strive to make their manners harmonize with their environment, consequently their demeanor is invariably what would be expected of those who use old Sèvres at an eighteenth-century table.

It is hard to believe that that cheerful farmer, those devout parents and those well-bred children really derived such marvelous strength of spirit merely from the daily contemplation of one or two details of their material environment as our ingenious anecdotist would have us infer. But there can be no doubt that learning, earning and yearning, which are the three important functions of every good man's life, can be remarkably promoted or impeded by some seemingly trifling detail of his surroundings. What will be continually teaching him new lessons, what will make his work more valuable to himself or others, what will help him keep his ideals lofty and pure, may be in itself a thing quite ordinary or of little intrinsic value. Nevertheless the object, whether it be an implement, a picture or a bit of furniture may, owing to its utility, beauty or associations, render its owner or beholder, as his life goes on, a better learner, earner and yearner.

An Italian Ozanam

BUT fifteen years have elapsed since the death of Contardo Ferrini, whom his admiring countrymen have called the Italian Ozanam, and already the initial steps for his beatification have been taken in Rome. But recently the Holy Father expressed his satisfaction at the progress the cause was making and rejoiced in the hope that the Church would soon be able to place upon her altars a great university professor of our own times, who united in himself to a marvelous degree, those two attributes which the world deems irreconcilable, the scientific spirit and a childlike submission to the teachings of the Catholic Faith.

The name of Contardo Ferrini is but little known to American Catholics. For too many years it was almost unknown to his countrymen. Yet Contardo Ferrini was doing work in the history of Graeco-Roman law and its influence upon modern civilization which won the admiration of Theodore Mommsen and made him exclaim that in the study of that law and its dependent branches, the twentieth century would be known as "the century of Ferrini." Like Ozanam, Ferrini died young. Like him he spent the greater part of his life in a professor's chair. The University of Pavia looked upon him as its ablest professor and thanks to him saw something of its former splendor revived. Like Ozanam, Ferrini had a magic and lasting influence on the hearts of his pupils. He was an ideal professor, modern in the best sense, critical, scientific, thoroughly master of every phase of his intricate subject, keenly analytical, an indefatigable digger into hidden sources and records, gifted with an historical sense seldom surpassed. But he was more than the professor. He was the embodiment of truth, sincerity, purity, childlike piety and faith. No one ever listened to the young lecturer, whom scholars like Mommsen, Moritz Voigt and von Lingenthal pronounced unsurpassed in his own special field, without leaving his lecture hall, not only solidly instructed but ennobled in his views and heartened for the battle of life. Like Ozanam, Ferrini loved the poor. He wrote eloquently and toiled generously and tirelessly in their behalf. He had also the simplicity and the humility of the great French scholar. Like Ozanam he sought light and guidance, at the altar under the rays of the sanctuary lamp. This modern university professor was a daily communicant. His keen mind found no difficulties in the mysterious splendors of the Sacrament of the Altar. His last words, when his ever serene intellect was for a moment filmed with the mists of death, were "Let us go to Mass."

Science and faith were nobly united in Contardo Ferrini. He was of the race of those great Catholics like Pasteur, in whom the scientific spirit, far from being crushed, is on the contrary endowed with a keener insight and given wider horizons by the teachings of their faith. His life so simply, yet so nobly spent in a great university brought him every moment almost into the closest contact with some of the most intricate problems of modern thought. He handled them scientifically, fearlessly, faultlessly. His career is an eloquent refutation of the oft-repeated charge that there is an irreconcilable opposition between the conclusions of science and history, and the dogmas of the Catholic religion. The twentieth century has had no more critical or more thorough exponent of historical jurisprudence than Contardo Ferrini. The Catholic Church ever had in him a loyal and a devoted son. The day, perhaps, is not far off when she will raise the university professor and the historian of the Graeco-Roman law to the honors of the altar.

Literature

TENNYSON

ALFRED TENNYSON is a poet whose poetry in his lifetime received more than its meed of praise, and since his death has passed into, at least comparative, oblivion with an unparalleled swiftness. "The Passing of Alfred" might well seem incredible to his readers and critics of a quarter of a century ago. For the time being, at all events, he is as dead as his poor imitator, Lewis Morris.

He belonged to his time and his moment. One had almost said that he was very quick to catch the mood of his time and his moment: only that would not be true if it implied deliberation: for no poet ever believed more implicitly in his call and his mission that Alfred Tennyson. Within his poetry of forty years or so is contained a microcosm of the life and thought of later decades of the nineteenth century. There was the cultivated religious doubt, the doubt which threw so many intellectuals into the arms of the Catholic Church. It was the doubt of the public schools and the universities which made heterodox bishops and deans of the Establishment when it did not make Catholics. Tennyson got it all into "In Memoriam"; and in a sense answered it there, though not very certainly. In the sixties and seventies there was a heterodoxy attaching to Tennyson which, doubtless, made him more thrilling to the parsonages as well as the college rooms, where he was so dearly loved and admired. He had listened, just listened, to Darwin and to the authors of "Ecce Homo," the famous book which fluttered the orthodox dove-cotes of England in the seventies. For a good many people, rather timid people, he represented what they used to call the "larger thought," very faint and far away. In another mood, as in "Maud," he caught very faithfully the tone of the painting, poetry-writing, theorizing, mildly evolutionary young men of the universities, who in the long days of peace found nothing to break their teeth upon but the arts and religious doubt.

Probably the fact that he was so deftly and exactly of his moment accounts for his rapid disappearance. The day before yesterday is too near to be interesting. But his day will come again, one imagines, after the war is over. It will be good to slip from a blood-drenched, broken world into the quiet cathedral close of Tennyson's poetry. People will want to know what it was like, in those green and colored gardens of life, long, long ago before the war, ante-bellum. After the horror and splendor of the war, which has broken many idols, it will be good to escape to green pastures and cool waters that once were, and these Tennyson will offer us. He is the poet of the delightful things of nineteenth-century England; dew-drenched, bird-haunted lawns; the English girl, just unrestful enough to want the higher education; the English lad, with his head full of fine flummery of dreams, nothing like so dangerous as those of Turgenieff's Russian students; college quads; ancient manor-houses; Toryism just not too high; Church ditto, with a certain feeling for the people such as befitted the "upper classes."

It was part of his belonging to his time that Tennyson was not without understanding of the Catholic Church. He was near enough to the golden influence of John Henry Newman to be more or less free of the murky suspicions which still befog the intelligence of the English middle-class Protestant or befogged it but lately. Catholicism was nearer to him than Dissent, that abhorred thing to the old-fashioned English Churchman. Doubtless he affected the opinion of the many who read him in his hey-day as few poets have affected public opinion. He was not out of their reach as greater poets might have been. I believe that when he ceased to be a living influence to the middle-class households of England, it was easier for the clouds and suspicions of the extreme Low Church, expressed in that strange creature, the "escaped monk" or "nun," to descend upon the minds of people living out of the world, within close and narrow borders. That strange survival will doubtless disappear after the war, which many people believe will make England Catholic once more.

My own knowledge of the narrowness and prejudice to be found in English country places and towns makes me respectful to the men who dared, as Tennyson did, to make piteous and not detestable the character of "Bloody Mary." He would have objected to "dared." The idol of the English middle-classes, a toppling eminence which he shared with Queen Victoria and Mr. Gladstone, he dictated to his readers, not truckled to them. "The Idylls of the King" must have done something to familiarize English Protestants with the Catholic view of the Blessed Sacrament, as with the Catholic view of nuns and convents. He was sympathetic to the Catholic view; and his reading of Mary Tudor's character, so different from the conventional view of the class who read him, showed a mind in advance of his time, as well as an imagination capable of piercing the crusts of prejudice and tradition. To be sure, he kept the hatred of the Spaniard, which was the best weapon of the Reformation in England, so his picture of Philip is entirely the Protestant conventional one, very different from the Philip of later historians, grave, noble, and dignified, upon whom English hatred fell in a storm of insult. "Queen Mary" is a Protestant play, but not so Protestant that his picture of the unhappy Queen is not a most moving one.

> "Thou knowest never woman meant so well
> And fared so ill in this disastrous world."

Equally unconventional is the poet's view of "Good Queen Bess." Her meanness, her lightness, her treachery are well delineated.

Then again in "Becket," the keynote of the Archbishop's character is given in the scene where the poor come to him for protection against the King and the proud lords. A poor man comes in with his dog and shows his plight to Becket. The King's verdurers had found the dog hunting in the Royal Forest and had cut off his paws.

> Poor beast! Poor beast!
> They who would hurt a dog would hurt a child;
> They are too bloody.

This is no proud prelate in arms against the King, but the pitiful shepherd who would throw the cloak of the Church over the oppressed and the small. "St. Agnes Eve," "Sir Galahad," with many of the "Idylls," are also full of the Catholic spirit; and the vision of the Holy Grail is quite Eucharistic; no cold commemoration, but a Sacrament.

KATHARINE TYNAN.

Lords in Exile

So let us walk among these sordid ways
As lords in exile, who, with fortunes low,
Carry remembrance still of splendid days,
And cannot bring a gracious palm to know
The stinting ways of thrift; their lofty gaze,
Ignoring both the squalor and the show,
Beyond the alien hills sees banners blaze,
And, listening, they still hear trumpets blow.

Us also high emprise shall teach disdain
Of hireling service and of base concern
Till we our ancient heritage regain,
Till to our rightful country we return;
Like him of Florence whom ill fortune chose,
Whose feet knew hell, whose eyes the Mystic Rose.

REVIEWS

Italy, Medieval and Modern: A History. By E. M. JAMISON, C. M. ADY, K. D. VERNON and C. SANFORD TERRY. New York: Oxford University Press. $2.90.

As this volume is an excellent specimen of what passes nowadays among non-Catholic Englishmen for a history of Italy, perhaps the reviewer can discharge his office best simply by pointing out a few of the book's numerous blemishes. In the authors' familiar cant about the Inquisition, for example, when speaking of the travels of Englishmen in Italy during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, nothing is said about the fact that no foreign Catholic could have journeyed with equal freedom in England. Then, too, Giordano Bruno's eccentric career and character are not described, for, as usual, he must be made a martyr of free thought and speculation Frequent references are made to Venice as the protector of science, but nothing is said about the Popes' patronage of learning, for the exigencies of the thesis, "The deadening influence of the Church," compel the authors to do but scant justice to the marvelous achievements of Italian genius in the field of science. Indeed, the volume gives many signs of the English Protestant's inability to see anything good in the Papacy. The authors display curious ideas of church reform. Apparently they would have the Church assume toward the State that helpless sycophantic attitude which characterizes the Establishment. As a writer in the Athenaeum once observed: At the Reformation the Anglican Church said to the civil authority: "Make me as one of thy hired servants," and she was immediately taken at her word. Is that the way the Catholic Church should be "reformed"?

As was to be expected, the authors share the amusing faith in the plebiscites organized by Cavour and his kind that is found in most non-Catholic writers on Italy. Great reticence is used, however, in describing the careers of Cavour, Mazzini, and Garibaldi, lest the reader learn too much about these torchbearers of liberty. Though the Jesuits find no place in the book's index there are references to their maneuvers scattered through the volume, all evincing a close acquaintance with the ordinary sources of misinformation about them. Then what an unceasing bugbear to the authors "clerical privilege" is! But with true British inconsistency abuses and customs are condemned in Italy which were merrily indulged in at the same period by the English satraps of Ireland. Indeed, what Matthew Arnold once remarked about the "average Englishman's inaccessibility to ideas" is strikingly illustrated throughout this book, whenever the Pope or the Papacy is the authors' theme.

Chemical Discovery and Invention in the Twentieth Century. By SIR WILLIAM TILDEN. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $3.50.

In this volume one of the world's foremost chemists gives us out of his rich store of knowledge and his ripe experience as an investigator the story of the marvels wrought by the systematic study of chemical phenomena. The book is divided into four parts. Being himself a research chemist, Professor Tilden naturally treats of laboratories and the work done in them, in the first part, weaving into it an interesting account of the various chemical schools throughout the world and the apparatus designed to accomplish the special work of each. The second section deals with modern discoveries and theories, and is somewhat technical in tone, but furnishes a basis for understanding the practical application of these theories to industrial production, which forms the subject-matter of the third section of the book. The fourth and last section is taken up with modern progress in organic chemistry. The book is profusely illustrated with half-tone photographs of industrial plants and chemical laboratories.

This book will prove profitable and pleasant even to the general reader, despite the profusion of organic formulae and the necessarily frequent use of technical terms. For its four hundred and eighty-one pages teem with interesting information about things we meet everywhere in our daily life and reading, and, better still, there is a scientific explanation of them which, if not "popular," has the merit of being clear and up-to-date. Besides, there is a saneness of judgment shown in distinguishing between facts and theories, and, at times, sound views, showing the inadequacy of the conclusions drawn by some biologists from the data of organic chemistry to bolster up their unjustifiable derivation of life from non-living matter. The book can be heartily recommended to scientific readers as a master's exposition of the present state of chemical science, especially from the organic viewpoint. G. L. C.

The author of this charming book, which is written in the Graysonian manner, tells all about how Helen McGill, a merry maiden of forty, having baked, during the space of fifteen years, 6,000 loaves of bread for her "liter'y" brother Andrew, who would "hang over the pigpen noting down adjectives for the sunset instead of mending the weather-vane," and how she was suddenly inspired to buy from the amiable Mr. Mifflin his "Travelling Parnassus," a bookstore on wheels, and how she began forthwith to have adventures and a romance. The book is full of whimsical humor and sage observations on men and books. Brooklyn folk who are discontented with their lot should read Mr. Mifflin's comforting reflections on the beatitude of Brooklynites, and lone, lorn women will be interested to learn just what Helen said to frighten the tramps away. Here are some of the good things the author has about books and reading:

> When you sell a man a book you don't sell him just twelve ounces of paper and ink and glue—you sell him a whole new life. Love and friendship and humor and ships at sea by night—there's all heaven and earth in a book, a real book, I mean. . . . What the people need is the good, homely, honest stuff—something that'll stick to their ribs—make them laugh and tremble and feel sick to think of the littleness of this popcorn ball spinning in space without ever even getting a hot-box. And something that'll spur 'em on to keep the hearth well swept and the wood pile split into kindling and the dishes washed and dried and put away. Any one who can get the country people to read something worth while is doing his nation a real service. . . . No creature on earth has a right to think himself a human being if he doesn't know at least one good book. . . . A good book ought to have something simple about it. And, like Eve, it ought to come from somewhere near the third rib: there ought to be a heart beating in it. A story that is all forehead doesn't amount to much.

After Helen had listened for several days to wisdom like the foregoing from Mr. Mifflin, it is small wonder that she was easily persuaded to enjoy his exclusive society for good.

A Naturalist of Souls. Studies in Psychography. By GAMALIEL BRADFORD. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $2.50.

Mr. Bradford defines psychography, "the condensed, essential, artistic presentation of character." For the art thus understood he seems to have special aptitudes. In every one of the "psychographs" with which he here presents us, he is interesting and stimulating. He seizes upon what is distinctive in the personage he studies and gives the right atmosphere and coloring. He is as a rule judicious and balanced in his verdicts, frames them with good taste, is alive to moral values and upholds the best standards. It is a pleasure to read such a sympathetic study of the gentle St. Francis de Sales in the last psychograph, "The Portrait of a Saint." The pessimism of Leopardi does not please our author, for he holds that there can be some happiness in the world. He discourses pleasantly on "An Odd Sort of Popular Book," Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy," is interested in the old classics and at home enough with them to write of the "Letters of a Roman Gentleman," Pliny, and of "Ovid among the Goths."

The title of the book, "A Naturalist of Souls" is a reminiscence from the pages of the great French critic, Sainte-Beuve, who applied the expression to himself, thus giving a true definition of his methods and his aims. Mr. Bradford has the knack of "herborizing" and analyzing. Literature would become more popular were it vitalized and made more attractive by the "psychographic" method, which Mr. Bradford does not pretend to have invented, but the value of which he has perceived and which he skilfully employs. Early Philadelphia. Its People, Life and Progress. With 120 Illustrations. By HORACE MATHER LIPPINCOTT. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company. $6.00.

We have not many "old" places with histories and traditions in this land of hurry and today. Of these few Philadelphia is certainly one of the most interesting. It is supposed to have retained more of its original character than any other of our cities, and the aim of the author was to bring together in this book "many fragmentary and scattered accounts of important and peculiar customs and institutions which live in Philadelphia today serving as useful a purpose in the complexity of modern life as they did when they started." He has succeeded in compiling a most entertaining survey of social, political, literary and economic conditions in the old city. "Philadelphia," he tells us, "was undertaken as a 'Holy Experiment,' therefore an understanding of its building, its customs and its institutions necessarily requires that much be said about religion." In this "much" however, there is only one page devoted to the Catholics of the community, a mere mention of the toleration they experienced, and of the building of St. Joseph's and St. Mary's by Fathers Greaton and Harding. Two fine pictures of quaint old St. Joseph's in Willing's Alley, and one of St. Mary's are included in the many page illustrations that make the volume a joy. Those who complain of the present high cost of living might find some comfort in the information it gives that in June, 1779, although Philadelphia has always boasted of her markets, a peck of green peas cost $38.00; a pound of butter $7.00; sugar, $20.00; coffee, $8.00; a pair of shoes $120.00. But this was in "Continental money" and the "dollar of the daddies" suffered a heavy discount even over the counters of the most patriotic merchants. T. F. M.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

This year's edition of "AMERICA in the Classroom," an attractive pamphlet prepared by the America Press for free distribution among Catholic educational institutions, is quite different from the booklet bearing that title which was issued last year. For the teachers or students of such representative colleges or schools as St. Ignatius College, Cleveland, St. John's College, Brooklyn, St. Teresa's College, Winona, Trinity College, Washington, Villa Angela, Cleveland, Ursuline Academy, Wilmington, and St. Philip's High School, Chicago, have written letters describing how they use the "National Catholic Weekly" to enliven and make practical the English, history or philosophy class. The pamphlet is illustrated with half a dozen photographs of young people joyfully reading AMERICA.

In the Catholic Mind for October 8 is printed the pamphlet Father George L. Waring, U. S. A., prepared for the War Department on "The Chaplain's Duties." All who have friends or relatives in the army should find very interesting what this experienced priest says about the importance of the troops being provided with zealous and efficient chaplains. The second paper in the number is the inspiriting address, "What Fight Ye For?" which the Rt. Rev. James E. Cassidy, V. G., delivered to the 12th Company, Mass., Coast Artillery, N. G., at St. Mary's Cathedral, Fall River, Mass., July 27, 1917, on the eve of the company's departure for Fort Banks, Mass. He shows that all Americans, whatever their ancestry may be, should enter whole-heartedly into the present war in order to vindicate our national honor and to hasten the return of peace. He ends with the solemn warning: "The soldier or sailor that goes out and wallows in impurity . . . is not only false to God, who has said, 'Thou shalt not,' but he is false to his country, who says to him, 'Give me the best that thou hast.'"

The most noteworthy contribution to the September Month is "No Account," John Ayscough's excellent story about a hitherto worthless British soldier who was inspired by the sight of a wayside crucifix to perform an act of the highest self-sacrifice. An interesting page in the "Miscellanea II" is a notice of a pamphlet called "No Small Stir," written by "Diplomaticus," an Anglican layman, who proves that throughout the war the Pope "has been taking the only course possible to one whose Divinely appointed office is that of a Father of the whole of Christendom." The pamphlet ends with the admission: "If the call to reunion is to come in our days, it can only come from the principium unitatis, the Guardian of the Vine. . . . We wait for the voice from the tomb of Peter and Paul. Amid our unhappy divisions, East and West—our appeal is still to the Primatial See."

According to the Bookman's list the six best-selling novels of August were: "The Red Planet," "Mr. Britling Sees It Through," "The Light in the Clearing," "Bab: A Sub-Deb," "The Definite Object," and "Martie, the Unconquered." All of them have been noticed in these columns.——"Oliver Hastings, V. C." (Dutton, $1.50), by Escott Lynn, is a sequel to "In Khaki for the King." There is scarcely an adventure possible in modern warfare that is not experienced by the two young heroes, Oliver Hastings and Vivian Drummond, before they receive the V. C. and the D. S. O. from the hands of the King. After an encounter with spies in England and another in Flanders, they take an important part in the capture of Loos. Sent from there to Greece and through Serbia, they meet Lord Kitchener and Sir Douglas Haig, are present at the retreat from Gallipoli, and return in time for the defense of Verdun. The book contains much useful information about the life of a soldier at the front.

"Long Live the King," by Mary Roberts Rinehart (Houghton Mifflin, $1.50), is an entertaining story of plot and intrigue, centering round the person of the Crown Prince of an unnamed monarchy. The tale covers a year, more or less, of the boy's life and gives a very realistic picture of the boredom to which royalty and especially youthful royalty is subjected. His affection for a real American boy, his conviction that if his real state were known it would make him an object of scorn in the latter's eyes, and his longing for the adventurous freedom that makes up the gold of life are well treated. There is a good deal of individuality in the character-painting, a thread of romance gives warmth to the story, a grim old chancellor and a lonely old king strike a strong contrast with the boy, who though far from being a "Bab," is a fine little fellow, very human, in spite of his regal handicaps.——George Barr McCutcheon had added to his very long list of novels another story called "Green Fancy" (Dodd, Mead, $1.50), in which are related the usual hairbreadth escapes of a beautiful maiden, rescued from deep-dyed villains by a handsome hero, who falls in love with her at first sight, risks all to save her life and fortune, and marries her in the end to the satisfaction of author and reader.——"Finished" (Longmans, $1.40), by H. Rider Haggard, is a continuation of the adventures of Allan Quatermain. It is permeated with the occultism of South African magic. Thrilling adventures of course abound; but the strength of the book is not so much in its action, or in its vivid impressions of native life, as in its delineation of the character of an ancient wizard, Zikali by name, who casts an uncanny spell over every page. Naturally the book is filled with false philosophy of heathendom, but is very clever in its way.

The contents of Extension for October make the descriptive title "The Catholic Achievements Number" well deserved. Among the notable authors and articles to be found in the magazine are "Catholic Achievements in Architecture," by John T. Comes. "Science Before the Reformation," by James J. Walsh. "In the Field of Discovery," by Martin S. Brennan. "The Pillar of Law and Government," by Joseph Scott. "The Sustaining Props of Society," by Thomas F. Coakley. "The Catholic Element in Literature," by Katherine Brégy, and "The Sanctuary—the Birthplace of Music," by William J. Finn. Among the more notable papers in the October Catholic World, are Margaret B. Downing's sketch of "Edward Lee Greene," the eminent American Catholic botanist who died two years ago, an article by Julian E. Johnstone on "The Classical Element in Shakespeare" which is rich in erudition, "The Apple of Discord," the title of Clio Mamer's examination of the present crisis in Canada and Joseph V. McKee's review of Catholicism's share in early American history.

The clever artistry and general "creepiness" of "The Coming of the Terror," the story with which Arthur Machen opens the October Century, makes it one of the most remarkable tales the present war has inspired. The story turns on a revolt of the lower animals against mankind. "The fury of the whole world at war, the great passion of death that seems driving all humanity to destruction," spreads to beasts, birds and insects, and they rise in successful rebellion against their former sovereign, who has been acting more like an irrational animal than a spiritual being. Other excellent contributions that help to make this month's Century a very readable number are Arthur Gleason's discerning study of "The Irishman," Major Wood's sketch of Lord Northcliffe's personality, and S. K. Ratcliffe's paper on "The English Intellectuals in War-Time." The following fragment from Ruth Comfort Mitchell's "A Letter" ought to call forth a prayer for peace from every Christian heart:

A thousand field-pieces shortly to roar
Death and destruction on a distant shore.

Shells by the million. Every one will soon
Be shrilly caroling its cold blue tune.

But something quivers in the air
As the dark days drag by.
"Oh, little town of Bethlehem,
How still we see thee lie!"

"Thursdays with the Blessed Sacrament" (Benziger, $0.75), by the Rev. C. McNeiry, is one of the most charming contributions to devotional literature that has appeared for some time. Father McNeiry's pages lack the literary finish of the exquisite "essays in little" of the late Father Russell and make no pretense to the wealth of Scriptural erudition which characterizes Mother Loyola's meditations, but they are full of a devotion as real as it is contagious. Possibly the present volume is not directly adapted to First Communicants, but it contains numerous stories which, heard from the lips of parents or teachers, will stir young hearts to a deeper love of Our Eucharistic Saviour. If the Church can bring the growing generation to Christ, she may look with confidence for the speedy inauguration of the Kingdom of God upon earth; and against the vices that scourge our civilization there can be no more powerful remedy than the Blessed Eucharist. Perhaps the excellent "Practice" counselled on page 194: "Receive Holy Communion frequently," and its explanation, "weekly or oftener" may appear to some an understatement of the Church's desire that "all Christians should make this Eucharistic Bread their daily food." Who more worthy than children are?——In "Our Refuge," a Practical Course of Instructions on the most Holy Eucharist (Herder, $0.60), Father Augustine Sprigler gives detailed directions regarding the manner of receiving Holy Communion, methods of assisting at Mass, the way to prepare for the priest's coming with the Viaticum and the manner of making a thanksgiving after receiving: things all our Catholic people should know, but perhaps do not.

Here is a batch of little books and pamphlets that the Catholic chaplain may find useful for his soldiers. Major De Witt Clinton Falls, N. G. N. Y., has prepared a 192-page book called "Army and Navy Information, Uniforms, Organization, Arms and Equipment of the Warring Powers" (Dutton, $1.00), which seems very complete and is fully illustrated.——John Gallishaw and William Lynch have written "The Man in the Ranks" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.00), which is well described as "a book of sound practical advice for every new recruit who wants to lessen his hardships and become quickly an efficient soldier."——Another little volume somewhat similar in its scope is "The Soldiers' Diary and Note Book, Containing Useful Information Invaluable to the Soldier at Home or at the Front" (Thomas Y. Crowell, $0.50).——Father Lasance's excellent prayer book, "The Manna of the Soul" (Benziger, $0.60 and $1.50) has been reprinted both in a large-type edition and in a convenient "vest-pocket" form.——Ernest Perrin has ready a little book of "Hospital French" (Dutton, $0.25).——"A Way of the Cross," by H. B. Altmeyer, of Wheeling, "A Cathechism of Christian Doctrine," published by E. M. Lohmann Co., of St. Paul, and the Rev. Dr. Thomas F. Coakley's "Inside Facts About the Catholic Church" (Catholic Truth Society, Pittsburgh, $0.10), a remarkably well-stocked pamphlet of seventy-one pages, which searchers after truth will find very enlightening reading, are three booklets the chaplain can put to a good use.

The new edition of W. M. Letts' "Hallowe'en and Poems of the War," a book which was praised in our issue of June 16 last, is entitled from the finest poem in the volume, "The Spires of Oxford" (Dutton, $1.25). Several fresh poems are added, the best of which is "The Rebel." The following description, called "Chaplain to the Forces," of course is true of no one but a Catholic priest:

Ambassador of Christ you go
  Up to the very gates of hell,
  Through fog of powder, storm of shell,
To speak your Master's message: "Lo,
  The Prince of Peace is with you still,
  His peace be with you, His good-will."

It is not small, your priesthood's price,
  To be a man and yet stand by,
  To hold your life whilst others die,
To bless, not share the sacrifice,
  To watch the strife and take no part—
  You with the fire at your heart. . . .

In the pale gleam of new-born day
  Apart in some tree-shadowed place,
  Your altar but a packing case,
Rude as the shed where Mary lay,
  Your sanctuary the rain-drenched sod
  You bring the kneeling soldier, God.

As sentinel you guard the gate
  'Twixt life and death, and unto death
  Speed the brave soul whose failing breath
Shudders not at the grip of Fate,
  But answers, gallant to the end,
  "Christ is the Word—and I His friend." . . .

EDUCATION

A Catholic Night School

EIGHT years ago the Young Men's Catholic Association of Boston announced the opening of a night school for its members. The foundation of the school marked the beginning of a great experiment. Many older members, while anxious for success, were decidedly pessimistic; others doubted the possibility of conducting under Catholic auspices purely secular courses, already given in more than one well-equipped and well-endowed institution. Time has answered these objections. The excellently attended courses in philosophy, the lectures in the classes of social service, the courses in pedagogy, and the classes in Christian apologetics opened this year, show that the school answers a real need. It should be noted that no attempt has been made to establish scientific or technical studies that require costly instruments and elaborate equipment.

Largest in New England

IN courses presented, as compared with other institutions following the same or a similar plan, the school is the largest in New England. It outnumbers the registration of the University Extension and of the Extension Correspondence Courses under the supervision of the State Board of Education. At a meeting of the Committee on University Extension last spring, when Dr. Harry A. Garfield asked the Boston College representative for a description of the school and its work, surprise was expressed by all at the very large number of students in attendance. From an initial registration of sixty-five men in 1910-11, numbers have steadily increased until in the year 1916-17 the enrollment was 1,799. In the forty courses offered, the registration of men is almost double that of women. Classes were opened for women in 1911, and in that year they slightly outnumbered the men, but with the growing success of the practical courses, particularly of those in civil service, the pendulum has swung in the other direction. A glance at the registration blanks will show how interest has spread beyond the limits of the city proper. Students are in attendance from ninety-six cities and towns, some of them more than forty miles from Boston.

Fees and Courses

ORIGINALLY it had been the intention to restrict the courses to members of the Association, and to give them without charge. As the work was understood to be one of practical charity, volunteer teachers were secured. This was satisfactory as long as the courses were few and membership small, but by 1912 the numbers had increased so unexpectedly, and the courses in demand were so varied, that it was decided to place the school upon a sound financial basis. Expert teachers were therefore engaged, and remunerated for their services on the scale generally observed by night schools in New England. Tuition fees, payable in advance, are now arranged for all courses, the amount varying according to the expense of the particular course. Exceptions are made for worthy students, and where circumstances justify, instruction is given gratis. Experience has shown that this system, which remunerates teachers for professional services much in demand elsewhere, secures a consistently high standard of teaching. Two years ago a three-year course in accountancy was established. After much hesitation, and in the face of prophecies of failure, the tuition was fixed at sixty dollars. Thirty students applied in the first week, and ever since the class has maintained an average of sixty. The successful candidates in the examinations for the degree of certified public accountant cannot be known until next spring, but the demand for expert accountants in the Federal service has already supplied many members of the class with responsible and well-paying positions.

The courses now offered are forty in number. Business courses in all branches, including commercial law, enroll 485 students; civil service, 535; social service, 125; cultural courses, including modern languages, literature and composition, with two courses in philosophy, 375; recently added courses in "first aid" and home nursing, with clinical practice in near-by hospitals, 225. The courses in pedagogy, to be resumed this year, had in 1915-16 a registration of 200 students. By arrangement with the School Board, the certificates awarded for successful completion of this course are recognized as important factors in the promotional examination of teachers. Although no system has as yet been devised of determining success in each particular case, in many instances it is made plain beyond doubt. The students themselves are well satisfied. Applicants for the school often offer as references the names of former pupils who have urged them to seek the advantages they themselves have profited by. It may be well, however, to cite a few particular instances of success that have come to hand.

On the death of the steward of a certain State institution the position was filled temporarily by the assistant, a man fifty-two years of age, with a family of five children. After a year his position was thrown open by the Civil Service Commission to applicants throughout the State. This man sought the services of the Association Night School, and in eight weeks, through special assistance, passed the examination first on the list and was immediately confirmed in his position.

Results of the School

IN the last post-office examinations, forty-three men from the school won places in the first one hundred. Three thousand men were examined. One young man, eleventh on the list in the post-office examination, was at the time earning forty dollars a month in the State Department, but not under civil service. He showed his notice of temporary employment to his chief and was offered $75 a month to remain in the State Department, which he accepted, meanwhile continuing on the list at the post-office, awaiting permanent employment. Two years ago an examination was held for supervisor of visitors under the State Charities Board, the highest paid position for women in the State. The place was won by one of the students. On the visitors' list, thirty-two of the first forty-four places have been filled from the school, and nearly every visitor appointed for the past two years was trained here. Before this time it was almost impossible for a Catholic to obtain these or similar positions, through lack of knowledge of the examination requirements.

It will be evident that a school of this description becomes also in a true sense a great bureau of employment, placing its students without cost to themselves in positions of good promise, and assisting them through self-improvement to rise in their chosen field of work. The work has passed far beyond the experimental stage. The Night School is now a well-regulated educational institution offering to Catholics and others who wish to enjoy its advantages solid instruction in all the courses it has undertaken.

SOCIOLOGY

Caring for the Child

ONE who loved and was loved by children, James Whitcomb Riley, has written that his happiest moments with them were always touched with sorrow. I think that every man who has lived long enough in this drab world to have been brought face to face with evil, must share that sorrow. So free from sin in their baptismal innocence, with no manner of guile about them, as St. Chrysostom says, these little ones whose angels always look upon the face of Our Father in heaven, are a sodden earth's most precious possession. No doubt the secret of the charm that makes effective appeal to every heart not utterly spoiled, is their complete unworldliness. In a world mad for self-aggrandizement, with Scriptural literalness they take no thought for the morrow, but slip innocent hands into hands that have perhaps been stained, and confidently turn to us for the love and protection as necessary to their tender nature as dew and sunshine to spring roses.

No one, I suppose, looks into the eyes of a child without repeating poor pagan Heine's prayer that God may keep the little soul forever fair and beautiful. There is melancholy in the very prayer, for the apprehension of what Wordsworth calls "the coming years that bring the inevitable yoke" makes the moment sorrowful. Evil seems so linked with age, that at the burial of a child, the Church bids her ministers rejoice, not because hearts are sore, but because another innocent, saved from the world's contaminating touch, now laughs in the nurseries of heaven.

The Response of the Church

IN full response to the Heart of Christ, the Divine Lover of children, the Church has always guarded with solicitude the welfare of the lambs of the flock. This solicitude appears, first of all, in her unwavering defense of the sanctity of marriage, and in her earnest desire that every home should become the child's sanctuary of virtue. No doubt, many of the various societies for the promotion of child-welfare, exercising great influence in this country and abroad, deserve praise for what they have accomplished, and sincere cooperation in what they still plan to do to make the world a better place for children to live in. Certainly, to rail against organizations which propose by legitimate means to remove children from the factories; to secure for them, in the breakdown of parental authority, at least a minimum of education, and to remove those conditions which in our great cities menace the health and proper development of the young, is no mark of a student well acquainted with Catholic social thought and practice. From time to time these activities may seem urged beyond due measure; yet all who recall such passages as the arraignment of child-labor in the Encyclical of Leo XIII, "The Condition of the Working Classes," while condemning the exaggeration occasionally apparent in these movements, will approve their general purpose.

On the other hand, it is foolish to talk about the best manner of caring for a child if, as an American publicist has pointed out, there is no child to care for. First catch your hare, then cook him. A non-existent child may be pleasant in the contemplation of nervous folk, but as the subject of experimentation for the purposes of improvement he is, in the phrase of the day, "considerably absent." Hence it does not seem excessive to affirm, that the force which today does most to help the child, and at the same time to keep society morally clean, is the doctrine of the Catholic Church on marriage and the sanctity of the domestic hearth. Without that doctrine, consistently and persistently taught and enforced, the most far-reaching plans of social reformers are as idle as the crackling of thorns.

The Christian Home

THANKS be to God, outside the Catholic Church there are thousands of American homes in which night after night some good woman teaches the little ones at her knee to lisp their childish prayers to their Father in Heaven; homes to which these children in after days of weariness and disillusionment will look back for inspiration and new courage, in the unending fight for the things in life that are pure and wholesome. These are the homes which hold the marriage vows as solemn obligations, not as mere articles of confederation, lightly assumed and to be revised or broken at the dictate of expediency or convenience. In these nurseries of brave men and pure women, the old familiar Catholic doctrines anathematizing divorce, and making marriage a sacred thing, have withstood the degrading influences which the loose teaching and looser practice of sixteenth-century rebels against the Church made popular, and to some minds, even laudable. Homes such as these survive only with the survival of Catholic teaching in hearts which have rejected all other tenets of the "old Faith." Without knowing it, in this point at least, men and women come close to Catholicism, and thereby their homes are rendered social forces of incalculable value. As one by no means in sympathy with Catholic ideals, Dr. Mangold, has lately written: "We do not solve the problem . . . by ministering to the needs of unhappy children. It is only as we ennoble and perfect the home that a permanent solution will be reached." Statute law can do something to protect the home, and a faithful observance of the natural law can do far more; but poorly guarded is that domestic society which is a stranger to the sanctity set by Christ our Redeemer as the bulwark both of the home and of the State.

> From such marriages as these the State may rightly expect a race of citizens animated by a good spirit, and filled with reverence and love for God, recognizing it as their duty to obey those who rule justly and lawfully, to love all, and to injure no one. These many and glorious fruits were ever the product of marriage as long as it retained those gifts of holiness, unity and indissolubility. . . . (Encyclical of Leo XIII, "Christian Marriage").

These words clearly indicate the tremendous value to society of the teaching and constant practice of the Catholic Church on marriage.

The Christian School

THAT marriage with all its obligations be held sacred, is fundamental to the welfare of civil and domestic society. But the Church does not stop here; in her solicitude for the child she puts at the disposal of Catholic parents an agency of great force in aiding them to fulfil their duties toward their offspring. First impressions are deep, and the Church knows that in the early years the plastic mind of the child is easily turned to good or evil. She would have no element, therefore, which touches the life of the child, wholly dissociated from Almighty God, and from this persuasion flows her abiding interest in education. She insists upon the child's complete development, for she knows his capabilities. He is no mere machine, no high-bred animal, but a being made in the image of God, whose destiny is God. The Church rejects nothing that can prove its claim to a place in education. She is interested in the child's physical health, in the training of his memory, the strengthening of his will, the sharpening of his intelligence; and bringing all these to the highest point of culture, she would make them help the individual in the attainment of the purpose for which he was sent into the world. Experience shows what psychology has demonstrated, that purely secular knowledge, imparted without reference to man's highest and most spiritual needs, only serves to open the gates of the soul to evil. "Education," wrote Comte de Mun many years ago, "is the first of all social works." True, but the Church's great defender was pleading for education in schools which recognize the right of Almighty God to the first place in the heart of the child.

Thus understood, it will hardly be denied that for work which is not only preventive, but in the highest sense constructive, no child-welfare agency can for a moment be compared to the American Catholic school system.

Remedial Work

NEVERTHELESS, in spite of the unceasing efforts of the Church to safeguard the family and the right of the child to a Christian education, the malice or weakness of the few will always make remedial work a practical necessity. With tears of blood must every Catholic, aware of the malign forces operating in our large centers of population, bewail the ravaging of the lambs of the flock, and the shocking indifference with which many, who could devote their means or their personal services, or both, to their protection, look upon this loss to the State of useful citizens, and to Heaven of immortal souls. Every city that has a Juvenile Court should have its staff of Catholic probation officers, men and women whose technical skill is equal to their common-sense and to their devotion, and who are properly compensated for their services. For day by day the voice of weeping is heard in Rama, Rachel mourning her children and will not be comforted; and day by day must priests as well as social workers feel, if they do not repeat, those stinging words of the great-hearted Dickens:

> Lost, Your Excellency. Lost, Associations and Societies. Lost, Right Reverends and Wrong Reverends of every order. Lost, Reformers and Lawmakers, born with heavenly compassion in your hearts, but with the reverence of money in your souls. And lost thus around us every day.
> The blood of these lost ones cries to Heaven, and God will require their lives at our sluggish hands.

"Blessed Are the Merciful"

BUT will the cry be heard in these dead ears of ours? There is in this great city an institution which for fifty years has cared for the babies that no one wants, the pitiful indictment of human depravity, weakness and sorrow, the abandoned babies of America's metropolis. For fifty years the officers of this institution have gone into places the very names of which would offend our polite sensibilities, and out of the gutters and ash-barrels have they picked up babies left there to die. Thousands of these poor little waifs have been nursed back to health, and today are useful citizens in many American communities. For thousands, the gates of Heaven have been opened by Baptism, and in their innocence, these little ones, scorned of the world and despised of all save a few gentle hearts, have gone to look upon the face of Christ. That institution is now in straits, and its very existence is threatened. Have the Catholics of this community come forward with their millions, or with their pennies, to endow this noble charity, to put it beyond the reach of carping, dishonest criticism and diabolical persecution?

If they have, the onrush has been so secret that not even the institution itself is aware of any accretion to its forces from without. "The daughter of my people is cruel, like the ostrich in the desert. The tongue of the suckling child hath stuck to the roof of his mouth for thirst: the little ones have asked for bread, and there was none to break it unto them." May God bring us to a sense of the dissonance in our prayers that ask His mercy while our hearts are closed to the cry of abandoned babies in the streets of the city.

NOTE AND COMMENT

A Serious Dearth of Nurses

ACCORDING to the Nurse, the attention of the country is being called by medical and nursing journals to a widespread dearth of nurses. Besides the drain caused by the Army Nursing Corps and the Red Cross base hospitals we must likewise take into consideration the withdrawal from private service of the 6,000 nurses engaged in public health nursing or welfare work. There is no possibility of meeting this shortage in the normal way since the output of hospital nurses cannot be increased except after three years of training, unless hospital classes are graduated before the expiration of their term.

> The organized nursing bodies of the country have done nothing to meet the dearth of nurses, which will inevitably increase as the war continues. Hospital and nursing organizations for years have discussed the problem of providing a secondary class of nurses by a method less exacting and briefer than the hospital's training, nurses whose wage rate would be less burdensome upon the patient than the rate justly asked by their more highly trained sisters. But so far the campaign has been one of discussion only, nothing has actually been done. And now the country finds itself confronted by a shortage of nurses which the hospitals and nursing organizations are powerless to meet and is dependent upon non-hospital methods for equipping the many new recruits the nursing world must receive if the civilian sick and the soldiers are to receive adequate care.

The public, as the editor of the Nurse suggests, will be obliged to solve this problem in its own way by employing the best nurses it can find at hand, irrespective of the source of their knowledge and the extent of their training.

The Immortal Twenty

EVEN amid war's alarms the Westminster Gazette has had the courage to start among its readers the ancient pastime of selecting the "world's twenty greatest men." Lord Bryce's list included Lincoln, Washington, Pericles, Hannibal, Julius Cæsar, Emperor Augustus, Emperor Trajan, Pope Gregory VII, William the Conqueror, Sultan Saladin, Emperor Frederick II, Martin Luther, Loyola, Charles V, Richelieu, Cromwell, Napoleon, Mazzini, Bismarck, and Cavour. A roster of the world's great men which has no room for the names of St. Paul, St. Thomas Aquinas and Shakespeare, to mention no others, certainly seems very defective. The three names which close Lord Bryce's list could be sacrificed without a tear.

The National Passion for Amusement

THE war has evidently made no impression upon the national passion for sport and amusement. The president of the National Baseball League was quoted some time ago as saying:

> Ninety-nine per cent of the "fans" felt at the outset of the season that the entry of the United States into the European hostilities would reduce baseball receipts to a minimum. On the contrary many clubs of the National League have played to bigger crowds so far than in the same periods in 1915 and 1916.

The authority of the Chicago Tribune is given for the statement that the aggregate salaries of Mary Pickford, Charles Chaplin and Douglas Fairbanks are $3,000,000. No better argument could be offered to prove the constantly increasing demand for fun and amusement. The army itself is to be lavishly supplied with theaters at the expense of the nation.

Why a Foreigner and Catholic Discovered America

A CORRESPONDENT, in the Augusta Chronicle, pours forth his patriotic indignation over the fact that Columbus Day was chosen as flag raising day in that city. "Two-thirds of the people don't know what Columbus Day is and don't care to." To assuage the wounded feelings of the writer the editor of the Chronicle expresses his deep regret that so great a country as America should unfortunately have been discovered by a foreigner, and in particular by a Catholic. He confesses, however, that it is very difficult to see what can be done about the matter at this late day. For the benefit of the "two thirds" who "don't care to" know the meaning of Columbus Day, he explains that the native Americans were too busily engaged at the time in other pursuits, fishing, hunting and the like—to discover their own country, "so that it necessarily had to be left to a foreigner."

> To be sure it might have been far better if some one had arranged to have America discovered by a non-Catholic, but there were so few of these in the world at the time, that merely the law of averages gave us a Catholic discoverer. Besides there were no A. P. A.'s then in existence to vote against it.
> If we had insisted on waiting some forty or fifty years to have America discovered by a Protestant, he continues, there would still have been only Martin Luther and his few followers in Germany, and he fails entirely to see how that could have improved the matter. "So, there we are; and that's why it is Columbus Day, instead of Luther Day or some other day."

A New York Inquisition on Jew-Baiting

ROBERT P. GREEN, a New York school teacher, was recently brought to book because of the evidence furnished against him by a carefully collated list of "insults" towards Jewish pupils. His offenses extended over a course of seven years, and had all been duly recorded and committed to the watchful care of the Secretary of the Board of Education. In a letter to the American Jewish Chronicle, the Gentile culprit sets forth his case to the Jewish editor:

> When Michael Angelo carved out his "Moses" to adorn the new Church of St. Peter at Rome, he could not have foreseen how an obscure teacher in a New York school some four centuries later would be impaled on one of the horns of the masterpiece. Nor could he, nor any one else, have supposed that a local school board in the second city of the world would admit as proof of "gross misconduct" by a teacher of twenty years' service, the fact that the Jewish race and religion were insulted by the teacher's mention of this peculiarity of the great Italian's greatest work.

In 1916 a similar act of "gross misconduct" occurred when a boy named Schwartz was called "Schwartztrash," in a class discussion on the "poor whites" and "white trash" in Southern States. A year later this was magnified into an "insult" to the Jews. On March 17, of the same year, three pupils, one of whom was a Jew, secured a Jewish newspaper and a green ribbon.

> They tied the aforesaid paper with the aforesaid ribbon and laid it on the teacher's desk. On April 7 (not April 1) this incident had grown to the dimensions of a Jewish "insult" and was so taken by the grave and reverend members of the Local Board. The half foot of half-inch ribbon had like to expand into a rope for the teacher! Those who have read the State Trials in England will see how matters like green ribbons on Jewish papers could swell under proper care into hanging matters.

An even greater "insult" was inflicted when the New York World, on March 17, gave out maps of Ireland, showing the native places of the various Mac's and O's. "Boys brought the maps to the wicked teacher. All enjoyed finding familiar names on the map, and laughed incredulously when told that Cohan, Coan, Coen, and Leavy could be found among Irish families." This insufferable "insult" may be found faithfully recorded on page twenty of the fateful "Record." Another hanging matter occurred just before Christmas, 1915, when to a Jewish lad's "Happy Xmas" the teacher responded with "Happy Yontef." The victim of the "insult" cheerfully laughed at the allusion, "but under proper tutelage represented the matter on April 7 (not April 1) as an 'insult to his religion!'" In hardly any instance is there an answer by the teacher himself on record. The whole case resolves itself into a petty persecution not of the Jewish pupils but of the Gentile teacher:

> As all the Jewish matter is on a par with that narrated, Jewish dignity requires that it be all expunged. Those who put it in, or let it in as evidence, simply make a mocking of all that is Jewish. Like Haman, they should get the rope they destined for the teacher.

Jew-baiting is no more to be tolerated in our public schools than Pope-baiting; but to construe these innocent happenings into insults against religion is unpardonable tyranny, and the Jews themselves should be the first to see this.

Chronicle

The War.—On October 9 the British and French armies, acting in concert, renewed their attacks in Flanders east and northeast of Ypres. On a combined front of ten miles the German lines were driven back for a distance of from half a mile to two miles. More than 1,000 prisoners were taken by the British alone in the first day's fighting. The British completed the capture of Poelcapelle, advanced two miles beyond it, and struck forward on the Passchendaele Ridge to within 1,000 yards of the village of that name. The French crossed the flooded Broenbeek and Jansbeek rivers, stormed the villages of St. Jean de Mangelaere and Veldhoek and bit into the southern rim of the powerfully fortified Houtholst Forest, gaining a mile and a quarter on a front of about two miles. East of Broodseinde Haig's troops pushed down the slopes of the Hollebeke Ridge into the lowlands sweeping their lines northward where they met with a fierce resistance from the enemy in Daisy Wood. The Berlin War Office claims that the gains of the Allies were limited to the stretch of territory between Draibank and Poelcapelle on the northern part of the front and makes no mention of the gains claimed by the British commander north of Poelcapelle and the Passchendaele Ridge. Owing to the heavy rains and the almost impassable condition of the ground the fighting during the following days greatly decreased in intensity. Counter-attacks along the Ypres-Staden railway as well as northeast of Broodseinde were repulsed, but south of the railway the advanced British troops were driven back a short distance on a front of 2,000 yards, but have recovered much of this ground. Further gains were made by the British between the Ypres-Staden railway and Poelcapelle and between Poelcapelle and Wallemolen.

Bulletin, Oct. 8, p.m.-Oct. 15, a.m.

On October 12, the Germans landed detachments on the coast of the Bay of Tagelacht, on the north of Oesel Island, and near the village of Serro, on the southern part of Dagö Island. The German dreadnoughts silenced the Russian shore batteries and there was severe fighting between German landing-parties and the Russian garrison of Oesel Island. The capture of Dagö Island is of great strategic value to the German forces, as the island will serve as a base of operations against Reval, Kronstadt, the Russian right flank, and even Petrograd.

As a war emergency measure the United States Shipping Board has requisitioned all American ocean cargo and passenger-carrying vessels of over 2,500 tons. This action the Government deems necessary for the effective control and regulation of ocean freight rates and to enable it to secure prompt command of the ocean tonnage needed for war uses. It was forecasted on September 27 last when the Shipping Board officially stated the charter rates at which the vessels would be taken over. The Shipping Board on October 12 published the text of the official notification to the owners of all ships affected by the requisition order. American merchant vessels available for ocean traffic total slightly more than 2,000,000 tons. Some of them have been already taken over by the Government for the army and the navy. In most cases, except when required for actual Government service, the ships will be turned back to their owners for operation on Government account, and will be subject at all times to the dispositions laid down by the Shipping Board. The ships affected by the order are listed as follows in the official statement given out by Commissioner Bainbridge Colby:

The Shipping Board's Requisition Order

1. (a) All cargo ships able to carry not less than 2,500 tons total deadweight, including bunkers, water and stores. (b) All passenger steamers of not less than 2,500 tons gross register.

2. (a) As to all steamers in or bound to American ports on October 15, 1917, requisition becomes effective after discharge of inward cargo and ship is put in ordinary good condition. (b) As to steamers which have started to load their outward cargo, requisition becomes effective at noon on October 15, 1917, and accounts as to hire and expenses will be adjusted from time steamers began to load.

3. Steamers trading to and from American ports that have sailed on their voyage prior to October 15, 1917, at noon, are to complete that voyage as promptly as possible and report for requisitioning.

4. Steamers that are occupied in trades between foreign ports shall be requisitioned as of October 15, 1917, at noon, and accounts adjusted accordingly.

5. (a) Owners whose steamers are operating in their regular trades are to continue the operation of their steamers for account of the Government as they have been doing for themselves until they receive further instructions. (b) Owners whose steamers are chartered to others will apply to the Shipping Board for instructions regarding the future employment of said steamers.

By its requisition order the Shipping Board does not intend to interfere with legitimate ocean traffic, but to maintain supervision over all American tonnage for the purpose of using ships for the best war advantage and for the regulation of tariffs which are now in many cases prohibitive. One of the reasons actuating the Board in its determination to control freight rates is reported to be the fear that after the war American commerce will suffer in Latin America because of the high prices now prevalent. Before the war Germany had practically monopolized all Central and South American markets. After the war she will in all probability regain control of this vast trade unless the people of Latin America can be persuaded now that they can procure goods from the United States at reasonable prices.

On October 10 the President issued a proclamation defining the terms under which the Food Administration, after November 1, will control the manufacture, storage, importation and distribution of practically all the essential foodstuffs. In it he gives warning that any person, firm, corporation or association violating the regulations laid down will be subjected to the penalties provided for in the Food Control bill. All the great packing and wholesale concerns which have been accused of controlling the market in the food staples are included in the licensing system created by the proclamation. But packers and distributors of beef, pork, and mutton whose gross sales do not exceed $100,000 a year, and the operators of poultry and egg-packing plants whose sales do not exceed $50,000 a year are exempted from the regulation. The Food Administration exempts these, it is understood, because it believes that their operations do not affect the general trade.

The Food License System

The regulations do not affect gardeners, cooperative associations of gardeners, farmers, including livestock farmers, or any other persons, with regard to the products of any farm or any other land owned or leased by them. All these exemptions were made by Congress. Already Food Administrator Hoover has set in motion the machinery to be used for the enforcement of the new rules and will be prepared to take control on November 1, by which time licenses must be obtained from the Administration.

The Senate Printing Committee has filed a report recommending Government operation of the print paper and pulp industries during the war and arraigning what it calls the defiant attitude of print paper producers. The report, which will await action at the December session, says that the Federal Trades Commission findings "show beyond any question that the print paper industry, in its greed for excessive profits, has imposed a most unjust burden on the American press, which faces a serious disaster if relief cannot speedily be had from the oppressive prices now exacted for print paper."

Government Control of Paper Plants

Under a resolution introduced by Senator Smith of Arizona and reported by the committee for adoption, the Trade Commission would be empowered to control the production and distribution of print paper and mechanical and chemical pulp in the United States. All print paper and pulp mills and agencies would be operated on Government account and their products pooled in the Commission's hands during the war emergency and equitably distributed at a price based on production and distribution cost, plus a fair profit a ton, to be determined by the Commission. Provision is made in the resolution for cooperation with the Canadian Government and for limiting imports into the United States during the war to shipments for government account.

By an executive order issued October 14, the President put into effect practically all the powers vested in him by the Trading with the Enemy act. By the regulations set forth, the President takes control over American commerce and prescribes the conditions under which trading with enemy interests may be carried on. One provision is that none of the money involved may be contributed to the welfare of enemy countries. When advisable an Alien Property Custodian, named by the President, may take over enemy property in the United States. Enemy patents may be used to aid in the winning of the war. A Censorship Board is created to censor cable, telegraph, radio and mail communication between this country and any foreign nation. Censorship of the foreign language press is vested in the Postmaster General. The Exports Administrative Board goes out of existence and is replaced by the War Trade Board which will supervise exports and imports and consider licenses to deal with enemy firms. Foreign insurance companies in the United States will be subject to a licensing system controlled by the Secretary of the Treasury. Vance McCormick, Chairman of the Administrative Board, will remain as Chairman of the War Trade Board, and a War Trade Commission will be added in an advisory capacity.

New Executive Order

Ireland.—The twentieth meeting of the Convention which was recently held in Cork was attended by eighty-six out of ninety-six delegates. As usual the sittings were secret and nothing is known of the proceedings save that two resolutions of no interest to the public were unanimously adopted. At a luncheon given to the delegates by the Cork Harbor Board, the chairman, Mr. D. J. Lucy, expressed the hope that the mingling of Irish blood from the North and South on the fields of Belgium and France would prove a blessing to the cause of unity. The speaker declared that the Convention showed there was no invincible obstacle to union, and appealed in proof to the Dungannon Convention of 1782, from which issued an Irish Charter of Liberty that resulted in many years of unexampled prosperity. Sir Horace Plunkett followed, and told his audience that the Convention sat in Cork in order that the North might meet the South in peace and amity. He defended the secrecy of the sittings by declaring it was necessary for the exposition and discussion of unpopular views. Proceeding he answered critics who objected to the presence in the Convention of forty-seven representatives of local government bodies, elected to discharge the duties of local administration, not to frame a constitution, by saying that such men would be of supreme value in commending the proposals of the Convention to the public. In conclusion he said:

> The Convention had made him hope as he had never hoped before. At the worst they would have greatly narrowed the differences which kept Irishmen apart. At the best—and he, for his part, did not despair of the best—over the field of their labors Irishmen of the North and South would continue to meet and say to one another in the larger patriotism, "My country is thy country," and in the larger charity, "My God is thy God."

Meantime Nationalists and Sinn Feiners are fighting vigorous battles of words on the hustings. At a meeting held in Bailieborough, attended by people from Cavan, Monaghan, Meath and Louth, Mr. Dillon attacked the "Kick-Them-Out" policy of the Orangemen and Sinn Feiners. He declared that the latter were in great part fledglings, misguided in their enthusiasm, who put forward an impossible program and called to their assistance all the enemies whom the Nationalists had made in a forty years' strenuous fight for the rights of the people. He continued:

> They are all Sinn Feiners now because they want to take vengeance on the Irish party which shook their power and emancipated the people of Ireland. But they won't do it. They are sheltering themselves, and I charge it to them from this platform today, behind a program which they know to be impossible and which they are confident will never come to fruition or to any real achievement. Sheltering themselves behind that program, they say our hour has come, and the land-grabbers, the bailiffs and every kind of men whom the Irish party has had to inconvenience in the course of its career are now leaders of Sinn Fein, patriots of the first water, and under the banner of Sinn Fein they are trying to avenge all the wrongs of the past.

Speaking at Rathfarnham on the same day Mr. de Valera thus stated the present aim of Sinn Fein:

> The main plank of our program at present is that this country's claim should be put forward at the Peace Conference properly and that the wish of the Irish people should not be represented by the ambassadors of England, such as T. P. O'Connor, or indirectly by ambassadors who could do far more harm, namely, Mr. John Dillon and Mr. John Redmond. The position we wish the world to understand with respect to Ireland is that every Nationalist Irishman wants his complete and absolute freedom, wants no connection whatever with England. It is not Colonial Home Rule, nor Home Rule on the Statute Book, nor any other form of Home Rule, which will be rather English rule, but what we want is complete and absolute independence, so that Ireland as a nation can stand up among the other nations of the world as an equal unit with equal rights, not as a subject nation to England nor as an island on the other side of England. We want the world to know what the Irish people wish. We know ourselves what it is. There is not an Irish Nationalist living who in his own heart of hearts does not want that freedom which we publicly proclaim. There are some who say we would love to have that freedom, but it cannot be achieved. They are tired from the long road which they have traveled and the tyranny and oppression that they have been up against, but they will not dare to say that they do not want it. We say that it is the case that every Irishman wants as much freedom for his country as that country can possibly get.

Speaking of the Convention De Valera said:

> So far this Convention does not represent the Sinn Fein organization, but we state to the world and to England we would not hesitate to go into a Convention with fellow-Irishmen. We are ready to go there, but you must give us a guarantee first that whatever agreement we come to you will ratify it, and, secondly, you must give us the right and give them the right to state that what we want is complete and absolute separation if a majority come to that decision. England took care that she would not allow a body of Irishmen to settle such a question by majority rule. I agree that the Convention was set on foot to get a British Minister out of a tight hole. It has not succeeded, as he wished, by getting the Irish people in such a position that he could misrepresent them. The only game that England can play is to use the Convention to split the Irish people; but our people know the amount of trust to place in English promises. The Irish people have been gulled too often to trust English promises, and they will not allow themselves to be split by anything that British Ministers may bring forward as a result of the Convention.

Unfortunately fuel has been added to the fire by the death of Ashe and by the severe treatment given Sinn Feiners in an English prison.

Mexico.—According to press dispatches the Carranzistas are still engaged in their favorite occupation of theft. During the period of a former revolution the radicals put many churches and chapels under the hammer; in some instances the buildings were bought by individuals who allowed them to be used for ecclesiastical functions. The present Government, having stolen all other available property, has confiscated the aforesaid buildings on the plea that they really belonged to the Church, thus vindicating once again this opinion of Mr. William H. Burges, expressed in different parts of an address, "A Hot-House Constitution: The Mexican Constitution of 1817," delivered at the meeting of the American Bar Association at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., last month:

Constitutional Theft

> I have no extraneous evidence to offer that that Constitution was written by Emma Goldman or Alexander Berkmann, but I fail to find anything in it which, when taken with all the other parts of the instrument, should prove unsatisfactory to either of those militant champions of a liberty unregulated by law. To those familiar with the leaders of the revolutionary movement, at least in the northern portion of Mexico, it is hard to realize how men, with no more intelligence than they have displayed in other respects, could have devised so perfect a system for exacting illegal tribute for legal protection. To my mind, it is beyond human thought that the men who framed that Constitution, with the knowledge of the conditions to which it was to apply, had any other thought than its financial value to the men who could levy tribute through it. The need of Mexico is not so much for liberty as for honest government.

The convention that framed the articles on labor and social welfare in the Constitution of 1917 was not without an English precedent. Its prototype was held on Blackheath in the reign of Henry the Sixth. There were present "Jack Cade, Dick the Butcher, Smith the Weaver, and a Sawyer with infinite numbers." Those worthies there highly resolved: "There shall be in England seven halfpenny loaves sold for a penny; the three-hooped pot shall have 10 hoops," and they would make it felony to drink small beer. All the realm should be in common, and in Cheapside should their palfreys go to grass, and the first step in the program was "to kill all the lawyers." This is not called for by the Mexican Constitution, and it is well, for if saving grace is ever to enter that Government it will have to be through the efforts of an independent, upright judiciary and a courageous bar.

The departments [of Justice, Public Instruction and Fine Arts] may have been abolished, but under the Constitution confiscation as a fine art remains, and no public instruction is necessary to make repudiation [of debts contracted by workmen up to the date of promulgation of the Constitution] an exact science.

The description which Diedrick Knickerbocker wrote in humor may be applied in all seriousness to Mexico: "The late beauteous prospect presents one scene of anarchy and wild uproar, as though old Chaos had resumed his reign and was hurling back into one vast turmoil the conflicting elements of nature."

Again, to quote from Señor Bulnes, the path which Mexico has trod during the past seven years has been "A long and tortuous road, strewn with blood, crimes, infamies, heroic deeds, hallucinations, inconceivable depths of depravity, crushed ideals and suicidal tendencies born of desperation."

It may be that that is no concern of ours individually nor as a people, that while the Mexican people choose to hold high carnival of lawlessness, wasting human life, destroying property, bringing up generations in idleness and worse, unmindful of the hundreds of millions of dollars our people have invested there, and the hundreds of millions the people of other countries have invested there, which, under our Monroe Doctrine, their Governments are forbidden to protect, we have no duty but to stand

> "While the tumult of the time disconsolate
> To inarticulate murmur dies away,
> While the eternal ages watch and wait."

If this is true, if no regeneration for that people is to come except from within, and under an organic law calculated to develop beyond all calculation a system of official blackmail, authorizing wholesale confiscations, proclaiming democracy but placing the lives and property of the people in the hands of an irresponsible executive, holding office for four years and forever ineligible of re-election, then the best that can be hoped for that people is

> "Thy hand, great Anarch, let the curtain fall
> And universal darkness bury all."

Mr. Burges doubts whether "there can be found . . . a more worthless scrap of paper than the Mexican Constitution," yet General Obregon is hurrying to New York from Mexico to prove its worth and incidentally to put his hand into the "pork-barrel."

Russia.—The new Coalition Government, replacing the Council of Five, is in control and announces that its enactments will be based on agreements between representatives of the bourgeoisie, the taxpaying elements and the revolutionary democracy, and concludes with the statement that the principal aims of the new Government will be: To raise the fighting power of the armies and navies; to bring order to the country by fighting anarchy; to call the Constituent Assembly as soon as possible. The Coalition Cabinet consists of six Socialists, four Constitutional Democrats and seven members from other parties.

Kerensky's New Ministry

After a three hours' conference on October 8 between the Provisional Government and representatives of the bourgeoisie and a delegation from the Democratic Congress, they all came to an agreement. According to their decision the new Provisional Parliament will be officially convoked and recognized by the Government, will consist of 730 members, 120 of them representing non-democratic elements. The Parliament has been officially named the "Temporary Council of the Russian Republic" and will sit until the Constituent Assembly convenes. This Council will "have the right to put questions, but not demands, to initiate legislation on State questions and to deliberate on measures which the Government lays before it." The Ministry, while not responsible to the Council, cannot exist without having the lawmakers' confidence. The formation of this new Temporary Council seems to be about the only useful result of the recent Democratic Congress. The power of the Bolsheviki, who are no better than anarchists, appears to be broken for the present. The Democratic Congress, instead of uniting, only widened the breach between its different sections, the town delegates opposing those from the country districts, and the dominant party splitting up into Extremists, Moderates and Conservatives.

Spain.—The revolutionary strike which for a time threatened to assume very serious proportions has at last been thoroughly quelled, and although martial law had to be maintained for several weeks, the country has now returned to practically normal conditions. The loyalty of the army, which contrary to the expectations of the anarchistic leaders remained faithful, enabled the military authorities to take prompt and effective measures of suppression, and was the largest factor in the defeat of the plan to proclaim a republic throughout Spain. Only in the mining districts of the Asturias and in Miraflores de la Sierra was the republic actually proclaimed and in the latter place the usual radical demonstrations against the Church were attempted. It is stated that the autonomous Catalaunian party, or at least some elements in it, was not altogether innocent of complicity in the revolutionary plan.

The Revolutionary Strike

The Men Without a Country

J. B. CULEMANS

JOHN SPARGO is one of the leaders of American Socialism, and he knows how to trim his sails to every wind. Having broken away from the organization, he takes high rank among the insurgents and is deeply concerned over the failure of his party to back the Government in the present war. While trying on one side to whitewash Socialism and to remove from it the stigma of near-treason, he is endeavoring on the other side to square the Socialist policy with national ideals and aspirations.

It appears to be an easy matter for him and his coterie of intellectuals to manipulate the shifting tenets of Socialism so as to meet all emergencies. Like the fabled seven-headed hydra of old, Socialism becomes endued with a charmed life at his hands. Where outsiders had thought they witnessed an ignominious collapse, he sees an impending rejuvenation of the party. It had appealed to the brotherhood of man and the international solidarity of the working classes in such clamorous phrases that many, even of those who were unfriendly to its tenets, came to believe that Socialism would be able to make good its boast of preventing a general clash of arms. How it was found miserably wanting at the most critical moment is a matter of recent history. And the reason for its impotence is not far to seek. Although apparently a strongly officered and closely knit organization, it enjoyed no doctrinal unity and was not based on any stable universal principles. Marx was its prophet and high priest, and Marx is an abject failure. In religion he stood for the absolute denial of Christian ethics and dogma. His professed atheism foreshadowed the end of all belief and of all worship. His attacks upon matrimony undermined the very foundations of human society. Economic laws, the only ones recognized by Marx and his followers as of any scientific value, have gone into the discard. Time was confidently expected to show forth the truth of his cherished theories of value and surplus-value; of the ineluctable concentration of capital and the consequent pauperization of the masses; of the iron law of wages; time was to lead on the nations with fatalistic certainty to a Socialistic commonwealth, thus insuring the universal kingdom of human brotherhood. Impassioned faith in this Utopia threw a fascinating spell over the movement and brought recruits to its ranks in great numbers. When the first cannon shot shattered the gossamer structure, the great International seemed to have gone the way of all things mundane. But Spargo is not in the least dismayed by the disaster, and thinks that it is merely a question of redefining the old terms to suit the new conditions. The international character of Socialism constitutes its strength, and must be saved at whatever cost to consistency and logic. In his opinion "The very nature of the Socialist philosophy requires the preservation of national unities, a fact which has guided the international policies of the movement from the founding of the first International." Both assertions are gratuitous and untrue as far as they concern the Socialism we have known these many years. Whether the new policy of nationalism in preference to internationalism will become that of the party as a whole, only the future can tell. For the present the former rules the Socialist organizations in Germany and France, as well as in England, Italy and Belgium. If it becomes the guiding principle of American Socialism, the International will then have entered upon a new existence radically different from the old.

As preached during the nineteenth century, Socialism was the negation of all nationalism. Only a closely-knit interrelation of the proletarians of the world could put an end to capitalistic slavery and bring about the Socialistic commonwealth. If the fatal working of economic laws did not bring about the desired results quickly, revolutionary tactics were justifiable to attain the end. The proletarian was a man without a country since the oneness of all peoples was his professed aim, and by his endeavor all artificial barriers and boundaries were destined to disappear.

That the proletarians of one nation should engage in war against those of another nation was simply unthinkable; war is always waged with the money of the people and the courage of the poor for the benefit of the ruling classes. Answering the question: "What is the principle by which Socialists should be guided in time of war?" Kautsky asserted that in the event of war Socialists must ask themselves: "What is best calculated to advance proletarian interests?" and shape their conduct in accordance with the answer.

Soon after the outbreak of the present strife he was the first to abandon his own principle. He saw the French Socialists making common cause with autocratic Russia and identifying the victory of France with the interests of the proletariat, while the German Socialists claimed that its cause would be best served by a victory of Germany.

The Socialists of Europe were at odds and still are. They all discovered they had a fatherland to which they were more deeply attached than they themselves knew, and which they could not forsake in time of trouble. The ties of blood and association proved stronger than the party ties. The same reversal of opinion and conduct was witnessed with us the moment America entered the war, with this difference, that the rank and file of the party are not yet by any means reconciled to our war policy. For them nationalism as a basis of internationalism presents a tangle of ideas that stands for the complete negation of historic Socialism. Spargo has nothing but contempt for the Socialist emergency convention that met in St. Louis shortly after our declaration of war, but his views are those of a small minority.

The cleavage in the party is clearly marked. On one side are the irreconcilables, the great majority of the party's adherents, believing in the revolutionary Socialism of ante-bellum days, and they have the solid support of the official party press. On the other side are the opportunists, or intellectuals, like Spargo, Russell, and a few others who have been debarred from the party, and must have recourse to the capitalistic press to air their views, which are no longer inspired by the former fiery revolutionary spirit. While calling themselves Socialists they are no longer leaders of the proletarian masses. The latter, although reduced to silence, are not converted. The severe censorship counsels greater prudence in the printed word and public speech. But the propaganda from man to man goes on with undiminished fervor, a fervor all the greater because it feels itself checkmated to a considerable extent. It is making more converts for the cause than is at present apparent on the surface. Whatever the shifting fortunes of war may have in store for the country, the fire of discontent is smouldering and may flare up at any moment in unexpected quarters. Government measures notwithstanding, the price of the necessaries of life is not coming down while industrial profits keep soaring to unprecedented levels. A packing company of Chicago declared a cash and stock dividend of $100,000,000; another packing company, a cash and stock dividend of $98,000,000. Last year one of these companies made about $14,000,000 in excess of its profits the previous year. Sundry other industries report similar gains. Conditions such as these provide the best culture-medium for the Socialist ferment. Ominous strikes all over the country indicate that there is working a leaven of discontent which can scarcely be repressed by an appeal to loyalty and patriotism. A spark may touch off the powder magazine, and start a conflagration the extent of which none can foresee.

The country stands in need of all the restraining influences that the intellectuals can exercise over the Socialist party, but that influence is likely to be of small import. For the intellectuals joined the party principally for selfish reasons, for leadership, pecuniary benefits, and political preferment. The rank and file joined for what they could give to the party: strength of numbers and the unspoken burning desire to help in bringing about the dawn of a new order through the social revolution. Men without a country, they still stand for world-citizenship, and are by no means ready to call America their own.

Teaching and Proselytism

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., PH. D.

IT so happens that just as we begin the scholastic year there are some very apt quotations with regard to teachers and teaching that should prove not only interesting but valuable for those engaged in educational work. At least they will stand as a warning to instructors as well as to pupils, with regard to that very large borderland which consists almost entirely of opinion. Formerly opinions that reached far beyond the scientific premises on which they were supposed to be founded, had their place mainly in physical science, but with the increase of attention to the ethical and social sciences a new field for the exploitation of opinions, rather than of science, has been opened. As a consequence a great many instructors, sometimes unconsciously, sometimes quite deliberately, and for proselyting purposes, teach opinions that have been rejected by the great majority of thoughtful people.

In an article in the Educational Review for September, under the title "Is American Higher Education Improving?" President Nicholas Murray Butler has emphasized the situation that has thus been created in American institutions of learning. He says:

Too many American college and university teachers of today are proselyters for some particular philosophy of life. They are not content to teach, but feel under the obligation to preach as well. To the discriminating student such preaching of social and political doctrine does little harm, because he takes it only at its proper value. The less discriminating student, however, and particularly the women students of today, are sadly imposed upon by lecture-room talk of that sort. The good teacher understands the distinction between what he himself knows and believes and what it is wise and proper for him to teach the young and immature student. The poor teacher, on the other hand, mixes all these things up together.

President Butler's warning has its main reference to the superficial sensation-mongering teacher intent on attracting attention, yet it is surprising how often even the good teacher, or at least the man who knows one subject very well and thinks he knows all the others, will be ready to express emphatically opinions on subjects quite outside of his specialty. These opinions of course carry a very great deal of weight with his students or with those who either have no apparatus for critical judgment or have their critical faculties disarmed by a show of learning. Specialism is prone to just such disadvantages. The dean of the graduate department of an important eastern university once called a specialist "A man who knew so much more about one thing than he knew about anything else, that he thought he knew more about it than anyone else did." To which someone has ventured to add "and he is inclined to think that if he gives any thought to any other subject he will know more about that than anyone else does." It is men of this kind who work great harm on the unformed minds of students, and, as President Butler thinks, though I should scarcely venture to be so positive, on the impressionable minds of the young women of our day.

As I began to say, it is surprising how often even good teachers, that is, good in the sense of being capable in their special subject, allow themselves to be carried away into the expression of opinions far beyond their scientific knowledge. In an article in Studies, the "Irish Quarterly Review of Letters, Philosophy and Science," September, 1917, Alfred Rahilly has called attention to how far beyond his knowledge Huxley went with untrained audiences in his expressions of belief in evolution. A Jesuit student who attended his lectures said to him one day: "For several months now I have been attending your course, and I have never heard you mention evolution, while in your public lectures everywhere you openly proclaim yourself an evolutionist." "Here in my teaching lectures," answered Huxley, "I have time to put the facts fully before a trained audience. In my public lectures I am obliged to pass rapidly over the facts, and I put forward my personal convictions; and it is for this that people come to hear me."

This is an astounding admission. However, in the popularization of science, personal convictions far outstrip scientific conclusions and are sensational because they are far beyond what was supposed to have been knowledge before. One would scarcely expect Huxley and men of his caliber to stoop to this, and yet the temptation is so great that it is not so surprising to find that they actually do it. When Darwinism and the descent of man from the monkey—which has now been entirely abandoned and never really had a foothold in serious science—were in vogue, Huxley wrote of his lecture to workingmen: "My workingmen stick to me wonderfully, the house being fuller than ever last night. By next Friday they will all be convinced that they are monkeys." Such impositions on simple audiences are indeed disturbing, especially when one realizes how many opportunities there are to influence impressionable students in our universities.

Nor did Huxley conceal from his scientific friends his attitude in this matter, but rather gloried in it. He wrote to Hooker:

> I went in for the entire animal more strongly in fact than they have reported me. I told them in so many words that I entertained no doubt of the origin of man from the same stock as the apes. And to my great delight, in saintly Edinburgh itself, the announcement met with nothing but applause.

Virchow complained very bitterly that scientists in Germany were following Huxley's example. Men were using the prestige of their names as scientists to teach things that were not scientific. They were looking forward confidently to the discovery of the truth of certain things, but were anticipating the actual discovery to teach those things very emphatically. As their anticipations of discoveries were not fulfilled they were actually teaching things that were not true. There was nothing that irritated Virchow more than expressions that indicated a belief in current popular scientific notions with regard to phases of evolution, and particularly Darwinism. There was no one in England of sufficient prestige in science to tell Huxley what he thought of his imposition on popular ignorance, but Virchow did not hesitate to tell Haeckel just what this sort of teaching meant. Above all he insisted that such teaching would bring science into disrepute.

Toward the end of the nineteenth century Brunetière invented the expression "the bankruptcy of science." What he meant was that the claims of science in the latter part of the nineteenth century had been so extravagant that at last its credit had been weakened because it could not meet its obligations, and the consequence had been a distrust of scientific declarations. Nearly a quarter of a century before Brunetière's expression of opinion Virchow in his famous Munich address, "The Freedom of Science in the Modern State," had declared:

> Nothing has been more hazardous in the natural sciences, nothing has more damaged their progress and their place in the esteem of the people, than a premature synthesis, that is, a premature connecting of scientific elements as yet discrepant, a leaping to conclusions without the justification of observed relations. Gentlemen, let us not forget that when the public see a doctrine which has been exhibited to them as certain, established, positive and claiming universal acceptance, proved faulty in its very foundations or discovered wilful and despotic in its essential and chief tendencies, many lose faith in science. Then they break forth into reproaches at the scientists. Ah, you yourselves are not quite sure. Your doctrine which you call truth today is tomorrow a lie. How can you demand that your teachings should form the subject of education and come to be a recognized part of our general knowledge?

The discredit of science is of course a serious consideration and should have a special appeal to those deeply interested in knowledge. This is not nearly so serious, however, as the perversion of thought for the young minds involved. As a consequence of such false learning ideas are graven deeply and are practically never corrected. They often prove the background of a great deal of future thought.

Now that the ethical and social sciences are occupying so much attention in the university, it is particularly important that proselytism should not take the place of teaching, nor tinge teaching so as to make for the propaganda of particular doctrines. This is exactly what is likely to happen, however, no matter how distinguished a teacher may be, unless there is some definite authority to whom teachers are responsible, and unless, too, that authority makes it a point to be thoroughly aware of the matter taught and of the manner in which it is taught. It is this fact that universities are coming to recognize more and more. The war has precipitated a crisis in certain institutions and the whole problem of authority in teaching is coming up once more. The doctrine of freedom of thought, the four-hundredth anniversary of which as a definite philosophy of life is being celebrated this year, has run its course, and it is now beginning to be rather clearly appreciated that what is called liberty often degenerates into a claim for license. Freedom is a wonderful thing, but there can never be freedom to do or to teach wrong.

Only when teachers are willing to submit to authority definitely exercised is there any assurance of such guardianship of teaching as will preserve it from unfortunate divagations. What Huxley was doing in exaggerating the significance of certain phases of biological science half a century ago, a great many teachers are doing in exaggerating the significance of their own favorite phases of social and ethical science in our time.

Those who are prone to wonder why the Catholic Church has insisted both on establishing her own schools and on rounding out her teaching into college and university life will find ample explanation of it in this series of incidents that covers the last half-century. A great many Catholic parents are prone to think that after all comparatively little harm can come to their children at secular institutions after a thorough early training in Catholic principles and practice, yet here is a series of warnings not from Catholics, but from educators intent on protecting youth from vicious propagandists.

Fortunately the proper appreciation of this need for authority over teaching has led Catholics to send their young folk ever more and more to Catholic institutions where they may be assured of the supervision of the principles taught. There are now more than three times as many students in our Catholic colleges as there were some twenty-five years ago, and attendance at them has increased twice as fast as the general college student enrolment throughout the country. In spite of this there still remain many Catholics who are willing to risk the teaching of secular institutions. The expressions of those who are viewing and have viewed the situation from the standpoint, not of religion but of a proper exposition of the philosophy of life, make the lesson worth while.

A Glance at the Fall Plays

JOHN B. KENNEDY

APART from seven-section photo-plays and the brave baritones of musical comedy, there has been no important theatrical manifestation of the American war spirit on Broadway, so far. The widely advertised soap-box parties, with the glaringly un-Jeffersonian police chariot, might be classed as metropolitan entertainment, and as far as anybody knows the finale may yet be melodramatic; but excluding this significant if abortive by-eddy of the war, there has been no attempt to interpret seriously the American martial attitude, perhaps because that attitude is not yet comprehensively martial. In England, years before the launching of Armageddon, the nation's patriotic ethos was crystallized and exploited in "An Englishman's Home," and there was one burlesque of this stirring piece, which, because it showed an enraged Britisher tensely standing to resist a ruthless Teutonic invader and then enthusiastically welcoming the invader as a long-lost uncle, received instant fame and official suppression. Here, apart from trashy melodrama with villains vaguely Latin and Mongolian, much whispering of plans and papers, and frenzied ensemble flag-waving, and a few bombastic ditties, there has been nothing of that nature. No doubt we should be thankful.

A survey of the new plays shows that the gentlemen who possess that most prized of dramatic jewels, the "punch" have no representation, just now, at reputable theaters. The "crook" theme has also been left out of the current season's reckoning. There is only one new play, unpromisingly titled "Deluxe Annie," that brings the hectic lads and lassies of the underworld to view, besides an interminable melodrama called "Branded." Even the risqué has not been paraded as ostentatiously as during former seasons. "The Country Cousin" and "Hamilton" stand out as the most important of the new contributions to the American stage. There may be some to quarrel with this allocation of the weighty word "important"; but in view of the vast amount of trash that has gone under the guise of American drama, these two plays assume a value almost classic.

That thoroughly indigenous author, Booth Tarkington, is part-writer of "The Country Cousin." The piece is decidedly reminiscent of "The Man from Home," excepting that in this case the man happens to be a woman, cousin of a legacied country maid whose parasite father, divorced from her mother, lures the girl to the realm of high, if not very dry, society. A wealthy young loafer, with dynastic figures on his calling card, is the aristocratic god to whom the maid is offered; but he falls in love with the winsome rudeness and Yorkshire accent of the lady farmer from Ohio, and by so doing rescues the innocent maid from the snares of the pseudo-smart set.

It is an instructive entertainment and this notwithstanding the dicta of consciously clever critics. It contrasts the abiding morality of home-bred Americans with the silly sinfulness of the self-denominated "upper ten." Certainly the sentimental value of a rural lady taking a "rise" out of a cosmopolitan cad is a permanent one in drama and a descendant of the old morality play idea. But those critics who would have a public cultured beyond the stage of unvarnished sentimental and social appeal are desiring their own unemployment, for the public that does not relish sentiment will surely find no intelligent use for critics. In "The Country Cousin," unfortunately, we are confronted with that frank reporting of obnoxious detail that has become familiar to audiences in every land.

In "Hamilton" we have a welcome innovation. The author and principal actor of the play, George Arliss, defended his resurrection of Alexander Hamilton's domestic peccadilloes by stating that it was better to dig up Hamilton as an unfaithful husband than to leave him alone. Queer apologetics, indeed! But he gives a portrait of Hamilton that should serve as a precedent for theatrical presentation of other characters and crises in American history. Other nations are rich in this class of drama. Consider what Shakespeare has done to familiarize foreigners with the history of England! Of course, it is difficult to conceive of an American poet writing a blank-verse drama on the panic of 1907 or the New York primaries of 1917, although tragedy enough inheres in these events; but there is really too much stained glass of ornament rather than sanctity about the lives of our historical heroes and a few hours of well-acted life on the stage gives them a proportion and variety of aspect that is historically enlightening and suggestive.

In "Hamilton" we witness the political machinations of Thomas Jefferson the gentle and of James Monroe the abrupt. We get more than a glimpse of those who laid the foundations of our national politics, and we leave the picture convinced that while they were not much better, they certainly were no worse than their descendants in the seats of the mighty. They were men whose opportunism was no blunter than that of the present-day party magnates; but the flood of materialism had not yet drowned their native chivalry and they could both in private and public admire Hamilton's courage while regretting his weakness. Adults with stereotyped memories of history books fingered in the little red schoolhouse will find Arliss's Hamilton a vital reminder that the Fathers of the Revolution were humanly self-assertive as well as paternally patriotic. As for young students of history, it is doubtful whether it were wise to recommend them to improve their knowledge of American traditions by attending this exhibition of none too delicate intrigue. Surely the fact that Hamilton was the victim in a spectacular duel can be brought forward to controvert the assumption that his mean liaison was the most dramatizable episode in his career. Still, "Hamilton" is welcome, for its success holds out a promise which the ill-nourished American home-made drama should receive with hope.

The distinguishing feature of the present season is the growth of the Shavian comedy school. By this it is not implied that we are afflicted by a group of witty sciolists who have no respect for God and a fierce contempt for Mammon. But there are a handful of writers who have discovered the Shavian recipe for witty dialogue. In short, they invent pseudo-problems and promote their dialogue by double blasts of wit against struggling dulness. The dull persons finally succumb to their creator's cleverness, and the audience goes home to find itself reflecting, if audiences do reflect, on what a deliciously exciting world this would be if all despots were satirists. "The Family Exit" is to be classed in this Shavian comedy school. It is the kind of well-written piece that leads an optimist to hope much for American comedy, once its writers free themselves from the necessity of measuring laughter by minutes and delving into depths that are not always odorous.

"Lombardi, Ltd.," by those smart dramatic scriveners, the Hattons, is a play of genuine portraiture. Its authors have a knack of glossing vice and photographing virtue. They make their characters speak with more aplomb than even the inhabitants of the silk-stockinged sphere affect; but it is a fact that they amuse. Lombardi, the Italian coutonnier, is a true, if somewhat profane, Catholic. Yet it is repeated to the verge of axiom that mere brilliance and realism, without regard to direct or indirect moral or art values, much the same thing, are not the worthiest contributions to so licensed an outlet for dramatic talent as comedy. "Here Comes the Bride," "The Very Idea," etc., are plays of this description; of less distinction.

One of the best things of the season is "The Tailor-Made Man," a typically impossible American adventure story concerning a brainy presser of trousers who steals a customer's dress suit to gain admittance to an exclusive reception where he meets a multimillionaire and by dint of strenuous lying, makes his fortune. The play is free from stale sex emphasis and surprisingly well acted for comedy of its class. Allen Doone, a young Irishman from the antipodes, brought an old-fashioned, prologue-burdened melodrama to the seat of all sophistication, Broadway. It is called "Lucky O'Shea," and with a better prologue would be a happy thing. Certainly the brogue involved is refreshing to the ear and the Irish countryside delightful to the eye.

The usual baker's dozen of serious plays, musical comedies and stand-aghast "movies" have appeared. They will disappear. A tried and well-acted piece, "Peter Ibbetson," is again in favor. The predominant note of the new season is distraction from war's alarms and peace excursions, which is quite acceptable so long as it remains on a plane that can be designated as relatively decent.

Shaw's "Misalliance," hailed as an event, has some claim to that distinction when its environment is considered. Of course, no sanely respectable person can approve the marriage views held by the pseudo-sage of Adelphi Terrace; but with all his perversity, there is no denying the intellectual diversion afforded by a well-acted Shaw play, and "Misalliance" in New York is very well acted. If Shaw could be as right as he can be witty, he would be a force for social good.

The Reformation and Its Significance

J. D. TIBBITS

CARDINAL NEWMAN once remarked that if men would only be sufficiently explicit there would be little cause for discussion. A very direct and convincing illustration of this truth is contained in a statement attributed to Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, apropos of the celebration in honor of the four hundredth anniversary of the founding of Protestantism:

> To recall to the mind of the twentieth century, says the Doctor, the significance of the great movement known as the Reformation is a valuable public service. The modern mind is threatened, as was the mind of the sixteenth century, with the dominance of a philosophy of life and religion which operates to minimize the function and the freedom of the individual, and to make each individual merely a cog in the wheel of a powerful and dominating group.

Now with the first sentence of this statement, no Catholic will disagree, and every Catholic will cooperate with Dr. Butler in recalling to the fullest possible extent all that the Reformation implies; but Dr. Butler will surely concede that merely to recall this significance is to leave the work half done. It must be explained as well as recalled, and that with no trace whatever either of prejudice or evasion. And while it is true that in the words which follow the Doctor does give some sort of hint as to what that significance means to him, it is none the less a truth that he utterly misses the point upon which the whole Reformation movement revolves, and that he succeeds only in directing attention to what is at best but secondary and unessential.

One of the most singular facts in the psychology of religion is the well-nigh incorrigible tendency to exalt the so-called "freedom of the individual" into a cardinal virtue. Had modern Protestantism retained within her system a few more remnants of scholastic logic, it might have resulted in far less confusion, and it would surely have resulted in a far deeper power of analysis. For although scholastic distinctions have a bad name and have become the objects of much ridicule, chiefly in the hands of those who know little or nothing of scholasticism, there is yet one very important distinction which strikes at the very essence of the question. And I am offering this brief explanation of it in a perfect spirit of co-operation with Dr. Butler's view, and in order to answer much that is said just now in connection with the Luther celebration, and which is undoubtedly invested with quite as much obscurity as Dr. Butler himself has succeeded in investing his own words.

Translated into more exact language, this "freedom of the individual" is nothing more nor less than impressionism. Now the necessity for men, in accordance with their natural constitution, to be in great measure impressionists, I am quite free to admit. The error of Dr. Butler lies in his failure to recognize the fact that impressionism, like freedom itself, has limits, and that if there is a sphere wherein it is legitimate, there is also a sphere in which it is not only illegitimate, but irrational. In order to make my meaning clear I shall offer a brief illustration of each, not in the hope of saying anything heretofore unsaid, but only of removing a little of the ambiguity which so obscures all modern discussion of the question.

I shall suppose two classical scholars of precisely equal erudition. I shall suppose, too, that they are gifted with equally logical minds, and that each is equally free from conscious and acquired prejudice. They are engaged upon a critical examination of the well-known Latin poem, "Culex." Despite the fact of the equality in the intellectual equipment which they bring to bear upon their labors, they arrive at diametrically opposite conclusions. One decides that the poem is an authentic production of Vergil; the other that it is quite anonymous.

Now if we do but keep in mind the fact that every man is born into the world with various susceptibilities for which he is in no way responsible and of which he is not infrequently unconscious and that these susceptibilities are brought to bear upon every problem which he faces in life, the disparity in the conclusions of investigators in every field of thought will be abundantly clear. It will be equally clear how in many cases where the evidence is conflicting and confused, the subjective element enters in to cast the deciding vote. When, therefore, this factor has become the judge, the process is what I have called impressionism; and in the illustration given above it will be readily seen that this process is wholly legitimate, and that any attempt to limit its scope would be not merely an undue interference with natural freedom, but also a psychological impossibility.

In the sphere of revealed religion, however, the matter is entirely different. By revealed religion I mean a body of transcendental truth revealed to men at a definite time, in a definite place, by a definite individual, and possessing, for every man, a definite significance. Now we need only reflect very casually upon all that this implies, to see clearly enough that within the domain of a religion such as this, impressionism can have no ruling. And the reason that it can have no ruling is because the human susceptibilities, whatever else they may be, are not, in any sense the criteria of truth. As an illustration of this, which is in some way parallel to my first, let us suppose Martin Luther and John Calvin to be possessed of all possible human knowledge concerning, let us say, the Eucharist. Both, however, differ, and in a very marked degree, upon the meaning of the words, "This is my body." Now this difference in their respective conclusions is explainable only by a difference in their susceptibilities; but the very fact that this difference exists at all is ample proof that there can be no necessary correspondence between these same susceptibilities, and objective fact. It is exactly this correspondence which religion demands, and from whence it derives both its value and its rationality. Thus, in the illustration just given, it is eminently important to me as an individual to know precisely what the Eucharist is. The knowledge of it has a direct bearing upon my relation to eternity. A misconception of it might result in the closing of the channels of grace on the one hand, or an utter waste of spiritual energy on the other.

The very fact that no impression, however refined, can guarantee an exactness of result when exactness is nothing less than an imperative demand of reason is proof that impressionism is not only incompetent as a court of appeal, but that in the sphere of religion it is nothing less than a perversion of man's rational nature. It would, indeed, be as interesting as it would be instructive to settle once and forever the authorship of the "Culex." All knowledge is good. It is, however, by no means a necessity. But even if such speculations are, in last analysis, a mere weighing of probabilities, yet both the effort and the exercise possess a distinct and unquestionable value. In the field of religion it is vastly different. It is eternal life that is at stake. And any system which seriously proposes to measure the truths of eternity by the favor of an irresponsible feeling is bound to end not merely in a degradation of man's highest gift, but in a complete surrender to the forces of unreason.

This, then, is the real significance of the Reformation, which if the present celebration does but clarify, it will surely not have been in vain. We are told that the "password" of those participating in this celebration is to be the three outstanding characteristics of the work of Luther, "Inspiration, Education, Transformation." It would, however, be far more practical, even if less agreeable, to direct attention to the three results of that work, which are most apparent in the world of today, the vagaries of the New Theology; general indifference to all religion; and the threatened extinction of Protestantism, through a declining birth-rate.

Angels of the Battlefield

GERALD C. TREACY, S.J., CHAPLAIN U. S. A.

DOWN in the old Blue Grass State, two and a half miles from Bardstown, is the mother house of the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth. In 1812 it was a log cabin, and two ladies constituted the community. At the outbreak of the Civil War the log cabin had grown into a large academy with branch houses in different parts of the State. It was in the spring of 1861 that Bishop Martin J. Spalding sent word to General Robert Anderson, who was in command of the Department of Kentucky, that the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth were prepared to nurse the sick and wounded soldiers. The offer was gladly accepted and General Anderson wrote:

> The Sisters of Charity will nurse the wounded under the direction of army surgeons, without any intermediate authority or interference whatever. Everything necessary for the lodging and nursing of the wounded and sick will be supplied to them without putting them to expense, they giving their services gratuitously. So far as circumstances will allow they shall have every facility for attending to religious and devotional exercises.
> ROBERT ANDERSON,
> Brig.-Gen'l, U. S. Army.

Three large factories in Louisville had been converted into hospitals, and an army surgeon with twenty-three Sisters of Charity took charge. Several skirmishes and one battle had taken place, and the cot-lined rooms of the new hospitals contained hundreds of wounded and disease-stricken troops of both armies. Little drummer boys were there with seasoned fighters suffering and agonizing side by side. Their only nurses were the Sisters. At Bardstown, too, there was a hospital under the care of the Sisters. Several engagements had occurred in that place, and the town had been held successively by Union and Confederate troops. Just at this time General Smith, who was operating with a good-sized body of Union troops in western Kentucky, called upon the Sisters in Paducah to nurse the soldiers. From St. Mary's Academy in Paducah, under Sister Martha Drury, a band of Sisters took over the Baptist church for government relief work. One of their number, Sister Mary Lucy, died of typhoid fever at her post of duty. She was one of the youngest of the band. Just before she died she asked the favor of being buried in the vicinity of St. Vincent's Academy, Union County, as St. Vincent's was her Alma Mater.

From the hospital in Paducah her remains were escorted by files of troops to the Ohio River, where a black-draped gunboat was waiting. Thence the military funeral proceeded to St. Vincent's. From the time the body of this young Sister was taken from Paducah until it rested at St. Vincent's, a guard of troops kept constant vigil, strong, straight figures standing at "Attention" all night long, in the glare of blazing torches made of pine knots. Many of those who stood guard that night in loving tribute to the memory of the dead had been nursed back to health by her who had gone to her own death in the discharge of duty. She typified the spirit of Nazareth, this brave young Sister, whose unselfish bravery brought her to an early grave. On the battlefields and in the hospitals of their native State, the same story of self-sacrifice was repeated. The Sisters from the Nazareth community were in every place where there were suffering and sorrow. As was well said by a Kentucky newspaper man in later times: "In the midst of civil strife, the Sisters worked under one flag, a flag respected by Northerner and Southerner alike, the flag of humanity."

While many of the branch houses of the Congregation were converted into hospitals, the mother house at Nazareth kept on as an educational institution. There were seventy pupils, including Northerners and Southerners. Fear was felt that school work would have to be abandoned here, as in other parts of the State. At times, too, the Sisters feared for the children, with troops of both armies hovering around the neighborhood. No harm happened, however, and General Wood of the Union forces sent a reassuring letter to the Superior, Mother Columba, who had mentioned her fears to him.

> To the Lady Superior and Sisters of the Convent of Nazareth:
> I hasten to apprize you that it is my earnest desire and intention to afford you perfect protection and the enjoyment of all your rights, both as an institution and as ladies individually. It is my intention to secure you and your ancient institution which has educated so many fair daughters of my own native State, Kentucky, from all molestation and intrusion; and to this end I pray that you will not hesitate to make known to me any grievances you may have on account of any misconduct on the part of any officer or soldier under my command. I assure you that it will be equally my duty and my pleasure to attend to any request you may have to make. I beg you to dismiss all apprehensions you may have on account of the presence of soldiery in your sacred neighborhood and to continue your peaceful and beneficent vocations, as if the clanging of arms did not resound in your neighborhood.

I have the honor to be, ladies, your obedient servant,
TH. J. WOOD, Brig.-Gen'l, U. S. Army.

The President sent a card to Mother Columba which read: "Let no depredation be committed upon the property or possessions of the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth, near Bardstown, Ky.—A. Lincoln."

The Government protected the Sisters' property, but it could not protect their lives from the dangers of battlefield and hospital service. Three of their number paid the price of the greater love. One was the young Sister Mary Lucy, the others Sisters Apollonia and Catherine. From Louisville, in February, 1862, the surgeon in charge wrote to Mother Francis Gardner: "I regret very much to have to inform you of the death of Sister Catherine at the General Hospital in this city. She as well as the other Sisters at the hospital has been untiring and most efficient in nursing sick soldiers. The military authorities are under the greatest obligations to your Order."

Not to these Sisters alone were the authorities under obligations, for the Sisters of Charity in Cincinnati went into the field at the request of the Mayor of Cincinnati, and the Archbishop of the diocese. They were known as the Sisters of Charity of Mt. St. Vincent. They were in service at the hospitals in Cincinnati, at Camp Dennison, at Nashville, Cumberland, New Creek, and Gallipolis. In addition to the Sisters of Charity, and the Sisters of Mercy, whose labors during the war were unceasing, the Sisters of St. Joseph and the Sisters of the Holy Cross took part in relief work for both armies.

In the beginning of the year 1862, Surgeon-General Smith of Pennsylvania applied to Chestnut Hill, Philadelphia, for the Sisters of St. Joseph to serve as nurses to the sick soldiers in Camp Curtin, Harrisburg. Bishop Wood wrote at the time: "The doctor hopes that the Sisters will not disappoint him. Every female nurse has been refused, Dr. Smith being unwilling to trust any but his old friends, the Sisters of St. Joseph. There is a large field of usefulness. . . . The living is rough, the pay poor, and nothing but the sentiments of religion can render the nurses contented." The Sisters accordingly took charge of the hospital in January. At first their reception was anything but cordial. Nothing daunted, they set about doing thorough work, and in a month the Surgeon-General wrote to the Superior, Mother St. John: "I have found the Sisters perfectly well and with no complaints after their trial of the inconveniences and exposure attendant on military life. Already each hospital shows the blessing attendant on their presence. Everything is now neat, orderly and comfortable." Their apostolate at Camp Curtin did not last long. In April, 1862, they left Camp Curtin. They were thanked officially by the Governor of Pennsylvania, who sent the following letter to Mother St. John, their Superior:

MADAM: During a period of several weeks, amidst the confusion of a constantly changing camp, and amidst an epidemic of measles, typhoid fever, etc., six of the Sisters of St. Joseph, sacrificing all personal comfort, ministered faithfully and truly to the comfort and welfare of the sick. Neatness, order, and efficient ministration immediately followed on their arrival in the camp.

Highly appreciating their valuable services and Christian devotion to the relief of human suffering, the State authorities desire to express to them and to your Order high appreciation of the self-sacrificing spirit which they exhibited among the sick soldiers, both at Camp Curtin and at the Church Hospital in Harrisburg.

By order of
A. G. CURTIN, Governor of Pennsylvania.

In April, 1862, the Sisters of St. Joseph were at Fortress Monroe. They were first assigned to the hospital ships. In May of that year three Sisters, accompanying the Surgeon-General, went down the James River aboard the Commodore to bring up the wounded from the battlefield of Yorktown. The Commodore finally put into Philadelphia with its wounded passengers, the Sisters staying with the sufferers until they were transferred to different Philadelphia hospitals. In the meantime the camp at Harrisburg was reopened, and the Sisters resumed their labors there. The United States Government took over all the State hospitals in the summer of 1862, and Surgeon-General Smith wrote to Mother St. John: "I have requested the Sisters at Harrisburg to return to you. . . . They did great good, were very kind and useful. All will be acknowledged in due time."

Like the Sisters of St. Joseph, the Sisters of the Holy Cross did their share of relief work in Civil War days. From the scant records of their apostolate it is certain that sixty members of this Congregation, under Mother Angela, volunteered for service shortly after the first gun was fired at Sumter. Mother Angela was a cousin of James G. Blaine, and was related to the Ewings and the Shermans. Dr. Brinton, a Philadelphia physician, who had been one of the first to suggest the Sisters as war nurses, introduced Mother Angela to General Grant. On meeting her, the General said: "I am glad to have you with us, very glad. If there is anything at all I can do for you I will be glad to do it. I thoroughly appreciate the value of your services, and I will give orders to see that you do not want for anything." In her book, "A Woman's Story of the War," Mary A. Livermore, who did splendid relief service for the sick and wounded, mentions the General Hospital at Cairo as an example of the thoroughness of the work done by the Sisters of the Holy Cross. "There was one general hospital at Cairo, called by the people 'the Brick Hospital.' Here the Sisters of the Holy Cross were employed, one or more to each ward. Here were order, cleanliness and good nursing." And of the Mound City Hospital the same writer says:

At the time of my visit the Mound City Hospital was considered the best military hospital in the United States. . . . The most thorough system was maintained in every department. . . . The Sisters of the Holy Cross were employed as nurses, and by their skill, quietness, gentleness, and tenderness were invaluable in the sick wards. . . . Every patient gave hearty testimony to the skill and kindness of the Sisters. . . . The Sisters had nearly broken up their famous schools at South Bend to answer the demand for nurses. If I had ever felt prejudice against these Sisters as nurses, my experience with them during the war would have dissipated it entirely. The world has known no nobler and more heroic women than those found in the ranks of the Catholic Sisterhoods.

It need hardly be said that Mary Livermore was not a Catholic. At best these papers give but an imperfect view of the labors of the Sisters during the Civil War. It is well known that members of other Congregations did their bit during those days when democracy in this land was going through its ordeal of blood and suffering. While their names are forgotten, the good they did has been recorded where human effort melts into eternal reward. Nor must we forget that great work was done by other organizations and other relief workers. The best-known organization of those days was the Sanitary Commission, which was started in New England by a group of patriotic women, and approved by the Secretary of War in June, 1861. Its object was to look after "the sanitary interest of the United States forces." Within its scope fell the inspection of recruits, the proper provision of nurses and hospitals, and the general welfare of our soldiers. Its labors were divided between two committees, one on "advice," the other on "inquiry." The committee on inquiry set out to find a remedy for the evils that had been the scourge of armies in other wars, and had already made headway in the Union army. The purpose of the committee on advice was to get the opinions and conclusions of the "commission approved by the Medical Bureau, ordered by the War Department and carried out by the officers and men."

The interest roused in many families throughout the country, whose members belonged to aid societies connected with the Sanitary Commission, led to the popular belief that it was only a bureau for assigning their offerings to relief work in the army. The fact is the Commission always regarded relief measures as secondary to preventive measures. At the close of the war the Commission established a pension bureau and a war-claim agency. From 1861 to 1866 the receipts of the Commission were $4,924,480.99, and the estimated value of supplies furnished is supposed to have amounted to $15,000,000. The work of the Commission ceased at the declaration of peace. The work of the Sisters went on, and is going on today. Whether in war or peace they are found at the side of the sick and the suffering. The last of the Sisters who went from Emmitsburg to Gettysburg in July, 1863, died in June of this year, 1917. She was Sister Juliana Chatard, the sister of the present Bishop of Indianapolis and a member of a Baltimore family that has done much for the Church in America.

A Needed Book

To the Editor of AMERICA:

At the present time there are many Catholic students in secular colleges who are exposed to atheistic, materialistic and nebular-evolutionary theories of life, morality and science. This danger is coupled with the prejudiced and often cynical teaching of history relating to the Catholic Church. Why do not the leading educational authorities of the country compile a catalogue raisonné to be used by such students in all matters of doubt arising from the prejudiced exposition of geology, history, ethics, metaphysics and other philosophical studies? A book of this kind would satisfy a crying need.

Too Much Social Work

To the Editor of AMERICA:

One wonders how much first-hand knowledge of actual conditions prevailing among the indigent classes is possessed by the writer of the letter, entitled "Too Much Social Work," in AMERICA for September 15. Certainly Mr. Sullivan would not have committed himself to such wholesale criticism of zealous men and women, were he well acquainted either with sincere social workers or with the needs which make their efforts a crying necessity. The Y. M. C. A. and the Y. W. C. A. are offering very attractive inducements to our young folk, which they find it hard to resist, especially when they have just left school and are working for the first time. Surely sewing lessons for little girls and carpentry classes for small boys have a practical value.

Then too there is the insistent question of giving material assistance to those in need. Half-starved, thinly-clad children, only too frequently in want of medical attention, have but little chance of growing up into healthy, intelligent citizens. To give them a much-needed helping hand is surely not the work of faddists. Neither is there any delusion in interesting one's self in the family of six or seven children who on account of the illness of their mother or some other reason cannot for the time being be properly cared for.

And what of industrial conditions? Are our factory laws so well enforced that inspection is superfluous? Are our girls so fully protected that the interest of a social worker is a "burden"? To think so is to cherish a utopian dream. Men and women, really conversant with social conditions, are confronted with a sad state of affairs, far too pressing to leave any room or time for "dreams and high-flown speeches." These are best left to the "every-day, common-sense tax-payer."

Ecclesiastical Sanction

To the Editor of AMERICA:

W. F. from Chicago lashes us well and deservedly and C. Connolly cuts deep. Why is it that we sit down meekly under daily unjust insinuations and frequent open attacks? In the Charities investigation the Sisters were heckled and humiliated, the proceedings misrepresented in the papers. Why were not the papers brought to book by a campaign against their advertising and circulation? If we had touched their pocket-books we should have changed their policy.

There were but few Catholics at the investigation to hearten the persecuted Sisters, till a "whip" was sent after them and she succeeded in collecting a few devoted Catholic ladies. Priests were conspicuous by their absence. C. Connolly's charges are evidently true. Catholics on public committees on moral issues are very rare birds.

The reason may be that we are too much accustomed to look for ecclesiastical sanction. It is difficult to form a baseball team in a parish without several visits to the rectory. A Catholic once invited a prominent coreligionist from another city to deliver a lecture on a patriotic subject without consulting the Ordinary, and great offense was taken. Big movements are undertaken for the betterment of society, for moral uplift, against white slavery, yet Catholics hang back, wait an impulse from the clergy. These are silent, apathetic, otherwise occupied, and so nothing is done. Hundreds of young people go astray, priests absolve them in confession, but as for saving them by interest in public movements, all that is left to those of other denominations. In the meantime souls suffer and the Church's good name is smirched. Catholics who would gladly use their influence and sacrifice their time in a good cause, hang back waiting for the smile or frown from the parochial rectory. In Ireland they once said that they took their religion from Rome, not their politics. So in this country, while not suggesting anything like a shadow of diminution of our docile obedience to ecclesiastical authority within its sphere, it seems to me that more interest would be shown and more effective help given to public moral movements, if many of us snapped the leading-strings which tie us too closely, where we should be free.

Language in the Making

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Overheard in the cell house: "I hit him on the head." "I bammed him on the bean." "I tapped him on the conk." "I bumped him on the beezer." "I biffed him on the coco." "I busted him on the cranium." "I whiffed him on the skull." "I cracked him on the nut." "I nailed him on the knob." "I slugged him on the belfry." "I lammed him on the peak." "I dinged him on the brain-box."

Here is slang in a rich variety of expressions; expressions which find root in perverted but acute mentality. The philologist who seeks logical precision and clearness of thought must go elsewhere for his examples but in this respect the prison resembles the outside world. You can hear these expressions on the street, in restaurants and in moving-picture houses, and they illustrate the Stygian depths to which our language has fallen.

The writer was educated in the public schools of the City of Boston; is at time of writing and has been for many years secretary of one of the largest public school associations in that city; he has yet to hear such language as "guy" from the lips of parochial school children, and it is to the everlasting credit of Catholic educated youth that they do not have to go down into the sewer for a breath of fresh air. Their speech is as clean as the atmosphere of their schoolrooms.

Woman's "Wider Field"

THERE are plenty of men in New York, Chicago, and Big Bone Lick, Kentucky, who would make admirable city clerks or tax-collectors in their respective municipalities. But very few would be capable of "keeping house." That is a task which calls for the patience of Job, the wisdom of Solomon, and the loving watchfulness that Almighty God Himself has chosen as the nearest type of His love for man. If we have not been calling our women-folk to be mayors and city clerks, our reluctance is not based on any misgivings as to their fitness. Rather, it is because we have felt that they are set aside for an office infinitely higher and holier than any within the gift of the electorate. Mere men can fulfil the duties of these lower occupations with satisfaction. But only a woman can make a home, and what every community now needs is not more voters, but more home-makers. It need hardly be insisted that a woman who votes may be a devoted mother; but not the woman who puts a life in public first, regarding it as "a wider field of usefulness."

Somehow there are those who think that to bring up a child in the fear of the Lord, to make him a good citizen and a good Christian, is a far nobler achievement than to build a Parthenon. It was Abraham Lincoln, a man whose civic ideals we are trying to recall in these days, who said that all that was good in him was due to his mother, a simple, unlettered woman who tried to set the boy on the ways of righteousness. In all probability the world will always have physicians in fair abundance, more lawyers than it needs, and politicians in sad profusion; but that it will ever be blessed with too many Christian mothers is by no means certain, or even probable. Young women in search of a career to be spent in "fields of wider usefulness," should be encouraged to fit themselves to become home-makers. That field is not overcrowded; none is "wider"; but none calls for more initiative and constructive thinking. Many a girl who can talk politics, spell with some consistency, discuss the fashions, and dabble in psycho-analysis, is as ignorant of home-making as a Digger Indian. A good mother is worth more to the world than any philosopher, scientist, or poet that ever lived. For she is in fact the world's greatest poet, the "creator," in whose bosom are nourished the men and women who will make this dwelling-place of ours more like the lasting City of God, towards which time bears us on with unrelenting energy.

What About Your Vote?

WHEN James F. Smith took his place at the end of the line outside the registry booth, he knew that he would be obliged to wait his turn at least half an hour. The October wind was chill, not bracing, but touched with dampness, and Jim was tired after a long day's work in the factory. Home and his armchair, the evening paper, and the "kids," and a talk with the wife, were pleasant memories to Jim just then. "Who gets your vote, Jim?" asked a waiting neighbor. "Don't know yet," was the answer, "I'm still figurin' and studyin'."

Jim is a citizen of whom we are proud, or ought to be. A glance over the shoulder of the registry clerk discloses the fact that Jim was born and bred in this district, that he has been enrolled in the military census, that at the age of thirty-seven he owns his little home, and that he has voted regularly. This good citizen looks on the vote not so much as a privilege as a duty. He knows its power, and the responsibility that comes with power. He is aware that bad men usually make bad government; and while he has never reasoned deeply on the subject, he knows that a government built on corruption is the most powerful aid at the service of hell for the gradual moral corruption of the people. Bad government means open viciousness, or toleration of iniquity in high places and in low; in the halls of the mighty, behind closed doors, in the slums and the tenement districts, where it casts its baleful shadow across the lives of innocent children. It is not probable that Jim has ever read the Encyclical of Leo XIII on "The Chief Duties of Christians as Citizens," but the experience common to all who have been obliged to struggle for a living, has taught him the justice of the Pontiff's indictment of men who "aspire unjustly, and with their might strive to gain control over public affairs, and lay hands on the rudder of the State, in order that legislation may the more easily be adapted" to unchristian principles, "and the morals of the people influenced in accordance with them." Jim, therefore, arrives with this great Pontiff, at the conclusion that "it is fit and proper to give support to men of acknowledged worth," and it is for the purpose of singling these men out that Jim is still "figurin' and studyin'".

There was once a notorious malefactor of great wealth who said that any man who joined the militia, served on a jury, or cast a vote, was a fool for his pains. "Politics," in itself an interest as innocent as botany, has become a name of ill-omen, a synonym for dishonesty, largely because the aloofness of citizens good in other respects, has allowed men of low principles to assume the practical control of civil government. In the United States we are said to have the privilege of choosing our rulers, and of deposing them when their usefulness is at an end. To make an intelligent use of the franchise is, therefore, the duty of every citizen. It is, in a sense, that function of government which the individual must supply, if the welfare of the State is to be preserved. Without a discerning electorate, democracy collapses. Furthermore, no Catholic need be reminded either of the Church's disdain of partisan politics, or of her deep interest in securing a government that will suppress evil, and promote the good. Viewed in this light, an intelligent use of the franchise may very readily become a matter of conscience. The "good citizen" who never votes is in reality a very bad citizen. It is his negligence that puts corrupt politicians in the seats of the mighty. One vote for a good man on election day is worth ten volumes of complaint and recrimination, issued in de luxe editions, during the electionless years that follow.

An Unknown Hero

THE Calamianes Islands, as you are probably not aware, considered ecclesiastically, are in the Prefecture-Apostolic of Palawan. That division comprises the Palawan, Iwahig Penal Colony, the Culion Leper Colony, the Cuyo and Calamianes Settlements, a motley grouping, fit to delight the heart of its apostolic bishop. For further information, one may thumb a very large geographical lexicon; but even in the latest and most extensive, the curious seeker will find no information such as is printed on page 798 of that very sober volume, Kenedy's "Catholic Directory for 1917":

Calamianes Islands. Culion (Leper Colony). Rev. Felipe Millan, S.J., Rev. José Tarrago, S.J. 1 Lay Brother and 9 Sisters of St. Paul. (Father Tarrago, in his service as chaplain, became infected with leprosy and is now confined inside the colony. His previous efficient work is now increased greatly.)

The simple heroism of a man who welcomes leprosy because it draws him nearer to the afflicted, in striking and literal accord with St. Paul who would make himself all things to all men that he might win all for Christ, brings out the shame of our sordid self-seeking. Yet it makes us proud of the sublimity to which this poor nature of ours can attain. In most civilized countries, physical ill-health is held a cause that fairly justifies retirement from active service. Not so is it with the Catholic missionary. When he leaves civilization for Christ's dear sake, he leaves all those conventions of civilization that make for personal comfort; often like another Paul or Francis, he bears about in his body the marks of the wounds of Christ. The world knows nothing of Padre Tarrago and his life of martyrdom; but assuredly the Angels of God look down with joy upon that brave man laboring in his loathsome leper colony on a barren island, set in the lonely waters of the far Eastern seas. His are the scarred hands of a warrior, and his name will be written in God's great book as one who greatly dared, and died, fighting in the service of his King.

"The Man With the Hammer"

THE blows of the hammer which nailed to the old oak door of the Wittenberg church, four centuries ago, the theses of the Reformation are still resounding in the world today. As the haze of centuried myths is slowly lifting the man who wielded the hammer is now standing forth more clearly than ever in the light of history. He is no longer the saint of pious fiction. In the very midst of its eulogy the Epworth Herald pauses to say:

Even in that day there was plenty of Christian conscience against a plurality of wives, and Luther laid himself open to the charge that he was defending in one of high station what he would have condemned in one of humble position. It was a foolish as well as a sinful thing for him to do.

Nor is this the only serious fault to be found with Luther. Protestants should realize that sanctity is incompatible with the moral delinquencies of a man who granted the luxury of polygamy for the sake of princely patronage; who justified prevarication of the most serious nature for the good of his New Evangel; who gloried in taking upon his head the blood of the thousands of poor, misguided peasants whom his own incendiary words had driven into revolution; who, in fine, established a State tyranny of religion wherever he believed his self-invented doctrine could be enforced by the power of the sword. Needless to mention other instances of equal gravity, for all of which text and page can be cited from Luther's own writings.

But it is not so much the saint we are asked to glorify in him, as the work which he accomplished. He was indeed "the man with the hammer." Yet it was not in the task of upbuilding that this hammer was used, but in the work of destruction; nor was it against evil alone that its blows were directed.

Surely there was evil enough in the world of that day. Owing to the constant intrusion of the State in matters of religion the Christian ideals of men had greatly suffered. A new John the Baptist, a St. Francis or a St. Dominic were needed, but not a proud, imperious creature like Luther. His blows, though at times true, were in the main misdirected. Too often they were struck with spiteful and titanic hatred against the Rock on which Christ had built His Church. He had blinded himself to the one obvious truth: that if the Church of sixteen centuries, as it then existed upon earth, the only Church which dated back to Apostolic days, could have taught a single falsehood, the promise of Christ would have been false when He said that He would abide with her forever. All Christianity would then be nothing more than one gigantic delusion. Reformation of the lives of men according to the infallible doctrine of the Church, and not reformation of the doctrine itself was the great need of the day.

It was a simple thing to destroy imaginary doctrines which the Church herself abhorred beyond all words: the supposed sanction of the sale of indulgences, the dishonor said to have been cast by her upon holy Matrimony, the alleged Divine worship rendered to the Blessed Virgin, to the Saints and their relics, the feigned withholding of the Word of God from the people, and the absurd belief ascribed to her that heaven might be gained by external works alone without true repentance for the sins committed and the reformation of life. But the great pity of it all is, that even to the present day these and other similar absurdities are still ascribed to her in Protestant literature.

The work of Luther has been well done; but better for him and for all mankind that it had been left undone. The blows of his hammer still resound; but its only task has been to destroy, so far as lay in its power, that unity for which Christ prayed, and which today and forever remains the mark of His one true Church, whereby all men may know it to be the Church He founded upon Peter.

Costly Trifles

IF his baldness had not made Julius Caesar wear a laurel crown which aroused the suspicions of Brutus, the Roman republic would have lasted 500 years longer; if Dr. Martin Luther had only sung his Office every day, there would have been no religious upheaval in the sixteenth century; if Henry VIII had read his prayer-book during Divine service instead of appraising the beauty of Queen Catherine's maids of honor, England would have remained a Catholic country; if a royal commission of alienists had examined George III, the American Colonies would still be a portion of the British Empire; if the ends of the Kaiser's mustache were not pointed upward, the present war would not have begun. On such seeming trifles as these, we are assured by deep students of history, do world-shaking events sometimes hang.

It may be so. Who knows? Certain it is that in the histories of obscure men, in the daily round of duties and pleasures that make up the lives of humdrum people, apparent trifles often prove in the end of more moment than what are considered matters of high importance. Cold coffee and frowning silence at the breakfast table, for instance, are very costly trifles if they ultimately lead to the divorce court; a wife's love of finery or a husband's fondness for good company may be charitably called "trifling weaknesses," but if they finally menace the home with economic disaster how costly they become; tact and delicacy in social intercourse may seem mere trifles, but what important factors they are in mastering the gentle art of living pleasantly with others is attested by the costly experience of everyday life.

With the world at war, the patriotic civilians of Europe have been learning how many things there are, once thought indispensable, they can now well do without. They are surprised to find that having a modicum of food, shelter and clothing, they can be quite content, and that what yesterday were considered essentials, are today shown to be only trifles. The American people, too, before this conflict is ended, will no doubt learn the same lesson. For the hard discipline of privation will teach us how to distinguish realities from shams, necessaries from superfluities, what is of prime moment from what is merely of minor importance, and "costly trifles" from those that are trifles indeed.

Thaddeus Kosciuszko

MR. IGNATIUS PADEREWSKI is not only one of the world's great artists, he is an unselfish patriot. His musical genius has won the admiration of thousands, his whole-souled devotion to the cause of his agonizing Poland has won their love. The appeal which he made a few days ago to his countrymen to rally to the support of their native land, to fight her cause and to spend themselves that she may be free, has struck a responsive chord, not only in the breast of every Pole but in the heart of every true American.

The appeal comes almost on the very anniversary of the day when Thaddeus Kosciuszko died, a hundred years ago. It draws a peculiar significance from this fact. While for the Poles it will stir up the memories of the gallant fight for freedom made by the hero of Warsaw, it recalls to the minds of every patriotic American the splendid figure of the young Polish soldier, the companion in arms of Washington and Lafayette, who generously offered his sword, his services and his heart to the cause of the American revolution.

Republics are said to be ungrateful. We have many proofs in the case of the American republic to show that the charge is untrue. We have not forgotten the memories of our great men. The names of the Father of his country, of Franklin, of Jefferson, of Adams, of Greene, of Lincoln, of the men who suffered and toiled for the country in the days that tried men's souls, are revered and loved by every true American.

With these names we have linked those of the generous strangers who, while our fate as a nation hung in the balance, fought for our cause. The American schoolboy knows the names of Lafayette and Pulaski better perhaps than those of some of his own countrymen of the War of Independence. The name of Thaddeus Kosciuszko is no less familiar to him. And rightly so, for the services rendered by the dashing Polish officer merit the gratitude and the admiration which are paid to his memory. At the siege of New York and at Yorktown Thaddeus Kosciuszko gave most efficient help. He may be justly called the father of the artillery service in the United States, for he organized and drilled that arm according to the best European methods then known. He planned and carried out the fortifications of old West Point, and the monument at Fort Clinton perpetuates the fact. But far better than even all these invaluable services, he brought to the New World from a land of heroes the idealism and the spirit of sacrifice of the true knight. He had the privilege of drawing the sword in the New World and in the Old for the cause of freedom. In the Old World he saw freedom crushed in Poland. He was one of its saviors in the New. In life he could not accomplish what Sobieski did: save Poland from the grasp of its foes. But in death he was laid by his grateful countrymen by the side of Poland's king. Americans will be the first to acknowledge that the Catholic champion of liberty had the right to rest near the champion of the Cross.

Literature

CAMOENS

TO the lover of Catholic history and poetry, a library without Camoens would seem a strange place. It would be like a room from which a glowing picture or a splendid tapestry had been removed, for the most conspicuous thing in it would be a vacant space. As a matter of fact, there would be an element of disloyalty in forming a general collection of books and leaving out this great Catholic poet, the chief figure of the Renaissance in Portugal, and one of the finest exponents of Catholic culture in any age or country. And the present, it appears, is a good time to read Camoens and to reflect upon large issues in the lives of nations; to contrast Portugal as she is today with Portugal as she was in her hey-day before she threw away her ladder to the stars. What happens in that country now we scarce can know; it is "sound and fury, signifying nothing"; but in the old days, when to her long littoral the westward flowing rivers brought their tides of men and crowded them into golden galleons and caravels there was a different tale to tell. Then from her silver-sanded Tagus the mighty-hearted Vasco da Gama fared forth to discover the sea-route to India, to seek "Christians and spices" in that opulent land. Then Goa rose amid the Indian palms and lifted the Cross on St. Catherine's that is still a beacon to ships coming in from sea. Then Cabral discovered Brazil and the great Portuguese empire in the New World was born. Then Ascension and St. Helena were discovered and Tristao da Cunha sailed into the Archipelago that bears his name. Then the Mohammedan States in East Africa were subdued or taken; Abyssinia was entered; Mauritius was discovered, and Madagascar, and Socotra, and Ceylon. Then the Cross on the Portuguese sail was seen going north in the Red Sea to Massaua and finally to Suez. Ormuz was seized and diplomatic relations were entered into with Persia. Trading posts were established at Cochin and Calicut; Siam was found, and the Moluccas, and Portuguese dominion established in the Malay Archipelago. The wizard navigators visited Canton and began to trade with China. In 1522, a Portuguese sailor made the first voyage around the world. In 1542, the mermen discovered Japan. During the four centuries of her existence, little Portugal had become the greatest maritime, commercial and colonizing power in Europe. These dazzling exploits form the background of Camoens' verse. He is the epitome of all that wonder, the historian of the flame of Portuguese patriotism and religious ardor that once encompassed the world and, as the singer of a song that mounts even higher than the large events it celebrates, he is probably in his own person the culminating point of Portuguese greatness. Schlegel considers him a complete literature in himself. Montesquieu says that he combines the charm of the Odyssey with the magnificence of the Æneid. His epitaph designates him "Prince of Poets of His Time."

The works upon which Camoens' great fame rests are "Os Lusiads," "The Lusiads" and a collection of sonnets and lyrics. "The Lusiads" is an epic poem dealing with the rise of the Lusitani or Portuguese people, and relating the discovery of India by Vasco da Gama. Camoens was a kinsman of Gama, a fact which probably furnished him with a particular inspiration for his task. He sang his country's story in the manner of an ancient bard who has it well by heart and pours it forth like a rich cargo from a ship, not as a pearl that has been analyzed and ground to dust in the minute and laborious manner of modern historians, but synthetically, imparting a full vision at every turn. Had we never rounded the Cape, we could double it any day in his company and have all the romantic accompaniments of bellying sails and figure heads on cleaving prows; we could see "Adamastor, Spirit of the Cape," rising from the deep vocal with stormy eloquence:

> I am that mighty hidden head of land,
> The Cape of Tempests fitly named by you,
> Which Ptolemy, Mela, Strabo, never found
> Nor Pliny dreamt of, nor old Sages knew.

Camoens was well fitted by experience to describe the voyage of Vasco da Gama. His father was a sailor and died at Goa, and he, himself, went to the Indies at an early age, spending seventeen years in wild adventure in the lands and seas between Ormuz in the Persian Gulf and Macao on the coast of China. The greater part, if not the whole, of "The Lusiads" was written during his long exile. Those parts of it which deal with the Far East are a direct transcript from life, and that is probably the reason why their vitality remains untouched by time. The Malabar coast has not changed very much since Camoens' day, and anyone who knows that part of India will feel at once an entire correspondence between the aspect of the external Indian world and the expression of it in "The Lusiads."

Some critics have affected to find it strange that Camoens should have introduced into his poem the gods and nymphs and flying heroes of mythology. Such a view is very far from a true understanding of literary means. Poets must address themselves to a tradition, and Camoens was, as a matter of course, a classicist. He was a descendant of an ancient knightly and poetical family; he was educated at All Saints, one of the colleges of the Augustinian Monastery of Santa Cruz, where Greek and Latin were the languages of everyday life. From All Saints, he proceeded to the University, and there came under the influence of Montemör, the author of the great pastoral novel "Diana," and of that typical scholar and gentleman Sa de Miranda, who had returned from Italy in 1526, bringing with him the first notes of the Renaissance. With his heritage and training and these influences Camoens could not have been other than a classicist. His erudition is one of his chief glories. Writing his poem at the ends of the earth, without access to books and manuscripts, he was yet able to use his wide learning with remarkable correctness and accuracy.

Camoens' works have been rendered into English by various translators. Sir Richard Burton, who in his lifetime ranged over the Eastern territory traversed by Camoens, made his translation and the biographical sketch that accompanies it a labor of love. The most literal translation is the old-fashioned one made by Sir Richard Fanshawe. One of the best is by Aubertin. None of these translators, however, has been able to reproduce the ringing gold of Camoens' measure. He took the rough ore of his native Portuguese and minted it into perfect shapes. Like all great poets he has had many imitators, but none who followed him was able to surpass him. The tercentenary of his death was celebrated with great pomp in Portugal, and he is justly considered by the world to be the national poet par excellence.

Of all the places in the Far East that Camoens knew, none holds his memory like Macao. Travelers who go over from Hong Kong to that little "Monte Carlo of the East," as it is called, like to visit the raw silk factory, with its rainbow looms, and watch the tiresome game of fan-tan being played at the tables; but better still it is to drive up the hill from the blue bay, catching the scent of the almonds and oleanders along the road, until one comes to the garden where the great poet lived three hundred and fifty years ago. The laurels grow thick about his bronze head, the birds sing in the ilex shadows, and the very air seems to be forever speaking his name: Camoens! Wonderful poet of a wonderful age!

The Catholic's Work in the World. A Practical Solution of Religious and Social Problems of Today. By REV. JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J., Associate Editor of AMERICA. New York: The America Press. $1.00.

The present volume can be said to be of equal importance to every layman, priest and religious teacher. Our age is often spoken of as the age of the lay-apostolate. Yet while the need of lay-cooperation in promoting the interests of the Church is everywhere intensely felt, the complaint is no less universally heard that the laity are not responding sufficiently to the great call of the Church in our century. Energy and good-will can be found in abundance, but practical direction is sadly needed. Hardly a more pressing want has existed in the Catholic literature of our day than a book which could supply this guidance, which would not merely be directive in every field of Catholic lay-enterprise, but might properly motive and stimulate it, while at the same time suggesting the supernatural means which alone can give it true success.

It is not too much to say that this book has now been supplied. "The Catholic's Work in the World" should be secured and studied by every Catholic layman and woman as a complete guidebook of Catholic lay-enterprise. Yet it is equally important as a practical aid in the hands of our priests, teachers and religious in their efforts to encourage and direct the apostolic undertakings of the Catholic laity. Incidentally it will serve to enkindle in their own hearts, by the grace of God, the fires of apostolic zeal and arouse them to a fuller realization of the catholicity of the Catholic Church.

Parish priests will find in the book a means of awakening a spirit of cooperation in their parishes. Teachers in seminaries, colleges and academies can utilize it to bring home the duties, responsibilities and glorious opportunities of the Catholic laity in our century. The book is entirely modern and the result of years of careful and specialized study along the various lines of the lay-apostolate. Full account is therefore taken of all modern conditions in the civic, juridical, social, economic and educational fields of today. The volume will serve likewise as a manual for Catholic organizations and sodalities, and is suited as a mission-book to perpetuate in every Catholic home the Catholic spirit of the lay-apostolate. My Four Years in Germany. By JAMES W. GERARD, Late Ambassador to the German Imperial Court. Illustrated. New York: George H. Doran. $2.00.

These reminiscences of ex-Ambassador Gerard which have been spread far and wide by means of the daily press make very interesting reading. In the first half-dozen chapters of the volume he gives a good description of geographical, political, diplomatic, military and social Germany and in treating of the "Psychology and Causes Which Prepared the Nation for War" he expresses the opinion: "I am convinced that the fear of war induced by a hereditary instinct, caused the mass of the Germans to become the tools and dupes of those who played upon this very fear in order to create a military autocracy." In some excellent pages on "The System," the author praises the virtues of the Junkers, but does not find the lot of workingmen in the cities of Germany particularly enviable, for they "probably work longer and get less out of life than any workingmen in the world." Much of the book is taken up with accounts of Mr. Gerard's endeavors to assist stranded foreigners and to lighten the hardships of prisoners of war. A letter he sent to the German Chancellor, just before hostilities began, begging that the United States might be allowed to do something to avert the war, remained unanswered. Before his stay in Berlin ended, our Ambassador had many similar experiences which show how little control the civilian branch of the German Government has over the military.

The most important document in the book is without question the fac-simile of the autograph letter written in English, which the Emperor sent in acknowledgment of President Wilson's offer of mediation, for the Kaiser candidly owns in the concluding paragraph of the communication that Belgian neutrality "had to be violated by Germany on strategical grounds, news having been received that France was already preparing to enter Belgium, and the King of the Belgians having refused my petition for a free passage under guarantee of his country's freedom." "America had better look out after this war" was the threat the Kaiser made during an interview granted Mr. Gerard in October, 1915, but the spirited answer our Ambassador made to Count Montgelas's outrageous demand after diplomatic relations were broken off was an excellent rejoinder to the Imperial warning and will doubtless become historic. Mr. Gerard holds out no hope that Germany will break under starvation or make peace because of revolution but is of the opinion that 9,000,000 trained and entrenched German soldiers will have to be conquered before the war comes to an end. Let us hope the outlook is not so gloomy as that.

The Soul of a Bishop. By H. G. WELLS. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

How far the present volume represents the religious views of the author is not quite clear, although why the reading-world should be absorbingly interested in his views at all is hard to see. Certainly the method by which the bishop arrives at his position could not be that of the writer; nevertheless it is not impossible that the latter has found amusement in making an orthodox Anglican whittle away his Christianity until he arrived at Mr. Wells' own conclusions. At any rate, neither the bishop's conclusions nor the process by which they are reached will hold the attention of any serious religious thinker. For the whole course of his devolution is purely subjective, it is made possible only by a highly emotional and disordered state of mind, and is the result of certain fantastic visions brought on by the use of drugs.

A member of the Anglican hierarchy finds himself in possession of a not unimportant see, but having been accustomed to take things for granted, he is unable, when put to the test, to give a reason for the faith that is in him. As far as he can see, the Church is not grappling with the acute conditions of human unhappiness, principally those arising from labor conditions and the world-war; to his mind kings, emperors, priests, profit-seekers and greedy men are responsible for the present cataclysm, and in the reconstruction are destined to be sloughed away as things which have outgrown their usefulness. He has the good grace to resign from his see, for although a weakling both in thought and action, he is sincere, and after more than 300 pages of tortuous mental windings he at last enunciates his position:

> Any chapel was impossible. It is just this specialization that has been the trouble with religion. It is just this tendency to make it the business of a special sort of man, in a special sort of building, on a special day. Every man, every building, every day belongs to God. That is my conviction. I think that the only possible existing sort of religious meeting is something after the fashion of the Quaker meeting. In that there is no professional religious man at all, not a trace of the sacrifices to the ancient gods. . . . And no room for a professional religious man. . . . This is what I want to make clear to you. God is not a specialty; He is a universal interest.

The book is utterly unsatisfactory even from the mere side of plausibility. It is inconceivable how any Anglican, let alone an Anglican bishop, could have let slip his religious moorings without ever a thought of the Divinity of Christ or His mission, without so much as adverting to the fact of Revelation and its credentials. It is gratifying to note that even Mr. Wells could not conceive a Catholic bishop acting in such a fashion. One wonders whether the author was simply playing with an idle fancy, and exercising his ingenuity in leading a High Churchman with a show of plausibility by most implausible processes into the desert of unbelief. But whether this be true or not, the book is miles away from Christianity. It does not strike one sympathetic chord with Catholic belief. In fact, it is largely a synthesis of Modernistic heresies. It scoffs at Christ's descent into hell; it stigmatizes those who dispute about points of dogma as "poor fanatics and trimmers and schemers"; creeds it characterizes as mere symbols, inconsistent, incredible, and theology as a maze. Having steeped himself in modern ultra-evolutionistic explanations of religion, the bishop denies that Jesus "gave man either a theology or a church organization," and declares that it was man who "restored all these three abominations of religion, theology, priest and sacrifice."

And so the book runs on, statement follows statement, but never with even a pretense of proof, each more subversive than the former, until the bishop, never very strong in mind, stands in the end bewildered, stripped of his most sacred convictions, but somehow or other, although his grounds are not very clear even to himself, clinging to the persuasion that there is a God and a Kingdom of God, the latter, in spite of its capitals, a sort of millennium on earth, very distant, very vague, to be brought about in some incomprehensible way by doing away with every species of leadership and acknowledging only one leader, God. Catholics have nothing to learn from such a book.

Exercises in Latin Verse. By Leo T. Butler, S.J., St. Joseph's College, Philadelphia. New York: Allyn & Bacon. $0.75.

Here is a text-book that explains the composition of Latin verse in a clear and practical way. The reviewer has seen no text-book that sets forth more directly and simply difficulties that confront the student beginning to write Latin verse; and none that solves them so well. The exercises are intelligently progressive, and not too numerous, gradually making the student call upon his own resources. At the end there is a good vocabulary.

Doubtless some will ask why we should have such a text-book, anyhow. How does the making of Latin verse add to the "efficiency" of education in these days? Of what practical use is it? The magazines will not buy the verses, and whom would they interest if they were bought and published? The answer to the questions would be long, and in these days when the old art of letter-writing and the ancient art of conversation have gone the dark, forgotten way of so many other fine things, few would heed the explanation. One hopes, however, that there still remains a sufficient number of the elect who appreciate the means that have given us so many worthy scholars and gentlemen, to whom the world owes so much, but gives so little, and that grudgingly.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Among the books of interest to Catholic readers which have already been brought out, or soon will be, by English publishers, are James P. Lyell's "Life of Cardinal Ximenes" which will contain an account of his famous Complutensian Polyglot Bible. As this year is the four-hundredth anniversary of the great Cardinal's death, the biography is very timely. G. K. Chesterton's "Short History of England" is announced, and Edith Anne Stewart has written "The Life of St. Francis Xavier," based on his original letters. "Late Songs" is the title of a new volume of poetry Katharine Tynan has written. Professor T. M. Kettle's "The Ways of War," with a memoir by his wife, has been published, and Theodore Maynard's new book of poems, "Drums of Defeat" is also out. From Longmans will come such important books as "Selections from the Correspondence of the First Lord Acton," including letters to and from Gladstone, Newman, Lady Blennerhassett and Döllinger; Father Heuser's "Canon Sheehan of Doneraile," and Father Burns's "Catholic Education, a Study of Conditions." "A Father of Women" and "Hearts of Controversy" are the titles of new volumes of verse and prose by Mrs. Meynell that Burns & Oates are publishing, and John Lane announces "Gardens Overseas and Other Poems," by Thomas Walsh.

Horace Annesley Vachell has well characterized his novel, "Fishpingle" (Doran, $1.50), by the subtitle, "A Romance of the Countryside," for it would be worth the reading if it had no further purpose than to set forth its triumph of love over hide-bound traditions of caste, the more so as this is done with careful attention to detail, unhurried but sure progression of plot, and with accurate portraiture of character. The author, however, has a deeper purpose than to weave a mere romance. He puts an actual problem and suggests an answer. He sees in changing conditions in England a menace to the existence of the class of titled landowners, who though one of the finest elements of English life, are doomed to disappear, unless they realize the trend of the times and bestir themselves by sacrifice and study to meet the demands of current changes. Over and beyond its literary value, which is undoubted, the book has an interest for sociologists. Whether its solution will satisfy the requirements of post-bellum days remains to be seen.——To read Edward J. O'Brien's introduction to "The Grim Thirteen: Short Stories by Thirteen Authors of Standing" (Dodd, Mead, $1.50), one would think the volume marks an epoch in American letters. The tales, which have all been rejected "by at least one first-class magazine," are dismal attempts at the gruesome which are not worth reading.——In "House-mates" (Doran, $1.50), J. D. Beresford's latest novel, a young English architect describes the sordid life he leads among the sordid lodgers in a sordid boarding-house.

Captain Irving Goff McCann, A.M., B.D., Chaplain of the First Infantry Illinois National Guard, who says that he has found that "A Protestant church, a Catholic name and a Jewish nose are good assets for an army chaplain," went to the Mexican line with his regiment in 1916, and in a book entitled "With the National Guard on the Border" (C. V. Mosby Co., St. Louis) tells his experiences there and gives his opinion of the way things were done. Captain McCann seems to have acquired considerable misinformation about Huerta and about Mexico's recent history, and thinks annexation the only effective remedy for our present embarrassment. It is rather surprising to find a minister quoting with tacit approval a ribald parody of the Ten Commandments.——"Gunner's Handbook for Field Artillery" (Dutton, $0.40), by Captains John S. Hammond and Dawson Olmstead, Inspector Instructors, Field Artillery, U. S. A., lays down instructions for candidates qualifying for that branch of the service. As the three-inch gun battery is the standard type the matter covered has reference to that piece. What pertains to the instruction and drill of gun squads and the firing-battery will be applicable, however, with modifications, to gun and howitzer batteries other than the three-inch. As recent changes in the development of field artillery instruction have rendered many former texts useless, the present pamphlet furnishes in condensed and simple form a text to supply adequate and up-to-date instruction for the modern field artillery candidate.

"The Student's Catholic Doctrine" (Benziger), by Charles Hart, B.A., in 381 pages, crown octavo, gives an excellent outline of Catholic teaching adapted for the college and high school, for the interested layman and especially for the prospective convert. It is a practical treatise covering both dogma and morals, with here and there helpful points from history and suggestions of a devotional nature. While of course having none of the fulness or profundity of Wilhelm and Scannell's superb work, it will be useful not only for the teacher but even for the hard-working priest in preparing popular catechetical instructions.——"Devil and Devilry" (Benziger), by William Lieber, aims at giving in six brief chapters the Catholic doctrine concerning the existence, nature and work of the evil spirit, with special emphasis in the last chapter on Spiritism. Being a popular and short treatise, it will please especially the busy layman of an inquiring turn of mind.

Perhaps the article in the September Studies that will have the widest appeal is Alfred Rahilly's "Faith and Facts." He takes up the accounts given by leading men of science of their loss of faith in Christianity and proves that their unbelief preceded the investigation of the so-called facts. And as for those smaller fry whom prominent atheists lead astray, they are generally "quite incompetent to test the facts, to examine the faith, to establish their incompatibility. They have certainly lost faith in Christ and substituted therefor faith in some professor or writer." One of the poems in the number is this sonnet on "The Nun."

She swings the incense of her thought
  Before the quiet throne of God;
He is the lover she has sought
  She finds Him where no foot has trod,
She hears Him where no voice is heard,
  For she has gone the secret way
Only the innocent may go
  And she has learned the secret word
Only the innocent may say;
  Time passes gently by her so
Her days are like the quiet tune
  Of waters that go murmuring by
When in the fragant lap of June
  The indolent green meadows lie.

Other important articles in this number of Studies are "The People, the State and the Drink Problem," by Peter Coffey, and "Péguy and His Circle," by Virginia M. Crawford.

EDUCATION

English Composition in the Grades

THE work in English composition in the elementary school falls naturally into three main divisions. The primary teachers can cultivate ease or fluency of speech. In the intermediate grades, the particular aim should be to secure coherency. To freedom and coherence, the grammar grade pupil should add accuracy, and some degree of polish.

In the first three grades the work is almost entirely oral, and consists for the most part of conversations on subjects familiar to the children, and reproductions of stories told by the teacher. The first aim of this work is to get the children to talk freely; when timidity has been overcome, errors may be corrected. The most effective method of eradicating errors is drill on the use of correct forms. The drill most likely to be needed in the primary grades is that on verb forms: did, done; saw, seen; came, come; ran, run; is, are; was, were. The stories for reproduction may be chosen from the Bible, lives of the Saints, folk stories, fables, legends, myths, and should be short and simple. At first a single incident is enough; as the power of attention increases, longer stories may be selected. The story should be repeated often enough to enable the pupils to have a clear understanding of the whole, but not so often that they will memorize it. By the end of the third year, children should be able to repeat fairly accurately a narrative of three or four simple incidents, heard once. Dramatization of simple stories will help to arouse and sustain interest, and will also indicate the pupils' growth in attention and understanding.

As an important part of this work, the child should learn that in order to be a good speaker he must have something worth while to say, and then say it correctly and pleasingly. He should know that his story is much more interesting, and that others are more eager to listen to him, if he stands erect, looks at his audience freely but respectfully, is careful of his gestures, and speaks distinctly enough to be heard easily.

Sentence-building and Memory Work

NO original written work should be required in the first year. Toward the end of the year, words, phrases and short sentences may be copied for the purpose of training in accuracy of observing and reproducing the written word. After the first year, the children may begin to write original sentences based upon the oral work. Gradually longer sentences may be tried, and sentences may be combined to form a paragraph. A single paragraph of three or four sentences is enough to require in original work in the third grade. By the end of the third year a pupil should have mastered certain fundamental rules of written composition. He should know the more common use of capitals, the use of the period and of the question mark; he should be familiar with the abbreviations in ordinary use, should know the correct form for a paragraph.

From the very beginning of the first grade, children can and should memorize simple poetry. Several good poems, suited to the age of the children, should be memorized during every year of their school life. As a test of accuracy of study and comprehension, as well as for practice in writing, the children in every grade above the first may occasionally be required to write poems from memory.

The Intermediate Grades

IN the grades above the third, the children will be able to gather much of their own material for composition; but the teacher must guide them in selecting suitable material, and in adapting it to the purposes of the composition class. Material for composition may be drawn from the work in religion, history, geography, nature study, and from the games, entertainments, or other interests of the children in and out of school. Here, as in the lower grades, a large part of the work will be oral. In all recitations, clearness and coherency of expression will be exacted. To describe a place or an object so accurately that it may be recognized from the description, or to tell how an action is done, whether it be the playing of a game, the solving of a problem in arithmetic, or the making of some article in manual training, or sewing, or cooking class, gives excellent practice in the use of clear, well-connected statements.

All written work in these grades should be based upon oral work. Not until pupils have clear ideas upon a subject, and have organized those ideas and expressed them in a few well-formed sentences, should they be asked to write their composition. The topics assigned should not be too long, and they should be very definite. Careful attention should be given to the neatness and correctness of written work. Spelling, punctuation and paragraph form will require constant drill. As an incentive to careful work, pupils may write some of their compositions on the blackboard for criticism by the class. Children will do their best to have their work perfect when it is to be submitted to the class.

Letter-writing will be one of the important exercises of these grades. The correct form for social and business letters, and the addressing of the envelope, should be learned in the fourth and fifth grades. Letters of at least two paragraphs should be within the ability of sixth-grade pupils. Writing letters from dictation is valuable for drill in the mechanics of letter writing.

The Higher Grades

IN the seventh and eighth grades, grammar as a formal, systematic subject should be studied as an aid in composition. The purpose of the study should be to gain in exactness and certainty of expression. A knowledge of the principles of grammar lays a foundation for correct and fluent speech. In this work essential principles should be insisted upon, and all except essentials eliminated.

In the composition work of these grades, the teacher must test the ability of the pupils and make sure of the foundation before proceeding further. If the pupils are deficient in any point, it will be necessary to go back and remedy the deficiency. Seventh-grade pupils should be trained to think in paragraph units. If they can do this, then they can work for greater facility in speaking, and they may try to add polish to their talks. If their ability to think is not developed, it is vain to attempt to develop facility in speaking or writing.

One important thing to be learned in the grades, and especially in the seventh and eighth grades, is how to study, that is, how to grasp the chief points of any lesson assigned, and to group all the other facts of the lesson around these few central points. The work in composition should be of great value in this training, for from the very beginning the child must learn to group details according to their relative importance. When he has learned to reproduce a "story" containing one situation or incident, he may attempt a subject that has two main divisions; two paragraphs, if the composition is written. This practice should have aroused in the pupil, even before he reaches the seventh grade, a tendency to look for the principal thought, the paragraph topic, of every paragraph he reads. If he has not acquired this habit he must work to acquire it now.

Outlines and Notes

IN both seventh and eighth grades, pupils should learn to make outlines of the topics they are to discuss, and to develop the theme from the outline. Taking notes on the assigned lessons is an excellent practice. Teachers should guide the pupils carefully in this work, and help them to make notebooks that will be really useful. Recitations in which pupils talk from carefully prepared notes may be asked for occasionally. Reviews of books, reports of visits to places of interest, as museums, factories, office buildings, schools, or classes in their own school, may be the subjects of such recitations.

Throughout the grammar grades, written work is important, not as an end in itself, but as a preparation and a help to speech. Practice in writing should give facility in speech, and it should cultivate accuracy. The subjects for written as well as for oral composition in the upper grades may be drawn from practically all the other courses in the curriculum. Subjects for description may be taken from geography, history, industrial work, personal observation. For narration the work in history, sacred and secular, current events and individual experiences will furnish material.

The Ultimate Purpose

EXPOSITION should form part of the composition work of the grammar grades. For practice in exposition, let pupils give explanations of processes in arithmetic, directions for making some article in their industrial courses, discussions of present-day movements, political, social, financial, in which they are interested. Most important of all the subjects chosen for this work will be those drawn from religion; the Sacraments, the ceremonies of the Church, the fundamental articles of Faith. A pupil finishing the eighth grade of a Catholic school should be able to give a clear, convincing explanation of at least the essentials of religion. If he cannot do this, the school in which he has been trained can scarcely be said to have accomplished its purpose. He cannot do it unless he has learned to think clearly and to express his thoughts coherently and definitely. This, after all, should be the aim of all work in English composition.

SOCIOLOGY

Free Speech in Peace and War

WAR bread is not the loaf that was served at the justly celebrated feast of Barmecides. In fact, as Mr. Hoover seems to wish us to understand the matter, war bread is bread made as it should always be made; from flour that is the product of selected wheat, ground by honest millers in such wise that its highest nutritive qualities are preserved. Substances of a homelier yet equally pure nature, such as rye and potatoes, are sometimes introduced into the mass; but the winning charm of war bread is that while it may not be beautiful, it is always wholesome.

Just now the war bread which the Government is baking for the consumption of sundry pompous pacifists and platitudinous professors, is made up largely of respect for constituted authority. There is such a condition as overfeeding, but all of us may be helped by partaking now and then of that same bread. "Free speech" has been something of a creed with us in this last generation, and so latitudinarian did we become that we extended the name even to speech that was quite free from thought. Grown enamored of our idol, we find the rejection or modification of our creed, a serious trial of faith. The trial is all the keener, since there is an element of truth in the creed, without which no government such as ours can long endure. For without freedom of speech and of the press, guaranteed by the Constitution, a republic, such as we conceive it, is impossible. Deprived of this freedom, a democracy is a complete negation of the fine Jeffersonian principle that no majority, however great, may violate the rights of the minority, and soon becomes but another name for autocracy.

The Precise Boundary

AS President Wilson has recently pointed out, it sometimes becomes difficult to define the precise boundary beyond which free speech passes into license. In many instances, however, as in the Elizabeth Flynn-Tresca case in Paterson two years ago, the line can be drawn with a satisfactory clearness. Perhaps nothing shows more amusingly and at the same time more instructively, the change of public opinion on the question of free speech than that particular instance. In August, 1915, one Miss Elizabeth Gurley Flynn with Carlo Tresca and other professional "agitators," now under indictment for felony by the Federal Grand Jury, announced a mass-meeting in the city of Paterson, New Jersey, for the first week in September. No one can deny that the general conditions of labor in that mill city were deplorable; but precisely because of the industrial unrest, and of the turbulent character of the speakers, the Mayor of the city believed that their coming to Paterson would be equivalent to the outbreak of riot. This belief was not a baseless apprehension. In 1913 Miss Flynn, with other I. W. W. agitators, had visited the city. The result was a strike of twenty-two weeks' duration, which cost the city millions of dollars, and brought the workers a season of abject misery never to be forgotten. After conferring with his legal advisers, the Mayor, acting in his official capacity, ordered the police to prevent the holding of the mass-meeting. What took place when Miss Flynn attempted to enter the hall is thus described in the Paterson Chronicle for September 5, 1915, quoting the words of Chief of Police Bimson:

> Miss Flynn, I have received orders from the Mayor and the city officials to prevent you and all other I. W. W. agitators from speaking in this city. . . . You are what is commonly termed an undesirable citizen. Why do you come here to disturb the peace of this city? The citizens and the taxpayers don't want you. You remember the strike of two years ago which caused a loss of millions of dollars to the city? Well, we're not going to have another such happening. You've been put out of Bayonne and other cities, and we intend to keep you out of here. . . . It's the likes of you and the other I. W. W. agitators who incite them [the mill-workers] to violence.

In this case the authorities were clearly within their rights. Yet, "Has Paterson seceded from the Union?" gravely asked one of New York's most benighted, subsidized journals.

What the Solons Said

LEST this gem of wisdom, cut and polished by the New Republic, be lost, it is here given in the original setting:

> We understand that Paterson, N. J., has seceded from the United States. The Chamber of Commerce, the Mayor, and the Chief of Police among them have abrogated the Constitution, and have decided that they will use force to prevent Miss Elizabeth Gurley Flynn from addressing the mill-workers. "You may have the right, but we have the power" is the candid way these official ruffians proclaim their policy, and the only people who seem in the least concerned are a few brave women and a few scattered editors. The rulers of Paterson are about the most dangerous citizens this country harbors, and we should like to suggest to all those concerned about the lawlessness of Germany in Belgium that Paterson is worthy of their immediate attention and utmost energy. As between von Bissing in Belgium and Bimson in Paterson, Bimson is perhaps the greater enemy of civilization.

With grave approval was this sophomoric opinion on constitutional law, reprinted by the Globe, which has lately thrown up hands in shocked horror at the minor iniquities of Doctors Cattell, Dana and Beard at Columbia. "Anyone debarring her [Miss Flynn] or anyone else from freedom of utterance, is recreant to a fundamental American principle, and introduces a species of lawlessness most dangerous to peace and quiet." (Globe, November 9, 1915.) What great words we were wont to use before the war! "President Wilson knows these things," continued the Globe, returning to the charge on November 12, "Governor Fielder knows them, John W. Griggs, formerly Attorney General of the United States, who resides in Paterson, knows them." Because they knew "these things" is probably the reason why they moved no action against the valiant Bimson, who as a prudent warrior took no chances when he faced Miss Flynn. "Paterson," wrote the usually sane Rochester Democrat, under the caption, "Lawless Paterson," "cannot afford to acquire the reputation of trampling on human rights." One wonders how many of these journals are today ready to spring to the defense of Miss Flynn, under indictment in 1917, simply because she continued to advocate principles which she preached in Paterson in 1913, and attempted to propagate in that city two years later.

When War Comes

NO State department, it need hardly be said, may repeal the First Amendment to the Constitution on "freedom of religion, of speech and of the press, and the right of petition." An article is amended or abolished by those who made it, the States. No doubt in the troubled days that war may bring, the various departments, in the prosecution of their respective purposes may invoke means thoroughly lawful, but at first deemed autocratic because of long disuse. Presumption favors authority; furthermore, a fit sense of good order impels to complete and immediate submission, with the right of appeal to the proper tribunal, however, always reserved. The fact of war does not change the principle upon which the First Amendment is based; but it may, and probably will, affect temporarily the application of the principle in certain instances. It is only axiomatic to say that in a government which is a government by laws, not by persons, it must rest with rightly constituted authority, and not with the individual, to decide what may or may not be said or published. There is a world of solid political wisdom in the quaint reflections of old Jed, the tower-man, a character in Mrs. Alice Hegan Rice's recent novel, "Calvary Alley."

> Nothin' good ever comes from breakin' laws. They wouldn't a-been made into laws if they was n't fer our good, an' even when we don't see no reason fer keepin' 'em, we ain't got no more right to break through, than one of them engines up at the crossing's got a right to come ahead when I signals it from the tower to stop. I been handin' out laws to engines fer goin' on thirty year, an' I never seen one yet that bust over a law that didn't come to grief. You keep on the track, Sister, an' watch the signals an' obey orders an' you'll find it pays in the end.

Liberty can be preserved only by making the reign of law unquestioned; as unquestioned as the signals of the man in the tower. "Law has no meaning," writes a recognized authority, the Hon. James Bronson Reynolds, "unless it is enforced, peaceably, if possible; forcibly, if necessary."

State and Individual

A CASE in point is the conscription law, opposed by a small minority, although it should be noted that few bills have gone through Congress with smaller opposition. What was once a proposal, properly open to criticism and fierce attack, is now the law of the land. To violate it or to urge its violation is felony. To engineer its repeal, however, may conceivably be unpatriotic, unwise, imprudent, but not, strictly speaking, beyond the right of any citizen, any more than it is outside his right to work for the repeal of any law. Nevertheless, he is strictly accountable for the form assumed by his opposition, and his activities, should they be held to conflict with the country's adopted policy, may rightly be suppressed by the authorities. This is not autocracy, but the legitimate functioning of government, based on the principle that in the conflict of rights the common welfare must take precedence.

Practically, however, common-sense as well as patriotism eschews hair-splitting, and counsels the sincere support of rightly constituted authority in this as in all other matters which fall within its sphere. "He that resisteth the power," writes St. Paul, "resisteth the ordinance of God, and they that resist, purchase to themselves damnation." Therefore, in the words of Leo XIII, "No better citizen is there, whether in time of peace or war, than the Christian who is mindful of his duty." His faithfulness to Almighty God is the guarantee that he will be duly mindful of the things that belong to Cæsar.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

"Bishups, Vickers, and Curits"

THE Ave Maria quotes from the New Jersey Monitor an Anglican schoolboy's essay on clergymen. The observant youth makes the following scientific classification: "There are three kinds of clurgymen—bishups, vickers, and curits. The bishups tell the vickers to work, and the curits do it. A curit is a thin, married man; but when he is a vicker he gets fuller, and then he becomes a good man." The Ave Maria hints at the suspicion that some "thin, married man" may have made the suggestion to the youthful essayist, since "Anglican vicars are called 'tongs,' which are seldom put to use, and curates are called 'pokers' on account of being in frequent requisition."

Father Campbell's Jubilee

ON Thursday, October 11, the fiftieth anniversary of the Rev. Thomas J. Campbell's entrance into the Society of Jesus was joyfully celebrated at Fordham University, New York, by his religious brethren. Father Campbell was born in 1848, went to the novitiate, Sault-au-Récollet, Canada, at the age of seventeen, taught literature at Fordham and St. Francis Xavier's, New York, did a course of philosophy at Woodstock and of theology at Louvain, and was ordained in 1880. He was made Rector of Fordham in 1885, Provincial of the Maryland-New York Province in 1888, and again Rector of Fordham in 1896. He was on the Messenger staff from 1900 to 1908, Editor of AMERICA from 1910 to 1914, and passed several years in Canada occupied in research work. Father Campbell found time amid his administrative and literary work to preach a great deal and a book of his sermons and addresses is now in the press, as is also a two-volume "History of the Society of Jesus" from his pen. His other books, "Pioneer Priests of North America" and "Pioneer Laymen of North America," in five volumes, are widely known and read. Father Campbell at sixty-nine is an active member of the Fordham University staff and so far is he from thinking that it is time to retire from the class-room, he is now giving the young men of Fordham a course in evidences. Father Campbell's countless friends will be glad to hear that he bears his years so lightly and will heartily wish him "Ad multos annos" still.

Knights of Columbus War Activities

THE complete charge of the foreign work of the Knights of Columbus has been consigned to Mr. Walter N. Kernan, vice-president and general counsel of the New York State railways. He has resigned his position to act in his new capacity as Knights of Columbus Commissioner with the American army overseas. He is to be surrounded at his headquarters in Paris by a complete staff of assistants and nearly 100 field secretaries. The latter have already been selected and are to join him within the next few weeks to assume charge of the Knights of Columbus recreation work in the camps and at the front. Mr. Kernan has the cordial endorsement of the American Cardinals and of Cardinal Amette, Archbishop of Paris. It is likewise particularly gratifying to hear that five additional chaplains have been selected for service in France. They are Rev. John B. de Valles, of North Dighton, Mass.; Rev. Osias Boucher, of New Bedford, Mass.; Rev. Michael Nivard, of Sparta, Wis.; Rev. Camille de Loux, of New Milton, W. Va., and Rev. John J. Sullivan, of Tuckahoe,

N. Y. The amendment of the Chamberlain bill, which would have meant an increase in the regularly commissioned chaplain quota, has been deferred by the House committee and no further action will be possible until the next session of Congress. Since additional chaplains are necessary they must be supplied through the Knights of Columbus Committee on War Activities, and supported by the fund raised by American Catholics.

The American Red Cross in France

THE news service of the American Red Cross reports that a staff of 864 persons has been gathered together by the Red Cross Commission in France, under the direction of Major Grayson M. P. Murphy. The greater portion of these are serving without salary or living allowance from the Red Cross. Among the volunteers, we are told, are prominent American business men, technical experts, and women experienced in the handling of relief supplies.

> There are 347 employees on the Red Cross pay-roll, including 95 day laborers, used in handling supplies and in construction. The average wage paid to these 347 persons is $800 per year. Major Grayson M. P. Murphy cables further that he is "carefully studying pay-rolls with a view to further reduction." The remaining 517 workers are either serving without compensation and at their own expense, or are paid by their former employers, who have lent them to the Red Cross for war service, or are paid from private subscriptions. Of our 347 employees paid from the Red Cross fund, Major Murphy cables, 262 receive annual compensation of less than $1,200 per year. Fifty employees receive compensation of $1,200 and $2,100 annually. Fifteen employees receive from the Red Cross annual compensation in excess of $2,100 per annum.
> The staff of over 800 persons is handling the entire relief work of the American Red Cross in France, which has developed to huge proportions as one need after another has been noted by the Commission's expert investigators. Already plans calling for the expenditure of more than $10,000,000 in behalf of the American army in France and French troops and the French civilian population have been outlined.

The headquarters of the American Red Cross in Paris are in an ample building on the Place de la Concorde, provided rent free for the use of the Commission by one of its members.

A Food Conservation Canvass

THE chairman of the New York publicity department of the Food Adminstration campaign announces a local house-to-house canvass which is to begin on October 21 and will be conducted by from 16,000 to 20,000 volunteer workers. In a press circular he seeks to make plain what the organization hopes to effect:

> Nothing extraordinary is exacted! In fact, nothing is exacted. The American housewife is not to be advised how she shall conduct her household.
> It is not made a condition of the Food Campaign that she shall put her home-life, so far as the table is concerned, on a war-basis that suggests the policing of her food supplies. Rather is it to avoid what all countries abroad have had to accept: the policing of the table. The American housewife is called upon, in this instance, to be a leader in the restoration of frugal living, and frugality does not mean a lack of plenty. She is asked, too, let it be kept in mind, to do only those things which her circumstances and the immediate demands of her family-group will permit. It is suggested that she try to save 1 pound of wheat flour every week; that she save 2 ounces of fats every week; that she save 7 ounces of sugar every week; that she save 7 ounces of meat every week.

The campaign commission admits that not every family can do all that is required, since thousands of families have difficulty in providing the actual necessities of life. Housewives, under such circumstances, are asked to sign the pledge card "and thereby become directly and intimately associated with armies of their sisters all over the land in the movement to prevent waste of food, and, by economy in its use, conserve larger quantities for the peoples abroad who cannot produce enough for their own needs."

A Brilliant Columbus Pageant

A NEW historic pageant, "The Discovery of America," has been conceived by the Rev. Thomas F. Coakley and was brilliantly staged by J. Woodman Thompson at St. Paul's Cathedral Hall, Pittsburgh. The following description is taken from the Pittsburgh Dispatch:

The pageant opens with a prologue by a herald who states that the object of the pageant is the presenting of the unadorned truth about Columbus's voyage of discovery and the throwing of more light on the subject. There is a very beautiful effect at the opening of the first episode when the distant chanting of the Magnificat, by the monks at Vespers in the monastery of La Rabida, is heard. Columbus and his son, Diego, hungry and weary, approach the monastery, where they receive food and shelter. An opportunity is given for a bewildering brilliant color effect when a crowd of Spanish peasants appear.

The court of King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella is the setting for the second episode. Medieval tapestries and carvings and splendor of costuming mark it, and the acting has a restraint and dignity not often found in an amateur production. Columbus shows the King a map made by Irish sailors 600 years before, showing the land which he is seeking and which is called St. Brendan's Land.

The last episode shows the arrival of Columbus and his men at their destination. They sing the hymn of praise and the Latin chant as they plant the Cross on the soil of a new world, which finish the pageant.

The success of the performances was assured by the beauty and dignity of the drama and the "riot of brilliant Spanish colors." The proceeds are to be devoted to the work of the Knights of Columbus in the army cantonments.

A Memorial Church to Father Ryan

AN appeal for the erection of a memorial church in honor of the poet-priest of the South, Father Ryan, has been sent out to members of the Ancient Order of Hibernians, signed by all their national officers. It is drawn up by the State chaplain of Alabama, Rev. T. J. Eaton, pastor of St. Mary's Church, Mobile, Ala., whose church and rectory were "the home of the poet-priest."

> Here it was that Father Ryan dreamed and here it was that his great heart burned with a passionate love for our native holy Ireland, so dear to us the exiles from its loved and witching hills. Today St. Mary's is a very modest, weatherbeaten frame building, entirely unworthy as such, of the memory of the gentle mystic with whose fame it is inseparably associated. We hope to be able to replace it with a more lasting and resplendent tribute in stone, and for this we beg for the cooperation of the Ancient Order of Hibernians, feeling that as the mother cannot forget the son she bore, nor a nation her illustrious children, neither should we Irish forget those Sons of Ireland who have given additional luster to the race.

The first reason for making this appeal national is because the Irish in the South are too few and too poor to build with their own means a fitting memorial. "The fame of the deathless Irish dead, among them Father Ryan, should be perpetuated in some such worthy manner, and the movement would not be an Irish one if it were not universal." Obviously the erection of such an imposing church in a non-Catholic section of our country would contribute greatly to the prestige of the Catholic Faith itself. This consideration should weigh with the Hibernians as a stronger argument even than the glory that will redound to their own Order.

Chronicle

The War.—The center of interest has shifted this week from the western front, where neither side has won any substantial gains, to the Gulf of Riga. The capture of Riga by the Germans some weeks ago could not be utilized by them until they were masters of its approaches by sea. These are now in their hands. The movement against them, whose initial stages were recorded in last week's chronicle, has continued with practically unbroken success except on Dagö Island, where the Russians are still offering some resistance. Under cover of the superior guns of the German fleet the troops already landed on Oesel Island took the capital, Arensburg, obtained control of the Svorb peninsula, and by extremely rapid work in cutting off communication with the mainland forced the surrender of the Russian garrisons, the Germans claiming in all their operations about 13,000 prisoners. The occupation of Oesel is now complete. The next step was the seizure of Moon Island, which was effected with the same dispatch. The Russian garrison, smaller here than on Oesel Island, was also taken prisoner. The entire entrance to the Gulf is thus in German hands. The Russian ships, at first reported to be trapped between Moon Sound to the north and Irbe Channel to the south, are said now to have escaped into the Gulf of Finland. The German fleet is variously reported as numbering from sixty to eighty units, among them ten dreadnoughts.

Bulletin, Oct. 15, p.m.-Oct. 22, a.m.

It is reported that the Russians, fearing that Petrograd is to be the next point of attack, are preparing to move the Government to Moscow. The Russian naval base at Reval, about a hundred miles up the coast of the Gulf of Finland from Oesel Island, has been evacuated, apparently without any direct pressure from the foe. Reval is the first of the fortresses which a hostile fleet entering the Gulf of Finland would encounter. Beyond it there are Viborg, Helsingsfors and Kronstadt, the latter the key to Petrograd. The distance from the islands at the head of the Gulf of Riga to Petrograd is about 300 miles.

On October 19 Mr. Daniels, Secretary of the Navy, authorized the official announcement of the sinking of the American transport Antilles. The news of the sinking was contained in a dispatch from Vice-Admiral Sims, which stated that the steamship Antilles, an army transport, was torpedoed on October 17 while returning to this country from foreign service. The Antilles was under convoy of American patrol vessels at the time. The torpedo which struck the Antilles was not seen, nor was the vessel which fired it. The torpedo hit abreast of the engine room bulkhead, and the ship sank within five minutes. One hundred and sixty-seven persons out of about 237 on board the transport were saved, about seventy men being lost. This disaster, the first of its kind that has occurred since the American Government began the task of transporting its army to France, marks our heaviest loss in submarine warfare since the destruction of the Lusitania.

The Sinking of the Antilles

On October 20 an official bulletin from the British Admiralty announced that two fast and heavily armed German raiders attacked a convoy in the North Sea, about midway between the Shetland Islands and the Norwegian coast, October 17. Two British destroyers were sunk after a short engagement. The raiders subsequently sank by gunfire five Norwegian, one Danish and three Swedish vessels, all unarmed, and returned safely to their base.

The President has designated Sunday, October 28, as a day of prayer "on which our people should be called upon to offer concerted prayer to Almighty God for His Divine aid in the success of our arms." The proclamation is as follows:

A Day of Prayer

> Whereas, The Congress of the United States, by a concurrent resolution adopted on the fourth day of the present month of October, in view of the entrance of our nation into the vast and awful war which now afflicts the greater part of the world, has requested me to set apart, by official proclamation, a day on which our people should be called upon to offer concerted prayer to Almight God for His Divine aid in the success of our arms, and
> Whereas, it behooves a great free people, nurtured as we have been in the eternal principles of justice and of right, a nation which has sought from the earliest days of its existence to be obedient to the Divine teachings which have inspired it in the exercise of its liberties, to turn always to the Supreme Master and cast themselves in faith at His feet, praying for His aid and succor in every hour of trial, to the end that the great aims to which our fathers dedicated our power as a people may not perish among men, but be always asserted and defended with fresh ardor and devotion and, through the Divine blessings, set at last upon enduring foundations for the benefit of all the free peoples of the earth.

Now, therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, gladly responding to the wish expressed by the Congress, do appoint October 28, being the last Sunday of the present month, as a day of supplication and prayer for all the people of the nation, earnestly exhorting all my countrymen to observe the appointed day according to their several faiths, in solemn prayer that God's blessing may rest upon the high task which is laid upon us, to the end that the cause for which we give our lives and treasure may triumph and our efforts be blessed with high achievements.

The proclamation honors both the President and the people of the United States.

France.—In France as elsewhere the enemies of the Papacy have tried to make capital out of the Pope's peace note. With a view to discrediting the Holy Father, they have characterized his action in addressing the belligerents as an unwarranted assumption of authority and as a claim to a right not possessed by him. The Archbishop of Bordeaux, Cardinal Andrieu, has answered this charge in a letter recently communicated to his diocese, in which he shows that the Pope never assumed the role of judge or arbitrator, but acted solely from the desire of so far conciliating the belligerents as to pave the way for peace discussions, without however contemplating an immediate cessation of hostilities. He points out that the Holy Father was well within his rights in lifting his voice on a moral problem, the solution of which must depend on the eternal law of which he is the interpreter and the guardian. Not only was the Pope justified in pleading for peace, he maintains, but he was under an obligation, as the father of all Christians, to remind the world that further appeal to armed force, with its disastrous consequences to the human race, is illicit, if the restoration of violated right can be compassed by other means. As for his silence with regard to the crimes committed by certain of the belligerents, the Cardinal points out that the Pope is the father of the entire Christian family, and, as such, might well have paternal motives for reticence. The Cardinal ends his pastoral by enlarging on the duties of his Catholic subjects:

Cardinal Andrieu's Letter

> The Sovereign Pontiff places his efforts, which have for their single source of inspiration the dictates of his conscience, under the auspices of the Divine Redeemer, the Prince of Peace, and he again recommends to us prayer and penance. It is this counsel of the Papal note which it is most important to bear in mind. Nor should we be content to have recourse to prayer and reparation on our own account alone. Judith delivered the city of Bethulia after the people and its leaders had implored the Divine mercy by prayer and penance. Esther suggested the same means to her people and obtained the revocation of the sentence of death to which they had been condemned at Susa and throughout the Empire. Let us endeavor to obtain by our supplications and our expiation that France, instead of declaring herself opposed to religion, may fall on her knees and strike her breast and say with Saul on the road to Damascus: "Lord, what wouldst Thou have me to do?"

The Cardinal closes his exhortation with the hope that the Sacred Heart of Jesus which from the beginning of the war has miraculously saved France, may be waiting only for this act of repentance and love to make her triumph over her own heresy and infidelity and then to send her to the extremities of the earth to preach, "not the man-made god of rationalism, but the God-made man of Christianity."

La Croix announces that the Knights of Columbus have established headquarters in Paris, and that within a short time a series of clubrooms with facilities for reading, writing, recreation and religious services for the use of Catholic soldiers and sailors will be organized throughout the American camps in France. Both the material and moral well-being of their coreligionists are to be provided for. The magnitude of the work may be estimated from the fact that Catholics, according to La Croix, form forty per cent of the American armies and sixty per cent of the navy. Bureaus of information and hotels are to be provided, arrangements are to be made for the welcome of Catholics into Catholic families, and convalescent homes are to be maintained in the vicinity of Lourdes and elsewhere. La Croix calls attention to the fact that over and beyond the chaplains, commissioned by the Government at Washington, the Knights intend to maintain at their own expense other chaplains who will provide the soldiers with the opportunity to hear religious instruction, and attend the Holy Sacrifice. The article pays a high tribute to the zeal of the Knights and recommends to the French Government that it has an object lesson of prudence and broadmindedness in the official sanction given to their labors by the American Government.

Premier Painlevé made known to the French Cabinet on October 15 the results of official inquiries made into the alleged disclosures of military and diplomatic secrets to Germany with which M. Louis J. Malvy was recently charged by Léon Daudet. The Premier announced that all the accusations were found to be without foundation.

Ireland.—According to the Irish Weekly Independent, a well-known Protestant bishop, the Right Rev. Dr. Gregg, speaking at the annual synod of Ferns, in referring to the Irish Convention, said that all Irishmen of good-will could not but hope that some settlement based on adequate securities would be arrived at. "Whatever might be the issues great changes inevitably lay before them." It was useless to deny, the prelate stated, that if a form of government did not rest on the consent of the governed, a system abstractly sound might prove unworkable, and the Imperial Government had taken the view that the internal discontent of Ireland contributed a more serious menace to the Empire than a dual legislature.

Dr. Gregg also stated that it was plain that the larger number of politicians were in favor of going a considerable way towards satisfying the aspirations of the majority, and many Unionists had shown latterly that they no longer considered the Union as a cardinal element of Imperial security, and accordingly, it behooved them to adjust their understandings to the fact that a change, whatever its form, was coming. He reassured the minds of those who imagined that acquiescence in the new state of things might compromise loyalty to the King. It would not. Ireland was not going to be a republic any more than it was before the Union. If duly constituted authority gave Ireland a new form of government, the true loyalty was to accept it and do everything in their power to make it a success. Loyalty to the Crown and Unionism, according to him were not necessarily equivalent terms. There was loyalty in Ireland before the Union; there was loyalty which vehemently deprecated the Union; and there could be loyalty still if the Union were legally dissolved. In the eighteenth century, the bishop reminded the members of the Synod, the Protestant Church of Ireland officially recognized Ireland as being a distinct country, and not merely a constituent part of a larger kingdom. The dissolution of the Legislative Union would not mean quitting the Empire or "losing their King." The Church of Ireland had seen Establishment by law come and go, and had seen incorporation with the Church of England go the same way. It was in a position to see the Legislative Union come and go, if such a course were legally and authoritatively settled.

The views of Dr. Gregg show in their general tendency that the spirit of conciliation is gaining ground. While anxious to meet their old opponents half-way, the Irish Nationalist press has not ceased to call attention to the nature of the government which the country requires. The Cork Weekly Examiner states editorially that the government of Ireland in the past has always been vacillating in its character, autocratic and despotic in the old coercion days when the Tories held sway, and brimful of good intentions, but blundering, unreliable and profuse in promises, that too often failed of accomplishment when the Liberals held office. Referring to the Convention, the Cork journal adds:

> Both Liberals and Tories have failed in their efforts satisfactorily to govern Ireland and both should welcome, if substantial agreement be reached, the findings of an Irish Convention which knows the country's requirements, and is primarily interested in her welfare. No system of government that any Irish Convention could devise could be less in accord with Irish ideas than the system of government in force at present. That is putting the Convention's work at the lowest estimate, but it is not unreasonable to assume that justice, humanity, a broad outlook and liberal financial provisions, will form the basis of the structure that it is engaged in building up in Ireland. If any people in the world deserve justice and appeasement, the Irish people have a strong claim for both demands, and it may be hoped that over the chaos and discontent that at present prevails in the country a wise and just system of government devised by the Convention will supervene to bring that peace and confidence which impartial justice to South as well as to North can only secure.

Every friend of Ireland of justice and fair play will reecho this last sentiment.

Italy.—The dangerous activities of the purveyors of immoral literature have been taken cognizance of by the Government. A bill aimed at the suppression of the evil has already passed the Senate and is awaiting action by the Chamber of Deputies. The Prefect of Home Affairs has ordered the Prefects of the provinces to employ the utmost rigor in enforcing existing laws, and a propaganda has been instituted to enlist the popular sympathy of the people in the cause. The Prime Minister, replying to a letter sent to the Government by Cardinal Ferrari, Archbishop of Milan, and by the Bishops of Lombardy, has put himself on record as heartily in accord with the policy of official action in the matter. He pledges the Government to do all that lies in its power to check the dissemination of immoral literature, which he recognizes to be one of the most powerful agencies for the corruption of the State.

Immoral Literature

Japan.—It has long been a matter of common knowledge that Japan, like the United States, has been utilizing to the fullest possible extent the commercial opportunities offered during the war by the exclusion of the Central Powers from the use of the seas, the occupation of Belgium and the crippling of the foreign trade of Great Britain and France. The actual increase in her foreign trade, however, as described in the London Times and the New York Sun, has been greater than was thought. According to the Sun the exports for the year 1916 were seventy per cent greater than those of the year 1914, and from present indications it would appear that the exports of the year 1917 will at least double those of the year 1914. Munitions and other supplies needed by the belligerents have formed a large proportion of the Japanese foreign trade, but Japan has not allowed her attention to be concentrated on war products to the exclusion of the commodities of peace. With a view to developing markets in which she will be able to compete effectively with European commerce, she has built up a foreign trade in the Far East, which is not only very remarkable in its development but bids fair to be maintained after the war is over.

Commercial Development

Russia.—The situation seems to be steadily growing worse. A correspondent of the London Times reported on October 18 that anarchy is spreading through the Russian provinces. In Mohilev and Saratov there have been agrarian disorders, in Kharkov serious rioting, in Kursk street fighting and at Veronesh illicit distilling which led to wholesale drunkenness. In Petrograd, the correspondent continued, conditions are almost as bad. The police are hunting there for 18,000 criminals. Gambling, debauchery and robbery are increasing, and traffic accidents are numerous. "In fact," he concluded, "no one seems to care about anything." The Jews of Astrakhan-Tambov and Kharkov have been attacked and plundered. The loss to property caused by agrarian disorders during the month of September exceeded 30,000,000 rubles.

Further Disintegration

Preliminary Parliament

Russia's Preliminary Parliament was opened on October 20 at the Marinsky Palace, Petrograd, by Premier Kerensky. In his speech he protested that "Russia wants peace by right, but we never will bow our heads to force," an assertion which all applauded. After his address he offered the chair to Catharine Breshkovskaya, "the grandmother of the revolution." In her speech she declared that the people should be masters of the soil they cultivate and warned the "intellectual classes" not to oppose that solution of the agrarian problem. M. Avskentieff, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Council of Peasants' Delegates, was then elected President of the Parliament, and in his address said that the Republic would not abandon the defense of the country at present, but would doubtless consider in time the promotion of a democratic peace. Leon Trotzky, President of the Central Executive Committee of the Petrograd Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates, then made a violent attack on the Government, charging its bourgeois elements with causing insurrections among the peasants. He and the Maximalists then left the hall, saying they would tell the people that the revolution is in danger. The Preliminary Parliament is expected to end its sittings eight days before the opening of the Constituent Assembly. Any measure adopted by the Parliament must bear the names of thirty members in order to be effective.

Workmen's Peace Program

The Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates have drawn up in the form of instructions to M. Skobeleff, their representative at the Paris conference, a peace program, consisting of these fifteen comprehensive articles:

(1) Evacuation by the Germans of Russia, and autonomy of Poland, Lithuania, and the Lettish provinces; (2) autonomy of Turkish Armenia; (3) solution of the Alsace-Lorraine question by a plebiscite, the voting being arranged by local civil authorities after the removal of all the troops of both belligerents; (4) restoration to Belgium of her ancient frontiers and compensation for her losses from an international fund; (5) restoration of Serbia and Montenegro with similar compensation, Serbia to have access to the Adriatic, Bosnia and Herzegovina to be autonomous; (6) disputed Balkan districts to receive provisional autonomy, followed by a plebiscite; (7) Rumania to be restored her old frontiers on condition that she grant Dobrudja autonomy and grant equal rights to Jews; (8) autonomy for the Italian provinces of Austria to be followed by a plebiscite; (9) restitution of all colonies to Germany; (11) reestablishment of Greece and Persia; (11) neutralization of all straits leading to inner seas and also the Suez and Panama Canals. Freedom of navigation for merchant ships. Abolition of the right to torpedo merchant ships in war time; (12) all belligerents to renounce war contributions or indemnities in any form, but the money spent on the maintenance of prisoners and all contributions levied during the war to be returned; (13) commercial treaties not to be based on the peace treaty; each country may act independently with respect to its commercial policy, but all countries to engage to renounce an economic blockade after the war; (14) the conditions of peace should be settled by a peace congress consisting of delegates elected by the people and confirmed by Parliament. Diplomatists must engage not to conclude separate treaties, which hereby are declared contrary to the rights of the people, and consequently void; (15) gradual disarmament by land and sea, and the establishing of a non-military system.

M. Skobeleff's instructions end with an admonition to remove all obstacles to the meeting of the Stockholm conference and to secure the granting of passports.

The Stevens Commission, which is studying Russia's railroad problem, has arranged with the Government to take up the transportation difficulties on the fighting front. The Commission has completed its work in Siberia and the members have gone to General Headquarters at Mohilev.

Switzerland.—The great heart of the Swiss people has not merely welcomed wounded soldiers from the various battlefields and made every effort to give them medical attention and to facilitate their convalescence, it has also given every facility for the establishment of chapels in the various cantons. There was no difficulty about having Catholic services in Catholic French localities, as for example in Valais; the problem was to provide Catholic services in non-Catholic French localities and French services in Catholic German localities. The difficulty has been met, and practically all the districts have now the blessing of a chapel and a chaplain. Most of the funds have been provided by the Mission Catholique Suisse, assisted by the contributions of Cardinal Amette, Archbishop of Paris. There are twenty-one such chapels in the Bernese Oberland, twelve in the canton of Vaud, and others in other places.

Interned Soldiers

The French soldiers interned in Switzerland are of three classes: Those permanently disabled, who are allowed to return to their own country; others still under medical care, of whose recovery there are good hopes; and lastly, those already recovered or well on the road to recovery who are forcibly detained in internment camps. Opportunities are offered to these last of pursuing commercial, technical and professional studies. Everywhere the French soldiers devote themselves to the manufacture of various articles. Pierre Battifol, writing in La Croix, pays a high tribute to Switzerland, which he says is not merely the land of bravery but also the land of conscience, and he lays special emphasis on the solicitude of that country that French interned soldiers should be allowed the free exercise of their religion.

Catholics and the Public Schools

EDWARD F. GARESCHÉ, S.J.

IT is distinctly to be regretted that the public in general and Catholics in particular do not take a more active and intelligent interest in our public schools. The interest that is to be desired is not one of aloof and destructive criticism, but rather of helpful and constructive suggestion, so that the schools may realize their best opportunities and give to their pupils the most of which they are capable. This is a view that should be impressed upon influential Catholic citizens. It is true that we have and must have our own separate system of education so long as the present system of public schools remains unchanged. But the existence of Catholic schools by no means relieves us from our due share of responsibility for the public schools. As citizens we have not only the right to our due share of control of the methods, curriculum and principles of the schools, but we should use that right as conscientiously as we do any other right of citizenship.

To take the matter at its lowest level, the public schools are an extremely important part of the machinery of government, and the sums expended yearly for their maintenance, a fair proportion of which comes from taxing the Catholic population, are astonishingly large. It is said that the annual salaries of the teachers alone in our public schools in the United States amount to over $4,000,000,000, and when the cost of the buildings, the expenses of upkeep, and the various incidental expenditures that enter into the budget are considered, the sum mounts up to a most impressive figure. Since this money is raised by public taxes, citizens should be interested in the manner of its expenditure. Now there is no question, even to the casual observer of the methods of the public schools, that some of this money is likely to be expended carelessly and ineffectively. In some cities buildings are erected with half again as many rooms as are needed for the accommodation of the pupils; fads and fancies which are as expensive as they are useless are sometimes introduced into the educational system with scarcely a protest. On this account alone regard for the welfare of the city should prompt every citizen to take an active interest in these things and to show a vigilant watchfulness over the expenditure of these vast public funds.

An even greater abuse to be noticed in our public schools is that large, commodious, and even luxurious high schools are built to be used by the children of the well-to-do, while in the wretched districts of the town, old crowded buildings are made to suffice for the little children of the poor. We should see to it, so far as in us lies, that the children of the poor have their rightful facilities for education before luxurious buildings are provided for the children of the well-to-do. This is not Socialism, it is common-sense and ordinary justice.

But there is a vastly more important aspect of the public schools from the viewpoint of the Catholic. These schools are training the coming generation of American citizens. They are taking, by a sort of compulsion, the major part of the children of our nation and molding them irrevocably for better or worse, at the most impressionable period of their lives. Looked at from this standpoint the work of the public schools is so terrifyingly important that one may well stand aghast at the indifference shown by the public in general and by Catholics in particular, to the curriculum and method of the schools. The interests of the Church are bound up inevitably with the work of the public schools, because it is with the pupils of these schools that Catholics will have to live in the next generation. Whatever of false principle or poor training is given them will therefore react upon our Catholic people, who will of necessity be intimately associated in many ways with the graduates of these schools. We cannot stand at a distance and criticize them with a sense of comfortable superiority, reflecting on the excellent training of our own very numerous parish schools. Rubbing up with the graduates of these public schools in days to come, the graduates of our own parish schools may be hard put to it to keep the good training they have received, unless the public schools do their work as well as they may.

Another consideration is still more important. It is the bald fact that more than one half of our own Catholic children are attending the public schools. The last census indicates that there are more than 3,000,000 Catholic children of school age in this country. Something like 1,500,000 of them are in the parish schools; hence it would seem that more than one half, or more than 1,500,000 Catholic children are at the present time in the public schools. The welfare of these children touches us acutely. Whatever faults there are in the curriculum and methods will be reflected in the character and lives of more than one half of our Catholic people in the next generation. It is Catholics in particular who will have most to answer for, if they do not do their part in watching over the schools. We have as much right as anyone to control and criticize their methods and curriculum, for though we have a system of schools of our own, still we do our full part in supporting the schools of the State. Indeed, as maintainers and managers of an excellent and parallel system of schools, we may be supposed to know more than others about school management, and as Catholics, and therefore heirs of nineteen centuries of Christian traditions in education, we have a special and solemn obligation, both religious and patriotic, of doing our part to guide and form the public educational system. With the best of intentions a great many good people outside the Church are very much at sea concerning educational principles. Their own conception of what is right and wrong is vague and shifting. They find it hard to fix a definite standard, and harder still to keep to it, and so our public educational system shows a strange tendency to experiment and alteration, while its guardians are laboriously finding out for themselves, sometimes through painful experience, methods and principles which are plain to us from the Catholic experience of many ages. We have, therefore, a duty to take an active and practical interest in the public schools. The air of nonchalance which some Catholics adopt toward the public schools is unbecoming. Whatever is wrong in such places is in some measure our own fault, and we should regard their shortcomings with contrition.

It is clear, of course, that we must use every means to get our children into Catholic schools. Until the Government adopts the principle of paying for education wherever it finds it we shall be hard put to it to do so. It is only by immense efforts that Catholics have succeeded in providing accommodations for barely one half of the Catholic children. Still, our objective and our effort will be to teach our own children in our own schools. But this must not prevent us from taking an interest in the other schools, offering constructive criticism and suggestions, busying ourselves with their right conduct and control. Under the present circumstances a system of State schools is a necessity for the children not of our Faith. Properly managed, they may be made instruments of real enlightenment and the means of making better men and better citizens. They need our interest and our guidance, and we should regard whatever injures the curriculum of the schools as a misfortune to the Catholic body, since it hurts the Church through the nation. We should consider it a service no less to the Church than to the State to do all we can to make the public schools as good as they can be, to discourage fads and fancies, to provide a system of solid, moral and effective education, and to make the public schools as good an influence as is possible under the circumstances, for the sake of the children and for the welfare of society.

Marriage in Popular Literature

J. Harding Fisher, S.J.

IT would be a matter for constant surprise, were it not a thing of constant recurrence, that men scrupulously honest in dealing with other things, should be so unfair in their treatment of the Church. Otherwise laboriously exact in their quest for historic and scientific accuracy, they will misrepresent the Church's doctrine and practice with the lightest of hearts; at infinite pains to consult the sources where other institutions are concerned, they will repeat, in the most careless fashion and without the least trace of hesitation, any chance statement they may happen upon, if it is merely derogatory to Catholicism.

An example in point is a passage in a best-seller, entitled "We Can't Have Everything," by Mr. Rupert Hughes, which previously appeared serially in one of our "popular" magazines. In this book the author has made a number of statements on the subject of Catholic marriage, utterly at variance with the truth. Apparently he thinks that the Church is legitimate prey; and so he repeats stock misrepresentations which have been refuted countless times, without ever troubling himself to investigate whether they have any foundation in fact. One paragraph, bewilderingly filled with inaccuracies, will serve as an illustration.

In the story one of the characters, a Mrs. Cheever, consults an iconoclastic lawyer on the subject of getting a divorce. Nothing loth to accommodate the lady and incidentally to collect a fee, the lawyer allays his client's conscientious scruples by a discourse on marriage, in which among other things he says:

> It was not until the Church was 1,164 years old that Peter Lombard put marriage among the Seven Sacraments. And marriage did not become an official matter of Church jurisdiction till the Council of Trent in 1563. Think of that! Marriage was not a sacrament for fifteen centuries, and it has been one for less than four.

It would be hard to write a paragraph, even if one set himself to the task deliberately, more crowded with travesty of fact. In the first place Peter Lombard did not put matrimony among the Seven Sacraments in 1164. He did so fourteen years earlier, in the year 1150. But his contribution to the literature of marriage was not to teach something new about it, as Mr. Hughes implies, but merely to give a more accurate theological exposition of its sacramental character. Before his time the word sacrament had been used in a loose sense, so as to include sacraments properly so called and other sacred rites not possessed of a strictly sacramental character. Peter Lombard in his "Quattuor Libri Sententiarum," which has been called the "first manual of systematic theology," formulated an exact theological definition of the word sacrament and then showed that seven and only seven sacred rites could be called sacraments in the strict sense. But he was by no means the first to draw up a list of the Seven Sacraments. Hugh of St. Victor had done so before him, and St. Otto before Hugh of St. Victor. And for centuries before St. Otto the Seven Sacraments had been taught as a matter of faith throughout the Christian world, not indeed all together in a single technical treatise, but separately and as occasion required. This fact, which is undeniable, is carefully suppressed by Protestant controversialists in general and is passed over in silence by Mr. Hughes in particular.

If his remark about Peter Lombard has any significance, he means to imply from the fact that Peter Lombard put marriage among the Sacraments in the twelfth century that matrimony was first held to be a sacrament at that time. Such a conclusion is absurd. The "World Almanac" puts Washington among the Presidents of the United States in the year 1917. Would Mr. Hughes have us believe that for that reason our Government or the people of our land did not recognize Washington as a President until the current year? Why then does he make such an inference in the case of Peter Lombard? To prove his point, he should have shown that Peter Lombard was the first to hold that marriage was a sacrament. He did not dare attempt such a thing. A whole cloud of witnesses would have risen up to refute him, beginning with St. Paul. He would have had to reckon with the words of St. Ignatius written on the subject to St. Polycarp before the year 117, and with the statements of Tertullian, St. Ambrose, St. Augustine, Origen, St. Epiphanius, St. Cyril of Alexandria and hosts of others. He would have found himself refuted by professions of faith used in the earliest times in the Coptic, Syrian and Armenian sects, and by the testimony of the early liturgical books of the Greek, Nestorian and Monophysite heresies. Why then does he tells us that "It was not until the Church was 1,164 years old that Peter Lombard put marriage among the Seven Sacraments"? The remark would have a certain historical interest were it accurately stated, but it in no way shows that the Church began to believe that marriage was a sacrament only with Peter Lombard.

Mr. Hughes assures his readers that "Marriage did not become an official matter of Church jurisdiction until the Council of Trent, in 1563." Even though his remark were true, which it is not, it would not follow from that fact, as he would have us believe, that marriage was not considered a sacrament for fifteen centuries. To regulate marriage externally and to hold it to be a sacrament are by no means synonymous terms. There are other ways of asserting its sacramental character besides making it an official matter of Church jurisdiction. In point of fact, its sacramental character is asserted at every age of the Church.

But what of the novelist's assertion regarding the date when marriage first became a matter of Church jurisdiction? It is absolutely without foundation. In the very decree to which he refers, the Council of Trent explicitly stated that the Church was not claiming jurisdiction over marriage for the first time.

> The holy synod, therefore, following in the footsteps of the Lateran Council, held under Innocent III, directs that hereafter before marriage is contracted, public proclamation of the names of those who intend to marry, shall be made in the church at the High Mass on three successive feast days by the parish priest of the contracting parties. . . .

The words in italics, which have been inserted, refer to the Council of Lateran held in 1215, the decrees of which have been published and may easily be consulted. The particular decree, of which there is question, is a clear instance of the exercise of jurisdiction over marriage 348 years before 1563. The text follows:

> Abolishing therefore particular customs obtaining in special places, we decree that when marriages are about to be celebrated, they shall be publicly proclaimed in the churches by the priests, and a definite period set during which any one who so desires and has proof to substantiate his contention, may oppose them on the ground of a legitimate impediment.

Evidently marriage was a matter of ecclesiastical jurisdiction in the year 1215. This council has been cited, because it should have come under the notice of any one who read the Council of Trent's decree on matrimony, but many other councils might be cited, centuries upon centuries older, in which there is evidence of undoubted jurisdiction over marriage; for example, the Council of Elvira held in the year 300. Some estimate may now be formed of the value of Mr. Hughes' triumphant conclusion: "Think of that! Marriage was not a sacrament for fifteen centuries, and it has been one for less than four." In the light of such a statement, he would find it difficult to explain the following decree of the Second Council of Lyons, an ecumenical council held in 1274:

> The same holy Roman Church holds and teaches that there are Seven Sacraments in the Church, namely, one is Baptism . . . another is the Sacrament of Confirmation; another is Penance; another, Eucharist; another the Sacrament of Orders; another, Matrimony; another, extreme Unction. . . .

This is one of the classical passages dealing with the Sacraments, and it dates from the thirteenth century. However, Mr. Hughes tells us that marriage was not a sacrament for fifteen centuries. If this council, because held in the "Dark Ages," escaped his notice, how was it that his reading on the subject did not take him back as far as the Council of Florence, another ecumenical council, held in the year 1438. The Decretum pro Armenis is a commonplace with all students of theology, and embodies a very considerable portion of the dogmatic pronouncements of one of the most noteworthy gatherings of bishops ever held. Speaking of marriage, it says: "The seventh Sacrament is the Sacrament of Matrimony."

The vagaries of novelists on the subject of marriage are not of great consequence to the Church, nor would their mental aberrations on the matter be worth considering except to point a moral, namely, that such writers should not be given credence in matters of Catholic doctrine and practice. "We Can't Have Everything" is an object lesson of the extent to which irresponsible writers will allow their imaginations to lead them. It is to be hoped that in the future Mr. Hughes will be a little more careful to verify his statements, before he commits himself to such extravagance.

"Movies" and Morals

GEORGE O'DWYER

DO the people want bare-limbed photo-plays? Is lewdness necessary to a plot? Are the sensibilities of normal people to be continually subjected to the glaring immoralities of this class of film-dramas? Is there a "public demand" for them? To judge from the film issues sent out from New York City the past year by producers whose regard for morality is generally determined by their pocket-books or their bank accounts, the above questions must be answered in the affirmative.

On the other hand, if we accept the opinion of competent observers, who are not film promoters, we are rather led to believe that the American public does not want the inutterable nudities, in which woman is dishonored in every imaginable way. The nation has not, as yet, reached the degenerate condition of ancient Rome or Sodom and Gomorrah. On close investigation, we find that the main reason for the introduction of scenes with optic suggestions of lust, in otherwise sane films, is because the producers of such films are catering to the pleasure-loving, depraved tastes of certain floating hordes in New York City, Chicago, Pittsburgh, Havana, and other cities where a large proportion of the travelers is continually gorging its sensual instincts. I suspect another reason. The psychology of suggestion, in this interjection of bare-limbed women, appeals to one who stops to analyze the methods of some Jewish producers bent not on promoting art, but on accumulating money. In the film there is a lavish show of bathing-beach, bath-room, boudoir and cabaret scenes in which gowns, bathing suits and lingerie figure prominently. And all this is an excellent advertisement for the "chic creations" of the producers' relatives on lower Broadway, New York.

When the emissaries of these producers visit the small towns and cities to sell their suggestive wares they use one distinctive New York word, "pep." These misguided salesmen declare that if a film lacks "pep" it "won't get over," to use a theatrical parlance. In plain English, the white-light definition of pep is, lewd suggestiveness. Many of the small-town managers are grievously misled by these unctuous salesmen, who try to convince everybody outside of New York that what is good—salacious is a better word—in Gotham is good for the country. But not all managers are susceptible to this influence; they are experiencing a great awakening in this respect. Last winter a New Hampshire manager told one of these salesmen that the only way to learn the true tastes of the people for pictures was to take over a theater in a small town where the majority of the working people attend the single show-house in that locality. In a fifteen-minute talk he placed before the promotor of the salacious films more facts about the likes and dislikes of the people than the young man could have learned in New York in five years. This particular salesman went back to New York very much chastened, but then he is but one of a thousand moral harpies sent out from modern Babylon to corrupt morals, for a price.

Town and city managers throughout the country are only too apt to respond to the call of the pocket-book. Obscene pictures will be excised from the film, if they affect revenue unfavorably. Thus, films already booked are often either cut ruthlessly or not used at all. An instance in point occurs to my mind. A Salomic "dance of the seven veils" was recently introduced into a well-known "movie." According to the hair-brained morality of the producer, a Catholic priest was supposed to stand horrified for ten minutes in a low cabaret in Paris while a seductive creature gave her lewd exhibition. I know, in this case, that the operator, at the behest of the manager, cut out 125 feet of film showing this weird scene. In this is a lesson.

The promoters of the indecent film have received their main inspiration from the craze for bare-limbed dances so prevalent in private and public entertainments during the past two years. The fad for these in society circles was promoted by a few restless women, led on by an English dancer with a penchant for Grecian and bare-limbed performances. Our producers in the picture-field were quick to take advantage of this.

What is the result? After seeing such films, young girls get up parties and dances and insist that such exhibitions must be on the program. The direct result is that the morality of certain well-defined society circles suffers. The passion for low-cut shirtwaists and gowns can also be attributed to picture-films in which the women are scantily clad in order to emphasize the sensual attraction.

To counteract these effects there is a national board of censorship. But what has this board ever done to restrain producers? Local boards, however, have in certain sections done good work. One such board has had a most beneficial effect in one New England city. Its example might well be copied all over the country.

After my ten years' experience in the business, and, after a constant study of moving-picture audiences, young and old, I am convinced that the manager who deliberately displays bare-limbed and salacious films satisfies the fancies of only a negligible percentage of his audience and loses normal-minded patrons every day he shows these films. Especially is this true among his women patrons who have children, or who have been brought up in good homes. Sensible managers of film-houses listen to the suggestions of decent folk and govern themselves accordingly. The welfare of the business depends on the attendance of normal people and their moral susceptibilities must be considered. Thus, when all has been said, the solution of the movie problem ultimately rests with the audience.

Armchair Philosophy

DANIEL A. LORD, S.J.

WHEN a philosopher of the impossible or the improbable wants to be really disdainful toward the philosophy of an opponent, he labels it "armchair philosophy." The epithet is more or less common. Every once in a while you hear of some philosopher pulling up his window-shades, glancing out at the bright world that flits gayly past his door and then uttering some caustic thoughts on the subject of common-sense. That is the inevitable prelude to remarks on the subject of armchair philosophy. Or it may be that he picks up in a dark bookshop, where, as a rule, they do not deign to handle any tome weighing less than two pounds, some little volume filled with hopeful optimistic reflections on the life and destiny of man; whereupon he is sure to turn up his nose, roll his short-sighted eyes to where heaven used to be located, and mutter under his breath the pet condemnation.

The condemnation contains the quintessence of contempt. To refer to a philosophy as originating in an armchair is, in the eyes of men of this type, to brand it as hopelessly puerile, out of harmony with science and its laws, and bearing to genuine philosophy the relation of home-made fudge to bread and beefsteak. For genuine philosophy must reek of the laboratory where specimens, including the experimenters, alone are welcome, or of some library from which have been excluded all the comforts of life. It must subtly suggest test-tubes and microscopes even while it may be in opposition to any information ever gained through scientific apparatus; it must be very mysterious, technically abstruse, and, by preference, startlingly at variance with common experience. Philosophy has its natural shrine in austere studies where the light of heaven is tolerated but not encouraged, or in laboratories where the perfume of chlorine is preferred to that of the rose.

And to suggest mildly that philosophy might be suited for consumption in an armchair, to the pleasant accompaniment of light gray smoke and fur-lined slippers, is to debase the queen of sciences to the level of best-sellers and magazines with pretty-girl covers.

When you come to the rub, I rather doubt whether most men would enjoy their firesides or their good cigar or their slippers very long in company with some of our most fashionable philosophers. Fancy any man really enjoying the discovery that he actually does not see the things that he thinks he sees, but that instead he manufactures an unreal wife and "kiddies" out of his own evolving spirit. Fancy a man drawing long, satisfying puffs out of his cigar as he reads that the only positive feeling is that of pain, that "We ought to be miserable and we are so," and that the highest point of happiness is annihilation. Does it not make the gas-logs look brighter and more cheerful to learn that one has no free-will, that for a great-great-grandfather one had a chattering ape, and that one really ought to be up and fighting might and main toward the superhuman?

The one consolation about these current philosophies of gloom and contradiction is that few people are stupid enough to believe them. They are ingenious, clever bits of sophistry; but the man who attempts them from the vantage point of an armchair is more likely than not to end by knocking the ashes off his cigar, pitching the volume where the dust will be sure to find it, and going out to live his life on lines that, judged by the aforesaid standards, are most unphilosophical.

Unquestionably a large percentage of the philosophers whose writings are current today are making the egregious mistake of supposing that no truth ever came out of any room in the architectural world save a laboratory, and that any statement which can be grasped without the aid of logarithms or a series of mental acrobatics is, on the face of it, too childish to employ the cultured mind even long enough to condemn it. So the philosopher in the armchair and the reader in the armchair fall alike under their contemptuous glance. Armchairs and philosophers have no common denominator.

So let me begin with a confession. I am seated at this moment in an armchair. It is not a very handsome one, plain wood of an unclassified variety, with a leather seat which has taken an incurable sag, and an iron brace which is a concession to age and long service. In just such a chair, to complete the humiliating confession, I have studied whatever of systematic philosophy I may have acquired.

But you must not imagine that the philosophy learned in my armchair came done up in a holiday package with a red ribbon and a sprig of holly. It is the philosophy that made Aristotle's pupils gather from the ends of the earth to fill the Lyceum. Thomas of Aquin wedded it to Christian thought and raised it to something almost sacramental. It is the philosophy that for centuries was taught wherever philosophy was worshiped, and today, after a period of exile, it has crossed once more to England with Cardinal Mercier. It is a philosophy which has eagerly taken up the best in scientific thought and discovery. It has gone farther into the essence of things than any philosophy ever synthesized by man. But above all, it is philosophy which lays its roots in an almost Divine common-sense, and which is proudly and fearlessly the champion of human nature.

As I sat in my own armchair, I have thought of the many men and many women the world over who likewise sit in armchairs. There is milady, who, when the children have been dispatched to school and the house has been set face about, sinks into her wicker basket-chair in the warm sun-parlor and reaches for a book. There is the lord and master, who, after a long day at his desk, fits his body into his favorite leather lounging-chair, and, after a long puff to assure himself that his cigar is burning properly, runs his eye over the library table for the volume he began last night. Why, after all, should there not be armchair philosophy, since so much of our life is spent in just such bless-the-man-who-invented-them comfortable pieces of furniture? Why act as if philosophy were the mind-food of an intellectual élite wearing glasses of extra thickness and afflicted with a mania for playing at jiu-jitsu with any sort of technical term? Why treat philosophy as false simply because it is simple?

Mr. G. K. Chesterton, a delightful philosopher of the armchair, has done much to reinstate in his proper dignity the man who writes all his letters before his name. To Mr. Chesterton's far-seeing mind, I'm sure, Mr. P. H. D. Brown has an intellect quite as capable of attaining truth as Mr. Brown, Ph.D. And the fact that there are so many more P. H. D. Browns than Browns, Ph.D., would make the former much more worthy of his attention.

So these papers on armchair philosophy are addressed to the ante-lettered—it is unfair to say unlettered—men and women who sit like myself in armchairs. Philosophy is, after all, an analysis of life in its ultimate causes and destiny, and these men and women are living lives of tremendous import and living them in the very midst of a riot of life. The philosophies of so many writers of the past century and a half have just this to condemn them, that they are out of touch with life. Many a philosopher holds that there is no such thing as matter in the world, largely because he does not know what it means to worry about tomorrow's supply of buns and bullion, not to mention Charlotte's new party gown and the leg Algernon dislocated in a football game. It is one thing to sit in a study, with the electric lights switched off, and concoct vast arguments to prove the theory that we have no free wills, and quite another to set one's jaws and fight off the allurements of vice or an inherited tendency to drink, for the sake of a wife and baby at home. These philosophers have looked too long through the microscopes to see anything larger than an amoeba. They have gazed so long at the stars that our little earth slips from their range of vision. It is hard to convince some of them that anything obvious, like love and babies, bricks and beefsteaks, the fact that two and two make four and that a thing cannot be and not be at the same time, is true. A little touch of nature, applied preferably in a way to rough one up, is often a splendid antidote for philosophical speculations which are spun out of star-dust and the tenuous vapors of Mars.

But men and women often sit in armchairs because they are weary with the battle we call life. They are flesh and blood and soul, not theories; their long experience has made them keen appraisers of the true and the false. Philosophical jargon they have never learned, but they can understand the language of smiles and quickly raised eyebrows, of silent lips and set jaws. They know that a philosophy which does not fit with life's necessities and which contradicts the cold, brutal facts of their experience may be as fascinating as phantoms of a heat-oppressed brain, but it offers no explanation of the riddles that underlie all life.

If, then, my armchair philosophy, which, of course, is not mine but the heritage of the great Catholic world, can do anything, it can explain the riddles at which modern philosophies vainly strain. And as such an explanation do I offer it to all who are my companions in arms.

A War Chaplain's Diary

GERALD C. TREACY, S.J., Chaplain, U.S.A

ON South Hancock Avenue, at Gettysburg, there is a bronze statue representing a Catholic priest with hand uplifted, giving absolution. It stands on a large boulder that holds a tablet with this inscription:

> To the memory of Father William Corby, C.S.C., Chaplain 88 Reg't, New York Infantry, Second Brigade, First Division, Second Corps, the Irish Brigade, July 2, 1863.

The statue commemorates a well-known incident, the general absolution given to the Irish Brigade, when it was about to enter battle with three other brigades sent by Hancock to the relief of the Third Corps, of the Army of the Potomac, on that memorable July 2. No one interested in Civil War records that bear on Catholic activities can fail to find interest in Father Corby's reminiscences. Of the Catholic chaplains serving with the armies of the North, he had the widest and longest military experience. Indeed, to follow his diary is to mark the progress of the Army of the Potomac from 1861 to 1865.

At the outbreak of the Civil War, Father Corby gave up his professor's chair in Notre Dame University and volunteered his services as chaplain. In the autumn of 1861 he arrived in Washington and went to old St. Peter's church on East Capitol Hill. The pastor did not know him, and Father Corby gives a rather amusing account of their meeting:

> The good pastor seemed at first very uneasy. He had never seen me before, but after a short time he was convinced that I was not a fraud. In a short time we were in full confidence, and he asked me about my trip, where I came from and where I was going. I answered him as best I could, and told him I was chaplain of the Irish Brigade. . . . The next morning I said Mass, and in the forenoon met Father Paul Gillen, C.S.C., who drove me in his "Rockaway" across the long bridge that passes over the Potomac to Alexandria. A short distance out from the city I found the Irish Brigade in camp.

It will be remembered that the Irish Brigade was commanded by General Thomas Francis Meagher. It was made up of the Sixty-ninth, Eighty-eighth, and Sixty-third New York regiments, the One Hundred and Sixteenth and Sixty-ninth Pennsylvania Infantry, the Twenty-eighth Massachusetts Infantry and Hogan's and McMahon's batteries. The Sixty-ninth Pennsylvania was later assigned to another brigade in the same army corps. When first mustered in, the brigade had five Catholic priests as chaplains. There were six other Catholic chaplains with the Army of the Potomac. Moreover, priests were assigned to duty as post chaplains to minister to the soldiers who were in training at army posts, awaiting orders to go into the field.

Father Corby joined his command at Camp California, Alexandria, and together with Father James Dillon, C.S.C., and Father Thomas Ouellet, S.J., began his duties as chaplain. From the early fall of 1861 until the spring of 1862 the brigade was encamped at Camp California. There is little poetry in the description of the camp given in Father Corby's notes:

> I am amused when I read the works of some historians who, looking entirely on the bright side of the picture, try to impress their readers with the beauty of this camp. . . . No doubt the scenery on the south side of the Potomac where we were, is very picturesque. But let us look on the other side of this poetically described camp, when poetry is forgotten in the presence of stern reality. Our camp was laid out in streets; these streets, rained on continually, worked up by the tramping of horses and the heavy wheels of the army wagons, were a sight! They resembled exactly, except as to color, the mud-pits where clay is mixed for the manufacture of brick. One day I saw an officer attempt to cross the street in front of my tent. When he reached the center, his boots sank so deep in the tough clay that he was obliged to call a soldier to dig him out with a spade. Even then it became impossible for him to extricate himself except by pulling his feet out of his boots and escaping in his stocking feet.

The three chaplains spent the first winter of the war under canvas. They used to secure heat by means of small stoves that burned green pine, and the result was more often smoke than heat. The hardship endured in that camp may be imagined when we remember that the War Department lost so many horses that winter that an order was issued forbidding the use of horses for draught purposes. They were replaced by the far-famed army mule that "could sleep in mud and live on chips." During this season the duties of the chaplains were about the same as those of a parish, except that as Father Corby notes, they "had no pew rent to collect." There were the regular "Confession" days, the Sunday and holy-day Masses, and during the week there were sinners to look up, pledges to be given, men to be instructed, and difficulties of more or less moment to be settled. Father Corby pays a very high tribute to the personnel of the command with which he was soldiering.

> The officers were, for the most part, men of superior education, gallant beyond any around them in the army, and, as for bravery, it was born in them. The rank and file was composed of healthy, intelligent men, far above the average, and, in many cases, of liberal education. In my regiment as private soldiers there were seven first-class lawyers. Last but not least, the surgeons of this brigade were among the first in the army. Dr. Reynolds had no superior.

On March 5, 1862, the troops in Camp California were ordered to take the field. In the chill drizzling rain the columns took to the roads, which were in poor condition. Father Corby's horse gave him some trouble during this first march that he made with the Army of the Potomac. In the middle of a creek the animal paused and no amount of persuasion could induce progress. Not until a soldier by a unique use of his bayonet substituted action for words, did the chaplain's charger consent to join the marching column. The army halted at nightfall and made their camp in open fields. Now the chaplains had put their packs in army wagons, and evening found the wagons fifteen miles beyond the rear of the column, stuck fast in Virginia mud. After five days the wagons came up with the army. So, for the first night's rest there was little in the way of comfort for the chaplains. Father Corby writes:

> Some men wanted to go to confession, as we expected to be in battle next day, so I sat on the roots of an old tree and heard all who came. . . . After this I sat on some sticks the rest of the night near the fire which the soldiers had started. . . . Thus I spent that night, after marching about eighteen miles in rain and mud, with no dinner and no supper, followed by no sleep.

At dawn the march was resumed and by evening the command reached Manassas. The Confederates had hurriedly abandoned the place, leaving valuable rations after them. Toward the end of March the troops were ordered back from Manassas, and Father Corby, his fellow-chaplains and about 1,500 troops took ship on board the Ocean Queen for the Peninsula, and finally landed at Ship Point, Virginia. Here they were quartered in huts formerly occupied by the Confederate army. It is here that the chaplain's notes first mention "graybacks." They were the forbears of the modern "cooties" that torture the fighting man in his underworld life in the trenches.

> You will find some writers telling of the prancing war horse, shining swords and bright bayonets, glittering in the sun, writes Father Corby. While all this is true it is well to give some of the ordinary reality . . . sufferings from want of good fresh food, long tedious marches under scorching sun or in pelting rain, and incredible tortures from these "graybacks."

The army was now at the front not far from Yorktown, and a church-tent was erected. Mass was celebrated here every morning, prayers said each evening, and Confessions heard on stated days. Not only from this brigade, but from the other brigades of the Army of the Potomac, Catholic officers and soldiers gathered to seek the consolations of their Faith. The Northern troops were getting ready to besiege Yorktown, when it was unexpectedly abandoned by the Confederates in May, 1862. The Union army passed through Yorktown, and met the Confederate forces at Fair Oaks in this same month. From Yorktown the brigade with which Father Corby was serving went up the York River to Cumberland, and landed on the right bank of the Pamunkey. They halted at White House for a while. During this halt the chaplains were busy attending to the spiritual needs of the men about to go into battle.

> In the evening, writes Father Corby, the men went to Confession so as to receive Holy Communion in the morning. . . . With lively faith they gathered around the altars assisting at Mass, and many war States, especially Virginia, were sanctified in this way. Thousands of soldiers looking up to heaven, . . . the priest lifting up the Spotless Lamb, calling out to man and to the Eternal Father: "Behold the Lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world." . . . A good minister met me on the march one day, and asked in all simplicity and earnestness: "Chaplain, how do you bring your men to Divine Service? I see them as I pass your quarters attending by the hundreds, if not thousands, every Sabbath, and often during the week. I cannot induce my men to attend that way; in fact, very few take any interest in religious services." "Why, my dear sir," I replied, "I do not bring them. Their faith brings them."

By the time Meagher's Brigade reached Fair Oaks, part of McClellan's army had been under fire. On June 1 the brigade went into action, and played a very vital part in making Fair Oaks a Union victory.

> During the battle and after it, as fast as our men dropped, they were seen first by the priest, at the request of the sufferer, and if the wound was fatal the priest heard his Confession on the spot, and then he was conveyed to a place called a hospital. . . . I was riding with General Meagher's staff, when the Confederates getting our range sent a perfect shower of bullets at us. . . . I confess I was not sorry when I reached the side of a log house to attend to a poor wounded soldier. . . . I could hear the bullets strike the roof, sounding like hailstones.

With our modern ideas of neat base and field hospitals, a rude log cabin seems a sorry place for wounded men. But at Fair Oaks there was no well-organized relief work. Any improvised shelter served for hospital purposes, and at this engagement old freight cars did transport service. They were run down to the river bank, as soon as they received their burdens, and then the cars were emptied as fast as possible. Dr. Ellis, of the Union army, who was in charge describes the scene:

> The wounded were lying around on the track as they had been taken out of the freight cars. . . . I found more than three hundred of them, many in a dying condition, and all more or less mutilated, and still enveloped in their filthy blood-stained clothing, as they were found on the battle-field. In many instances maggots were creeping out of their festering wounds.

After Fair Oaks the Union army was entrenched in front of Richmond, so near, in fact, that from some tall pines that fringed their encampment the soldiers could get a view of the Confederate capitol. The ground was marshy and it was not long before malaria visited the camp. The three priests with Meagher's brigade were busy not only attending the men of their own command, but Catholic soldiers of other divisions. A sick call that meant a twenty-mile ride was not unusual. Very often the regimental bands would play the "Adeste Fideles" in slow and measured tones. It was the favorite funeral march, and the death-rate was so high that it was played very often—many times a day, according to Father Corby's diary. In the midst of this epidemic the chaplains held a small "synod" and discussed faculties. Their deliberations closed with the resolution that in the event of death "Each chaplain agreed to say two Masses for the one who fell first." Their council had just adjourned when Father Corby fell sick, and accompanied by Father Dillon he was sent to White House Landing, put on board an army transport for Washington, and there sent to the hospital that was under the care of the Sisters of Charity. He considered himself fortunate in escaping from the malaria camp where many a Union soldier died. It was the first and only sickness that Father Corby experienced during his war service. He returned to his command in time to share in the suffering or the glory of the Seven Days' Fight.

Is France Catholic?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

One of your correspondents—I think it was Mr. McGrath of Yonkers, but having mislaid my copy of AMERICA which contained the letter, I cannot be sure—raised the question as to the Catholicism of France and suggested a dilemma: Either France is not Catholic or it is Catholic; it is in much the same plight as Germany, in that the people allow themselves to be governed by those whom they cannot control.

It is not to be denied that the question thus put is one that has disturbed and, I venture to think, distorted the judgments of many American Catholics upon the war. The events of the last twenty years are still fresh in our minds and if refreshment of our memories had been needed, it could have been abundantly supplied by the visit to this country a few months ago of the French anti-clerical leader who had, in a speech which was placarded through France, boasted that he and his associates had extinguished the lights of heaven. Moreover, still more recently we have had some evidence that the old venom is still abroad in France in connection with the "Orphelinat des Armées," despite the "Union Sacrée."

I have recently read with great interest and profit an essay by Mgr. Chapon, Bishop of Nice, "La France et l'Allemagne devant la Conscience Chrétienne." Ths essay is published in a volume, to which it gives the title, by the "Comité Catholique de Propagande Française à l'Etranger" and it should be widely known by American Catholics, for it contains a searching and most instructive analysis of the French and the German viewpoints in philosophy and religion. Certain passages in this essay bear upon the question raised by Mr. McGrath, and I venture to translate them in the hope that they may suggest some of the lines upon which an answer to that question might be made.

Mgr. Chapon deals first with the German weltanschauung upon which there is no need to enter here further than to say that his dissection is a masterpiece of clear exposition. Then he comes to the French idée, and begins with a consideration of what he calls the present irreligion in France, by making an "examination of conscience." France has much to answer for in many ways, he says, but there is one thing that cannot be charged against her, and that is of having ever completely sunk herself in error and staying there. Injustice has never been able to sleep comfortably in France for long. Now it is true that there has been for a long time in France something very like a direct and deliberate war upon religion. This war has been made by men acting in the name of "liberty," men who believed that they saw in religion a principle of slavery and of submission which was abhorrent to their philosophy. This philosophy they called "laicism" in antithesis to "clericalism," which was the name they gave to religion. How have they been able to impose their ideas upon the laws of France, if France herself did not approve them? Says Bishop Chapon:

> France was never irreligious except in part. It is far from true that those who have been promoters of irreligion and those who in one way or another have cooperated in the laicizing campaign have explicitly and consciously pursued the absurd and criminal idea of banishing religion from the life of men. The fight that they have made, like all fights in this world, has been upon very confused lines. . . . No one will deny that certain Catholics merged with their religion, political, economic and scientific notions and ideas of their own which were to say the least foreign, if not actually antagonistic, to the true spirit of that religion, and then proceeded, as Leo XIII complained in his Encyclical, "Immortale Dei," to proscribe the opinions and impugn the faith of other Catholics who had in the utmost sincerity submitted themselves to the teachings and direction of the Church and the Holy See. . . . As a consequence of this how many there have been who without being at the bottom of their hearts irreligious have struck hands with the open enemies of religion in aid of political institutions and scientific or philosophic theories to which these Catholics were opposed! . . . The result is that in the name of laicism many things have been done besides those exclusively anti-religious. . . . If besides this, irreligion has seemed to have taken on an epidemic character, in how many cases, shall we not say, has it not been superficial, a product of ignorance or vanity, ambition or thoughtless enthusiasm, springing from a weakness of heart or will rather than perversion of intellect? In proof of which is the fact that it is not maintained in face of the grim and solemn facts of life, especially that of death. Everyone knows that it has vanished in most of those who are fighting out there at the frontier, and that it is on Christian faith found again or reawakened that they build their trust and their strength. Finally, despite all our woes, the religious life has always been maintained in a multitude of souls in our land of France. Like it or not like it, it shone and spread itself amid its very enemies. What wonderfully significant conversions there have been every day! Were we not always the land where Christian charity spent itself in works of all kinds doing as much or more by ourselves in certain of the greatest works—the Propagation of the Faith, for example, founded by us, schools in the East, missions, Peter's Pence—than all the other Catholic nations put together? Has not the Church in France in these last days seen rally round her a youth, ardent and pure, devoted to religion and country more numerous than ever it was in ages past, more numerous, we venture to say than in any other land? Is not Catholic thought as full of life and fertility with us as it ever was and more? Has it not penetrated all fields of activity with tireless ardor to meet the new difficulties and the new needs? Sweet it has been to us in such an hour as this, and in the face of unjust accusations to receive an earnest of the fatherly heart of Benedict XV through his eminent and sympathetic Secretary of State, Cardinal Gasparri.

"It is natural," he writes to his Eminence the Cardinal Archbishop of Paris, "that the solicitude of the common Father of the Faithful should first evince itself to those of his children who give the most convincing proof of their respect and affection for him. Among these his children in France merit especial mention, children of that nation which has justly earned the name of the Church's eldest daughter, which ever gives splendid proof of its generosity to Catholic enterprises, and which now, and for many months past, from one end of the land to the other, in the army, the ambulances, and the hospitals and down to the smallest village, has manifested a striking faith and piety which has given great consolation of the Holy Father."

We shall not labor the point, says Bishop Chapon, in conclusion. It is not for us to sound our own trumpet, and we would not have said the little we have said, being more concerned as we are to remedy our mistakes and our faults than to brag of our merits, if too many Catholics abroad had not overwhelmed us with extravagant accusations as if to justify in advance the abominable treatment that Germany had designed to make us undergo.

Whoever has a moderate knowledge of France in the last generation or so can easily put names to some of the things hinted at by Bishop Chapon. I need not here recall them further than to say that it would have been well if the "certain Catholics" referred to had heeded the voice of Leo XIII and made their peace with the French Republic when he advised them to do so, instead of dreaming their royalist dreams and giving to the enemies of the Church the chance to label them as enemies of the Republic.

That France is Catholic admits of no doubt, I think. That the French people are unable to control their own Government—the other horn of Mr. McGrath's dilemma—is something which is certainly not true in the sense in which it may be said of the German people. We shall see this more clearly when the war is over, for there will not then be the internal divisions which have enabled a minority to rule the country in the past. Bishop Chapon's paper ought to be translated into English, and circulated among American Catholics, for if my observation be correct there is great need for it.

The Sisters in Peace

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Apropos of Father Treacy's illuminating sketches of the mercies of our Catholic Sisters in wartime, "Aguecheek," the Devin-Adair Company's "My Unknown Chum" has this paragraph which, though sixty years old, is still pertinent:

I have been much impressed by a visit to a large but unpretentious-looking house in the Rue de Bac, the mother house of that admirable organization, the Sisters of Charity. It was not much of a visit to be sure, for not even my gray hairs and respectable appearance could gain for me an admission beyond the strangers' parlor, the courtyard, and the cool, quiet chapel. But that was enough to increase my respect and admiration for those devoted women. The community there consists of 600 Sisters of Charity, whose whole time is occupied taking care of the sick, and needy and neglected in the hospitals and asylums, and in every quarter of the city. You see them at every corner, going quietly about their work of benevolence and presenting a fine contrast to some of our noisy theorists at home. I may be in error, but it strikes me that that community is doing more in its present mode of action to advance the true dignity and rights of the sex than if it were to resolve itself into a convention, after the American fashion. I was somewhat anxious to inquire whether any of the Sisters of the community had ever taken to lecturing or preaching in public; but the modest and unassuming manner of all those whom I saw rendered such question unnecessary. I fear that oratory is sadly neglected among them; with this exception, and perhaps the absence of a certain strong-mindedness in their characters, I think that they will compare very favorably with any of our distinguished female philanthropists. They wear the same gray habit and odd-shaped white bonnet that the Sisters of Charity wear in Boston. While we praise the self-forgetful heroism of Florence Nightingale as it deserves, let us not forget that France sent out her Florence Nightingales to the Crimea by fifties and hundreds, young and delicate women, hiding their personality under the common dress of a Religious Order, casting aside the names that would recall their rank in the world, unencouraged in their beneficence by any newspaper paragraphs, and unrewarded save by the sweet consciousness of duty done. The Emperor Alexander, struck by the part played in the Crimean campaign by the Sisters of Charity, has recently asked the superior of the Order to detail 500 of the Sisters, for duty in the hospitals of Russia. It is understood that the request will be complied with, so far as the number of the community will permit.

The Sisters are the same everywhere, angels of peace and mercy.

Caring for the Child

To the Editor of AMERICA:

After reading "Caring for the Child" in your issue for October 13, I felt ashamed to think that in the past I had allowed so many deserving appeals to go unheeded. For the future I will do my part, because I too was an orphan child, though not of the class mentioned, and I owe a great debt to those good Sisters who took such excellent care of me in my infancy. I enclose $5.00 for the care of the little ones, in honor of St. Anthony, and I know it will be the best investment I ever made.

A Scarlet Fever Chaser

To the Editor of AMERICA:

There is still with us a class of religious journals which accept patent medicine advertisements, advertisements of correspondence courses in nursing, Father John's holy sustainer, intensified foods, every dollar's worth of which is equal to one penny-bun, and so on through all the tricks of drug makers to separate the ignorant from their money. Last week in a journal like these I saw a prescription given for a medicine which averts scarlet fever infallibly, and when the infallibility slips a cog it invariably cures the disease; at least the editor says it does. The prescription is: Digitalis, one grain; zinc sulphate, one grain; water, four ounces; given in teaspoonful doses.

This medicine will neither prevent nor cure scarlet fever, nor anything else. It wouldn't prevent or cure a sessile wart. Someone, however, might try it in scarlet fever, as they try Christian Science, and so do damage. There is no such drug as digitalis. There are numerous derivatives of digitalis used in medicine, and no drugs require more skill in their use than just the digitalis group. There is a thirty-second of a grain of the "digitalis" in each dose, and the same quantity of zinc sulphate. That quantity of zinc sulphate is very homeopathic. Taken all in all this medicine in scarlet fever would be as effective as a mustard plaster applied to the hitching post before the patient's house. It is unmitigated "piffle," and that any editor should publish it as useful information is discouraging.

More Chaplains

NO one who has met Catholics but knows the hold which religion has on them. If they are at all worthy of the name and have not been spoiled by social climbing, or political ambition, or Socialistic propaganda, the Faith penetrates into their innermost heart, and although it may not control their ordinary actions to the full extent which the Church would desire, it asserts a clamorous dominance over all their thoughts in moments of anguish and danger.

The ordinary Catholic may not always be ready to live for the Faith, but as a rule he will fight for it and die for it, and above all he is eager to die in it so that he may go to meet his God, aided by its strengthening rites. In the sordid struggle to keep the wolf from his door his eyes may be fixed on the ground oftener than on the skies; but when he meets the messenger of death, he lifts them, bright with the vision of faith, to Heaven, and if he can only have the priest to assist him, he looks with unflinching courage past the silent city of the dead into the home of his desires. As the sands of life run out, thoughts of eternity come flooding into his soul; and at the last supreme moment he wants above everything the consolations of his Faith.

This being the case, it is easy to understand that the greatest privation to which a Catholic soldier can be subjected is not the absence of comfort or the presence of hardship, not separation from home or the prospect of death, but the want of a chaplain to hear his confession and to bid him Godspeed into eternal rest. It would seem a little thing indeed, when a man is willing to lay down his life for his country, to accord him the privilege of having a chaplain near him to shrive him as he fixes his bayonet for his last charge and to anoint him as his life-blood gushes from his heart. Yet it must be confessed that the nations of Europe, which have shown such marvelous efficiency in other details of military preparation, have broken down rather lamentably in this matter of according their Catholic soldiers on the battlefield the ministrations of priests.

The following excerpt from a letter written by an Irish chaplain with the forces in France to the Irish Catholic emphasizes the disastrous consequences of such a short-sighted policy:

I remember a brigade, more than half Catholic, which lost its chaplain. Despite the efforts of the Divisional Command, no other was available. There was the daily toll of casualties from shell and rifle fire. Everyone was struck with the desolation of the dying. The Church of England chaplain of the brigade asked me if it would do for him to hear the Confessions of the dying and tell them to me afterwards! Good, kindly man, he had but one thought—to assuage the anguish of the dying. I heard someone lately tell the pathetic tale of a large hospital ship chock-full of wounded. One cry resounded from stem to stern, a cry for the priest, and there was none. I was witness of this myself. Not once, alás! but many, many times. Such details are harrowing. I mention them to bring out the hardships which the present shortage of chaplains entails on the Church's children in their hour of sorest trial.

To the credit of the Government of the United States be it said that there has been no disposition on its part to deny its Catholic soldiers and sailors the consolations of religion. However, for one reason or another the number of chaplains who have received commissions is still altogether inadequate, and unless prompt measures are taken to supply the deficiency there will be in the American forces many repetitions of incidents such as those described in the above citation. It is incredible that anything whatsoever should stand in the way of meeting the need of chaplains. The Government overcame all obstacles in the way of providing recreation for soldiers and sailors, it cannot do less for their far more urgent spiritual needs. More Catholic chaplains are needed for our Catholic fighting men.

Vain Regrets

"I HAD but the one. That was my folly. Now I have nothing," is the bitter lament of a French mother who has lost in the present war her only son. Another French woman who has her boy "out there" in the trenches tearfully confessed to an American acquaintance:

> We are all of us French women of a certain class so stupid when we are young. I adore children. But I thought I could only afford to have one, as I wanted to do so much for him. Now if I lose that one, what have I to live for? . . . It was silly of me to have but this one. I know, now that it is too late, that I could have done as well, and it may be better, with several, for I have seen the possibilities demonstrated among my friends who have three or four.

There are few things sadder than these women's vain regrets. They now see a large portion of their country invaded and made desolate by a powerful enemy that could have been kept from their borders had they and all the other mothers of France only been pious, brave and patriotic enough to bear and rear large families. For then their sons would have been so numerous and strong three years ago that perhaps the Kaiser would never have dared to march his soldiers into France. But while Germany's population steadily increased, France's just as steadily grew less. Before the war there were only 775,000 births a year in all France, while the deaths were 724,000, but last year the births fell to 310,000, while the death-rate rose to 1,110,000. Let us hope that, before the war is over, some mothers nearer home will not be echoing the laments of these two French women. What a sorry spectacle birth-controllists present when the call to arms is sounded.

All Saints

THE Feast of All Saints brings home to us in a thrilling form a great dogma, the holiness of the Catholic Church. It proves to us that the Catholic Church, in virtue of the power given her by her Divine Founder, can produce and foster holiness, and that she is the mother of saints. She can evoke holiness and preserve it in the souls of her children because her Founder is holiness personified, because His purpose in bringing her into existence was to make men holy, because the means and the instruments given her for that purpose, her doctrines and morality, are essentially holy also.

The Catholic Church is also the mother of saints. In virtue of the gifts with which she has been dowered by her Founder, through the operation and the influence of her dogmas and morality, she has actually produced saints, who are the noblest and the best of our race, the world's true heroes.

The sanctity of the Catholic Church, the fact that she can produce saints, that she has been the mother of a long line of virgins, martyrs, confessors and doctors whom the world hails as the noblest representatives of humanity, is one of the strongest proofs of her Divinity. That work is surely of God. Sanctity so far transcends the ordinary powers of our fallen nature that when it is seen, the hand of God is manifest. And the manifestations of the holiness of the Catholic Church are so striking that they force the admiration even of her enemies. That sanctity of which she is the fruitful mother is of all times, of all ages, ranks and conditions of life. She counts her Saints among the rich and the poor. They come from the palace of the king and the peasant's hut, from the domestic hearth and the home, from the cell of the hermit and the nun.

Sanctity in her fold is not confined to the days of the martyrs of the Catacombs. It is not limited to one privileged class. In the Catholic Church sanctity wears with Sebastian the helmet and the sword of the Roman officer, with Ignatius of Loyola, it wields the lance of the Spanish knight. It dons the robe of royalty with Louis of France and Stephen of Hungary. It binds its brow with the queenly jewels of Hedwiges of Poland, the ducal crown of Elizabeth of Thuringia. It bends with Thomas of Aquinas over the pages of the Gospel and the writings of Greek sages. With Isidore of Seville it guides the oxen and the plough; paints immortal canvases with Fra Angelico; at the organ with Cecilia it hymns a song that the Angels might envy. With Teresa it hallows the cloister; with Xavier it conquers the East. It is an abiding sign that the Catholic Church is of God, that in the midst of a sinful world she is doing God's work.

On the Feast of All Saints we lift our eyes to the heavenly mansions where the Saints now dwell. The armies of the living God are marching past. The light of victory is on their brow and the palm of immortality in their hand. On All Saints Day the Church of God reviews her faithful troops. Their toil is over, their fight is done. God Himself is now their reward exceeding great. An echo of their triumph is borne to earth. No heart so dull as not to be thrilled by the martial call. We salute the victors. Using the same means which they employed, their loyalty to Christ and the teachings of that Church of which they are the ornament and the pride, we can obtain the same reward.

Scrapping the American Constitution

A MERE scrap of paper: such is the Constitution of the United States today in the State of Oklahoma. The abuse of politics by prohibitionist leaders to promote their campaign of religious intolerance has deprived Catholics of the right to perform their essential act of Divine worship in that State. This equally unchristian and unconstitutional tyranny, touching upon the most vital interests of human life, is a sad commentary on our boasted love of freedom and democracy. While Catholic soldiers are marching forth in the name of liberty, the worst form of oppression, religious tyranny, is triumphantly enthroned in a State that claims to be represented by a star in our national banner.

It has therefore become necessary for the Chancellor of the Oklahoma diocese to file a "Petition for Writ of Mandamus" against the public carriers who, in pursuance of the constitutional prohibition provision, refuse to accept shipments of wine for altar purposes. Such is the step that must be taken in order that a hundred Christian churches in the State of Oklahoma, numerous schools, convents, hospitals, colleges and seminaries may be able to enjoy the most ordinary rights of religious liberty provided for them by their national Constitution and assured to them beneath the flag for which even now they are going forth, ready to lay down their lives if that sacrifice be required of them.

We are proclaiming the sacredness of international treaties. Yet by this act of intolerance prohibitionist leaders, in their campaign of bigotry, have torn into shreds, as a mere scrap of paper, the solemn treaty between the Republic of France and the United States of America, whereby the Louisiana Territory, originally including the present State of Oklahoma, was ceded to the United States with the provision that its Catholic inhabitants should be "protected in the enjoyment of their liberty, property and the religion which they profess." Mere scraps of paper, too, in the hands of these politicians were the terms of the Enabling act whereby Oklahoma was admitted into the Union and the religious liberty sections of the Constitution of the State of Oklahoma and of the Constitution of the United States. What else could we expect? What indeed are the most sacred rights and conventions of mankind to men who are blinded by religious bigotry and intolerance! Poor Oklahoma! The lesson is timely for all American Catholics. They must sleep in their armor, if they would guard their sacred rights.

Divorce's Chief Victims

TIME was when the chivalrous South, though for the most part Protestant, was considered almost as zealous for the permanence of the marriage bond as is the Catholic Church herself. But nowadays Dixieland seems to be losing that enviable distinction. For if we may judge by the recent divorce statistics of two representative Virginia towns, marriages are becoming quite as short-lived down there as in more "enterprising" northern communities. According to reports filed with the Census Bureau at Washington Richmond with a population of 154,000 had 244 divorces during the year 1916, while Roanoke, a town of some 42,000, had ninety-five. Of the latter number, desertion, unfaithfulness, intemperance and cruelty, were, in a decreasing ratio, the grounds on which the divorces were granted and forty-four children, all told, were effected by the courts' decrees.

It is those forty-four little ones, innocent sufferers for their parents' sins, who are most to be pitied. Robbed of a loving mother's care or a father's guiding hand at an age when both are needed most, what kind of citizens are those children likely to be when they grow up? Many of them, it is safe to say, will be a menace or a burden to the State, and scarcely one of them will live to be the excellent citizen he probably would have become, had he only been reared in a peaceful Christian home, where both parents took pains to bring up their boys and girls well. So the Catholic Church, in absolutely prohibiting divorce, as she was taught by her Divine Founder to do, is clearly the best protector of helpless and innocent childhood in the world today. As it is the duty of married people not only to have children but to rear, safeguard and educate them as well, the Church, enlightened from on high, has always set her face like a flint against divorce, for she realizes that when the marriage bond is broken, it is little children who are the chief victims of the sin.

Three Heroic Mothers

NOW that so many mothers in the land have nobly sent their sons off to the war, perhaps the example left us by historic mothers who have made like sacrifices will help to hearten and comfort in their loneliness these generous mothers of America. What an admirable portrait, for example, Shakespeare draws of the Roman mother in "Coriolanus" when Volumnia says:

> When yet he [Coriolanus] was but tender-bodied, and the only son of my womb, when youth with comeliness plucked all gaze his way, when for a day of kings' entreaties a mother should not sell him an hour from her beholding, I considering how honor would become such a person, that it was no better than picture-like to hang by the wall, if renown made it not stir, was pleased to let him seek danger where he was like to find fame. To a cruel war I sent him; from whence he returned, his brows bound with oak. I tell thee, daughter, I sprang not more in joy at first hearing he was a man-child, than now in first seeing he had proved himself a man. . . . Hear me profess sincerely: Had I a dozen sons, each in my love alike, and none less dear than thine and my good Marcius, I had rather had eleven die nobly for their country than one voluptuously surfeit out of action.

Nobler still was the conduct of the Machabees' mother who, when her seven sons were being tortured and murdered before her very eyes because they would not violate God's law, kept entreating them so heroically to be steadfast and faithful that she deserved to receive in the inspired pages of Holy Writ such high praises as these:

> Now the mother was to be admired above measure, and worthy to be remembered by good men, who beheld her seven sons slain in the space of one day,-and bore it with a good courage for the hope that she had in God: and she bravely exhorted every one of them in her own language, being filled with wisdom and joining a man's heart to a woman's thought.

But noblest of all, and richest, too, in comfort for sorrowing mothers, is Our Blessed Lady, who stood unflinchingly at the foot of the Cross and freely offered up for the ransom of the world her incomparable Son. She made that sacrifice to free from the servitude of sin not only her own nation, but the entire world, and she made it whole-heartedly and without reserve. There never lived a mother and a son who were dearer to each other than were Mary and Jesus, no son ever died a more cruel death or for a holier cause than He, and no mother ever suffered more from the sword of grief than she. Almighty God graciously permitted this in order that Our Lady might be able to sympathize and that sorrowing mothers in ages to come might always find in her heroic example and strong intercession a stay and comfort.

In Volumnia, that high-hearted Roman matron, in the mother of the Machabees, that intrepid defender of her nation's honor, and in Mary, that unselfish lover of human liberty, all the mothers of the land who with tear-dimmed eyes have watched their sons march away to the war have patterns of patriotism that are no less inimitable than admirable.

Literature

THE JUSTIFICATION OF "VERS LIBRE"

THE main objection to the whole quarrel with the vers libristes may be epitomized in the question: Do they sing? do they give us music? for, as poetry might be defined as the voice of beauty, or as beauty made articulate, the world has long since decided that poetry to deserve the name must have these two qualities, namely, beauty for its content and music to express that content.

Now it must be confessed that under the banners of the new poetry there has gathered a ragged host who are makers of the most barbarous dissonance, the most unholy noise that ever assaulted a reluctant ear. But this is no new thing. Pope has told us of the mob of gentlemen who wrote with ease, and we all know the fate that befell them. Wordsworth had his disciples who were balder than their master. And did there not linger among us till only quite recently a thin echo of the Tennysonian cadence?

Setting those writers aside, therefore, we shall find that the wiser apologists for the new poetry are at some pains to tell us that though vers libre is devoid of formal meter, it has nevertheless a certain rhythm; and if space were at our disposal we should proceed to quote "The Evening Rain," by John Gould Fletcher, and "The Red Month," by James Oppenheim. But we have room only for "A Baby Asleep After Pain," by D. H. Lawrence, which runs thus:

As a drenched, drowned bee
Hangs numb and heavy from a bending flower,
So clings to me
My baby, her brown hair brushed with wet tears
And laid against her cheek;
Her soft white legs hanging heavily over my arm
Swinging heavily to my movement as I walk.
My sleeping baby hangs upon my life,
Like a burden she hangs on me.
She has always seemed so light,
But now she is wet with tears and numb with pain;
Even her floating hair sinks heavily
Reaching downwards;
As the wings of a drenched, drowned bee
Are a heaviness, and a weariness.

and for the following lines on "Anne Rutledge," Abraham Lincoln's dead sweetheart, which occur in Edgar Lee Masters' "Spoon River Anthology":

Out of me unworthy and unknown
The vibrations of deathless music;
"With malice toward none, with charity for all."
Out of me the forgiveness of millions towards millions,
And the beneficent face of a nation
Shining with justice and truth.
I am Anne Rutledge who sleep beneath these weeds,
Beloved in life of Abraham Lincoln,
Wedded to him, not through union,
But through separation.
Bloom forever, O Republic,
From the dust of my bosom!

In these poems we have clearly and unquestionably beauty, emotion, power, imagination, and, yes, music, and music, too, of a very fine quality. And we would submit moreover that it is a music, a movement entirely different from, essentially dissimilar to that of prose. Of course, at first it sounds strange to the ear long fed on rhyme and regular rhythm; but a fresh presentment of beauty always seems strange; novelty is never familiar; and we have no manner of doubt that the first readers of blank verse found that also strange until their hearing became used to a new harmony.

Summing up, then, we would say that the benefits wrought by the vers libristes have been mainly these: First and foremost they have dispelled the conspiracy of silence which for so many years here in America had borne down like an obscuring and, worse, a smothering fog on the fair form of poetry. Secondly, their innovation in rhythm has affected the regular versemen so that we may now discern in the work of the latter a quality of sound, a free movement, a subtle cadence, a lilt, a swing, a swiftness, a variety which it did not exhibit before. If the new movement had created no other effects than these two we should say that it had triumphantly justified itself; but in addition we go on and say that, thirdly, the vers libristes have on their own account produced fine and meritorious work in a new and more flexible form; and we are certain, moreover, that as time goes on and their mastery of their medium becomes firmer and more assured they will produce even finer and more enduring work.

And here we would make some general observations. To readers we would say: The poets make the laws of their art; the critics merely formulate them. Vers libre will not displace regular verse, nor does it seek to do so; there is room for both. Rhyme did not go out with the appearance of blank verse, nor did alliteration cease on the introduction of rhyme. The new poetry has music, not the music of the old, but yet music, and a music, too, different from that of prose. Judge the new poetry by its best, not by its worst; every movement has its grotesque shadows. The new manner is only apparently easier than the old; and moreover the new poets are close students of regular verse and are themselves proficient in it. When blank verse first came in, people no doubt thought that, now the necessity of finding rhymes was removed, poetry would be a facile business. We no longer think so.

And to the poets: If you really must sin against accepted canons, then in literature as in life to escape the world's censure you must sin splendidly. Only too often you sin drably, dully, unintelligibly, in a word, unmannerly; and for that the world has no forgiveness. Blasphemy is not wit, nor can sound art be reared on rotten foundations. The soul, the very breath of life of poetry is spiritual content. If you have not that, you have nothing. Don't give the rein to your loose fancy and looser philosophy in order to startle or shock us. It is bad art; it is your business to please. And besides we are not shocked; we are bored.

Cleverness is not poetry and never will be; that smart, intellectual adroitness, that thing all brain, and mostly surface brain, and no heart, that brazen, smirking, capering spirit of flippancy and irreverence: that is the prime sin, the capital crime, the deadly blight of American letters, which stretches its withering length from James Russell Lowell and from beyond him down to his feminine namesake of the present day. Avoid that as you would the plague.

And lastly, we would commend to your consideration a certain episode in the "Faerie Queen," that, namely, where Britomart wandering through the palace of Busyrane comes to door after door, and over each one she reads the legend, "Be bold," "Be bold," and everywhere, "Be bold"; but finally she comes to the last door and over that it says, "Be not too bold."

And now, in conclusion, a word to the specific reader of this periodical, the Catholic, the man who holds that his Faith is by far the most precious and invaluable of all possible possessions, which is not to be imperiled by dallying with an evil book, no matter how famous or popular, and that the purity of his soul is under no circumstance to be exposed to the influence of indecent art, however alluring or magnificent. Needless to say we are not here offering for his approval Masters, the blasphemer; Oppenheim, the social-evolutionist and panegyrist of naturalism; the erotic Lawrence, the bigoted Miss Lowell, or any other of the new writers in whom we may find cause of moral or philosophical offense; and we might quite simply dispose of this particular matter by saying that when we quote these writers we no more approve of the principles they represent than we approve of pantheism in quoting Shelley, paganism in quoting Keats, or indecency in quoting Burns or Chaucer.

But this does not fully answer; and we must admit boldly and at once that we have a quarrel with such writers, and a most tremendous and mortal one. But let us understand the situation clearly: this quarrel is as old as literature itself; it is spiritually speaking, as old as the world; and the plain truth is that if poetry were to be condemned absolutely and without reserve on the score of indelicacy or erroneous doctrine, then there is in all English literature scarce one major poet, if one, who would stand. And the classics would go at a single swoop—from Virgil, the delight of the Ages of Faith, to Homer himself, the very father of the art.

Where, then, are we to find secure footing? Well, as to the pagans, what is Hecuba to us, or we to Hecuba? The gods are dead, the oracles are silent, their creeds outworn are buried deep in the earth whence there shall be no resurrection; and yet across the waste of dead centuries there is still borne to us the serene music of their art, giving voice and form and substance to the great dreams that house forever in the heart of man. And as to poets in general of this we can be most certain, that they are true to their high calling, their message comes actually home to us, only when and in so far as they image forth for us their sense of that perfection which is but a dim mirror of Absolute Perfection and their vision of that beauty which is but a weak and shadowy replica of Infinite Beauty. This it is to which all poets must, and do, bear witness—Catholic or Protestant, Jew or Gentile, Pagan or Christian; however unconsciously, however brokenly and imperfectly, however partially and obscurely; for only so can poetry speak to us with power and with authority. This is its glory, this is its sanction, this is its law.

BOOK REVIEWS

The Irish Home-Rule Convention. New York: The Macmillan Co. $0.50.

The heart of this little book is the excellent essay called "Thoughts for a Convention" by George W. Russell (A. E.), and enveloping it are pages dealing on "A Defense of the Convention," by the Hon. Sir Horace Plunkett, and "An American Opinion," by Mr. John Quinn. Readers of AMERICA have already had the matter contained in this volume put before them; for the contributions to its "Correspondence" department afforded abundant space to a consideration of "What Ireland Wants." George Russell's paper first appeared in a Unionist journal, the Irish Times, and a few days later 20,000 copies of the essay in pamphlet form were sold. It shook the Unionists in their innermost tabernacle at the time it appeared, and, no doubt, the present tendency to lay the blame for the Easter uprising at the door of Ulster-Carsonism has been inspired by this argument of Russell's. For recently articles in such journals as the New York Nation, articles that would hardly have been admitted six months ago, are proving to the world that the disloyalty of Carson and Ulster was the logical foreground for excessive Sinn Feinism to tread. It is not amiss to quote these passages from Russell's essay; for they are a contribution to those "views" already given in AMERICA:

> Many Sinn Feiners advocate "an independent Ireland." If by that they mean a republic, they will, in my judgment, get it only as a sequel of a revolution in England, in which no one believes. On the other hand, Americans should not be misled by the common charges against the Sinn Feiners. The main body of them are constitutional reformers. . . . I believe that colonial home rule would amply satisfy nineteen-twentieths of the people of Ireland. . . . I am satisfied that the majority of the convention will see to it that there shall not come out of the convention any reasonable grounds for belief that Ulster has won, that Ulster has had her way, that secret diplomacy has again come out on top, that back-stairs intrigue and private understandings are not over, but that broad statesmanship and a genuine desire to promote the interests of Ireland and of England have been the guiding motive of this convention.

Another sentence deserves quotation, a commentary upon one of the things that old Ireland lost with her old language and social life. Hear first this sentence out of Alice Stopford Green's scholarly book, "The Making of Ireland and Its Undoing," "Every Irish household was an academy of courtesy and conversation." And now this sentence from Russell: "When we lost the old Irish culture we lost the tradition of courtesy to each other which lessens the difficulties of life and makes it possible to conduct controversy without creating bitter memories."

The Offender. By BURDETTE G. LEWIS. New York: Harper and Brothers. $1.50.

The Present-Day Problem of Crime. By ALBERT H. CURRIER. Boston: Richard G. Badger. $1.00.

In several respects these books are a decided advance upon the pamphlets that flooded the world after the popularization of Lombroso's pseudo-science. In all respects, they are infinitely superior to the productions of the more recent "Maudlin School" of criminology for which "Blackie," Miss Madeline Z. Doty, and Julian Hawthorne may stand as sponsors in triplicate. Dr. Currier sees clearly that some people are bad, not because their median incisors are hypertrophied, but because, knowing what is good, they freely choose the opposite. Mr. Lewis is certain that the little red school house is not, in itself, a perfect barrier against the inroad of crime. "Some of our cleverest and most resourceful offenders," he writes, "have been highly trained by our system of public education." Each admits that "religion" is an element of reformation. Common-sense gratefully acknowledges these concessions.

As for the rest, the philosophy of the two volumes is hopeless. Mr. Lewis is not quite sure what an offender is; Dr. Currier hedges like a New York election officer before the Grand Jury, when asked for a definition of crime. Both are unsatisfactory in treating the question of free-will; although to appraise the moral value of a human act, apart from free-will, is impossible. Consistency is a jewel which neither wears, but the philosophy of these writers seems to be Jansenism interpreted by Hume: that the power of delectation, whether for good or evil, draws the will by a necessity which cannot be resisted. When penologists balk at free-will, and petulantly ask what bearing original sin has on their theses, the future of reform looks dark. Archbishop Ullathorne, who, according to W. S. Lilly, was very successful in reforming criminals, used to say that many expedients brought forward in his day, for regenerating human nature, had one defect, but that fatal: "The nature to be regenerated was left out of the calculation." If Mr. Lewis is retailing facts, not fancies, the majority of the New York police force should be sitting on the Supreme Bench, instead of pricing eggs and counting lamp-posts; for their keen social vision, with their overwhelming hunger and thirst after justice, has but a narrow scope in Manhattan. By the initiate, Appendices VI and VII of the first volume will be read with some amusement.

Poems. By JOHN MASEFIELD. Selected by HENRY SEIDEL CANBY, Ph.D.; FREDERICK ERASTUS PIERCE, Ph.D.; WILLARD HIGLEY DURHAM, Ph.D. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.60.

If John Masefield were not so much interested in his body, he might find time for some interest in his soul, and the result would be great poetry. I judge Mr. Masefield by the present volume which three Yale professors, by pooling their genius, here brought into being; for of the man's life and previous work, I know nothing at all. This test may not be proper, for although I left poetry for other pursuits ten years ago, I still remember that both Ovid and Herrick, that genial Anglo-pagan, protested its validity. Their verse, they said, might be unfit for the perusal of the jeune fille, but their lives were unexceptionable. However that may be, it is clear that Mr. Masefield has studied the material part of man intensively; and, to me at least, quite as clear that he has not reviewed man's other essential part with equal care. His human beings are therefore creatures of dull clay, lacking the vital spark. The question why Mr. Masefield should be content to dabble in mud, when, if he wishes, he can touch the lofty stars with his sublime head, may probably be reduced to a question of taste, which the poet answers in a fashion that makes the world of beauty poorer. The author of "August, 1914" issues a base counterfeit that should have passed out of circulation with Kipling's early blood-and-thunder indiscretions, in "The Everlasting Mercy." Saul Kane was good at his fists and he early learned how "good ale makes floors seem like the ceiling," but he does not seem to have learned much else. No doubt, many an excellent lesson in morality can be picked up at any jail or police station; but the poetry that uses Pegasus to haul his admirers to those barred recesses, somehow seems more like penology. Sumerian Liturgical Texts. By STEPHEN LANGDON; Lists of Personal Names from the Temple School of Nippur. By EDWARD CHIERA; Sumerian Grammatical Texts. By STEPHEN LANGDON. The Epic of Gilgamish. By STEPHEN LANGDON. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Museum.

These four monographs are respectively Vol. X, No. 2-3; Vol. XI, No. 2, and Vol. XII, No. 1, of the "Publications of the Babylonian Section of the University of Pennsylvania Museum." They are all important contributions to Assyriology, especially to the linguistics and religion of the Sumerians. These ancient dwellers in Mesopotamia were not a Semitic folk; and spoke a language that, apart from a few borrowings, shows no kinship with Babylonian nor any evidence of Semitic origin. Sumerian is probably of the same family as Hungarian, Finnish, and Laplandish. From the twenty-fifth to the twenty-second century B. C., the Sumerians were at the zenith of their glory. The kings of Ur and of Isin were then deified. Hymns were composed to glorify these deified mortals, and to celebrate the advent of a Messianic age. Many of these hymns, called zag-sal, were discovered in the library of Nippur, and are now edited, transliterated, and translated by Dr. Langdon. They are of great worth in the history of religions, and show clear traces of the primitive revelation of a Messias. Even the deification of kings seems due to a degeneration of the revelation, given to the human race in Adam, that the Seed of the Woman would vanquish the seed of the serpent. The great importance of Sumerian documents has recently been made popular by a controversy in the London press between Professor Jastrow of the University of Pennsylvania and Dr. Langdon, Reader in Assyriology in Oxford, wherein each branded the other as ignorant of Sumerian. Meantime we welcome Dr. Langdon's fragment of the South Babylonian tradition of the famous Epic of Gilgamish; it contains 240 lines of the second book, and shows another phase of the degeneration of primitive revelation outside the tradition of Scripture. On the Edge of the War Zone. From the Battle of the Marne to the Entrance of the Stars and Stripes. By MILDRED ALDRICH. Boston: Small, Maynard & Co. $1.25.

Those who enjoyed reading "A Hilltop on the Marne," one of the more notable books on the war, and favorably reviewed in AMERICA, will no doubt be eager to secure this continuation of Miss Aldrich's charming letters from La Creste to friends here. The scenes she describes in this volume are less stirring than those in the preceding, for the tide of battle has retired from her little cottage, and though the author could often hear the booming of the guns at Reims, she was left practically undisturbed for the next two years or more. The book is chiefly valuable for the vivid pictures it gives of France's indomitable spirit. To Mgr. Morbeau, the Bishop of Meaux, for example, Miss Aldrich pays this tribute:

> No figure is so familiar in the picturesque old streets . . . as this tall, powerful-looking man in his soutane and barrette, with his air of authority, familiar yet dignified. He seems to know everyone by name, is all over the market, his keen eye seeing everything, as influential in the everyday life of his diocese as he is in its spiritual affairs. . . . I hear he was on the battlefield from the beginning, and that the first ambulances to reach Meaux found the seminary full of wounded picked up under his direction and cared for as well as his resources permitted.

Miss Aldrich's letters also describe the hardships she had to endure owing to the lack of fuel, the solace she found in a family of highly gifted kittens, and the excitement she experienced when troops were quartered in her little house. The volume is illustrated with photographs of a number of the people she tells about, and with striking pen-pictures of scenes she beheld. W. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The October 22 number of the Catholic Mind is made up of two papers which those interested in apologetics will find very valuable. In "Joan of Arc's 'Catholic Persecutors'" Terence J. Connolly, S.J., examines the misleading notions of the Church's attitude to the Maid of Orleans which a widely exhibited photo-play gave the public during the past year. Catholic ecclesiastics were her stanchest defenders while she lived, and after her death it was the Church, of course, that first rehabilitated and subsequently beatified France's national heroine. The other article in the number is a discerning appreciation, by John C. Reville, S.J., of "James Balmes," the great Spanish Catholic apologist of the early half of the nineteenth century. "Protestantism and Catholicism Compared in Their Effects on the Civilization of Europe" was written by Balmes as a masterly answer to Guizot's misrepresentations, and Father Reville shows that it is still an apologetic work of the highest value.

The fifteen graceful little essays in Lisa Ysaye's "Inn of Disenchantment" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.25), are made up chiefly of little chats between the Lady in Blue, who is a romanticist fond of illusions, and the Gentleman in Gray, who is a realist fond of dissipating them. He well remarks, for instance, in the essay entitled "Questions," that in childhood we keep asking "Why?" in youth "Why not?" in middle life "How?" and in old age "What for?" The paper on "Facts" is also full of profound truths. The author bids the reader:

Look back and see what is left to you from the passing years that ran like sand through your fingers. Facts? Actualities? Or the flavor of one or two unforgotten hours, the haunting melody of a little song, the perfume of roses dead forever, and a last glimmer of lights extinct? So true is this, that if you want to impress a fact on the human mind, you have to do it in terms of emotion. . . . Facts are dead, mechanical and uninteresting, and because they are dead they can be repeated a thousand times; you can do the same thing as often as you may want, but you can never feel the same emotion twice.

Another excellent essay in the book is "These Degenerate Days," in which the author shows that those who are really young still delight "in the true and simple things of life."

"Physics with Applications" (Allyn & Bacon), by Carhart and Chute, is a revision of the text for high-school grades by the same authors. The clear, simple definitions of the book, in language well adapted to the average pupil, are helped by italics and the frequent use of capitals for important words. The matter is thoroughly up to date, and the presentation is a distinct advance. The treatment of mechanics is quite striking, and should keep up the interest which is often lost at the very outset of physics by those who are unable to relish dry-bone principles. It is a revision which has enhanced the advantages of the former edition; the excellent photos and the applications drawn from the great war are features worthy of special mention. It is the best high-school physics the reviewer has seen, and teachers will like it.——"Laws of Physical Science" (Lippincott), by Edwin F. Northrupp, Ph.D., has an undoubted utility. It is a handbook of fundamentals in the natural sciences. The subject-matter is more advanced than that of the ordinary "handbooks," and evidently has been prepared with much care, for the style is clear, and explanations are concise. The references show a wide knowledge of the best scientific literature, and the index is an excellent feature. It is a book for those who already know and wish to refresh a point. The title is inaccurate and is not saved by the preface. There is too much vagueness about the real meaning in science of "law" and "theory," and this book is one instance of it.

"Mental Antidotes for Many Ills" (Badger, $1.00) by George R. Wood, an ex-Baptist minister, is a little book of prescriptions for such diseases of the soul as unhappiness, social discord, forebodings, and an unbalanced mind and failure. The remedies are in keeping with common-sense.——Clarence H. Wilson has written an attractive book of "Talks to Young People on Ethics" (Scribner's $1.00). It aims to present the life of virtue as one of great adventure, with the hope of thus appealing to daring youth. The Catholic teacher will find this point of view, with its appeal to merely natural motives, quite inadequate. Father Conroy has done the thing much better. However, for those boys who are entirely ignorant of supernatural virtue the book will prove of value.——Rufus M. Jones' "St. Paul the Hero" (Macmillan, $1.00) is an interesting, reverential and picturesque little sketch of the great Apostle's career which will appeal to youthful readers.——"Selections Moral and Religious from the works of John Ruskin, with Notes and Comments by Frederick W. Osborn, Professor Emeritus Adelphi College, Brooklyn" (Badger, $1.00) is the complete title of a little volume which sets forth discerningly John Ruskin's value as a teacher of morals.

"Under Fire, the Story of a Squad" (Dutton, $1.50), which Fitzwater Wray has well translated from the French of Henri Barbusse, describes the adventures a group of poilus had in the trenches. The book is modestly styled "the greatest of all war books," but horror is piled on horror and the reader is scarcely spared a single grisly detail of what a modern battle means. If the plain speaking in such books as this will only bring home to comfortable war-propagandists what ruthless savagery and indescribable suffering characterize the present conflict and so will hasten the return of peace, "Under Fire" will not have been written in vain.——"The Clammer and the Submarine" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.25), by William John Hopkins, is a story based on such side-lights of the present war as submarines in American waters and the visit of Joffre to our country. It is moderately interesting.——"Old Man Curry" (Doran, $1.35), by Charles E. Van Loan, will be read with delight by anyone with a sense of humor and some knowledge of race-horses. Perhaps the stern moralist may lift an occasional eyebrow on examining Mr. Curry's ethical processes, and it is quite certain that some of this gentleman's Biblical quotations will not be found in any polyglot or polychrome edition.——"The Wages of Honor" (Scribner's, $1.35), by Katharine Holland Brown, is a collection of short stories. The opening tale, which gives the name to the volume, revamps an old moral in a new and interesting way; the others, with the exception of "Brewster Blood," are commonplace and rather dull.

The action of "Webster Man's Man" (Doubleday, $1.35), Peter B. Kyne's latest novel, takes place for the most part in the familiar field of revolutionary Latin America. John Stuart Webster, a breezy mining engineer with the gift of expression and a genius for adventure dominates the book. Dolores Ruey, his ultimate fate, certainly does not talk like the lady the author assures us she is. Other well-drawn characters in the story will interest and entertain readers who do not mind probabilities being considerably strained provided something exciting keeps happening.——Basil King's latest novel, "The High Heart" (Harper, $1.50), is not equal to most of his former books. The autobiographical Alexandra Adare, the central figure of the story, is a nursery governess from Canada who becomes engaged to her employer's brother. He is disowned forthwith by the masterful head of the family and the conventional results follow. A well-worked-up episode in the story is the account of Alexandra's success in heading off a disgraceful elopement. The novel peters out weakly at the end, for the account of Strangways' career is lacking in artistry.

Among the papers in the October Month is an appreciation of John Ayscough's novels by Father Lucas, "Socialism and the War," by Father Keating, "The New Thought Movement," by Father Thurston, and Father Pollen's proof that Simon Hunt, who taught the boy Shakespeare Latin in the village school of Stratford-on-Avon, subsequently became a Jesuit. In one of the poems in the number, Judith Carrington, after showing that none of the great women of the Old Testament "ran such a risk as she, The Spouse of God, the Mother of God, the Maid," ends with these stanzas:

Ah, but to hold Him close against her breast,
  Ah, but to have Him playing round her knee,
To lift and lay Him down for noonday rest—
  When others lifted she was there to see.
Ah, but to wash those baby hands and feet,
  To fill His little porringer with care,
To feed Him sup by sup, the helpless sweet—
  When others fed Him, helpless, she was there.
She shared His manhood's hope, she shared His loss:
  She heard her deepest faith proclaimed a lie:
Unflinching, left the Cradle for the Cross:
  She watched His childhood's sleep, she saw Him die.

Most prudent Virgin, warn His other lovers:
  "Beware, our God is a consuming flame.
Know, from the wound He wounds with none recovers,
  The Lion of Judah, whom no man may tame."

EDUCATION

Catechism in the Grades

A LITTLE girl, one of a large class, sat nervously erect, her feet dangling, her hands clenched tensely behind her, listening to an instruction on preparation for First Holy Communion.

"A child," said the teacher toward the end of her discourse, "not so old as you children, committed in one second a sin of thought. Immediately afterwards he died, and was cast into hell."

The little girl shuddered. She imagined herself in the sinful child's place. She felt sorry for him, particularly as she was convinced that he would have made his Confession had be been near a priest. Of any other way out of the trouble, she was quite unaware. No doubt when the teacher had spoken about the love of God, and the act of perfect contrition, the little girl had been inattentive. And so her little mind painfully grasped the truth, that in a second one could incur such guilt as would render one deserving of punishment in unquenchable flames for all eternity.

"A boy," continued the instructor, "made a sacrilegious First Communion. He was struck dead at the altar rail, and his soul went to hell."

The little girl almost cried aloud in horror, for she could see, not the boy, but herself, white-faced on her Communion day, in her new white dress and white veil, falling back lifeless upon the church floor, when the priest should place the Sacred Host upon her tongue.

Fear and Love

THE night after that instruction she did not go to sleep easily, as little girls should. Her head hurt because of the child in hell and because of the boy who had been struck dead at the altar rail. At length, she slept unrestfully, to wake screaming from a dream of huge, gray writhing monsters, driving down upon her. Tremblingly she stole out of her bed, and ran sobbing to her mother. Her mother attributed the nightmare to a late and indigestible supper. The little girl did not explain her tears. She knew, however, only too well, that she was afraid of God.

On the following morning began the retreat. Father Donald conducted it. When he spoke, his face lighted up with something that made the little girl fancy he must be a saint. She listened enthralled to his stories of the Sacred Life lived so long ago in Palestine. Once he talked about a mountain. Perhaps it was Mount Thabor, or the Mount of Olives, or Mount Calvary. But whatever it was, it connected itself, through some indefinable association, with two verses in her autograph album:

> Aim at the highest virtue; 'tis false humility
> To creep along the valley when the mountain calls for thee.

When Father Donald explained how, through love and good will, it was possible even for a mere child to serve God, to be one of His soldiers, to fight on His side, the little girl's heart throbbed and throbbed with the desire to be near the Divine Leader. The Kingdom of God suddenly became to her an unforgettable reality. "Thy Kingdom Come!" These words she said many times daily, as Father Donald had advised. Often, too, she would close her eyes and imagine herself trudging up the mountain, while far, far ahead of her, smiling back at her, and urging her to ascend, was the King. When this picture composed itself in her mind, she almost forgot sin and hell, and she forgot to be afraid of God. She only remembered that He loved her and that she loved Him, and that she wished to follow Him forever and ever.

In teaching catechism, whatever the methods employed, whether or not less emphasis should be placed upon the evil side of life, more emphasis should unquestionably be placed upon lofty ideals, and upon the possibility, and even facility, not merely of avoiding wickedness but, by God's grace, of achieving good. To good as well as to evil, is human nature prone from its youth. A child grows to be that which is continually in its mind. If upon that mind are stamped only harrowing pictures of sin and hell, if the tabula rasa is inscribed only with words of doom, the child may, indeed, work out its salvation in fear and trembling, but it will be helpless to obey that other precept, "Rejoice in the Lord." If, on the other hand, the imagination of the child is filled with beautiful, ennobling pictures; if the boy is taught from his earliest years to "line up" as a soldier with Christ; if the little girl's awakening affection is tactfully directed toward the Son of God and His Blessed Mother; if boys and girls are reminded frequently that, far from being an unpleasant duty, it is "a great glory to follow the Lord"; if, in short, the catechism study is rendered less penitential, and more exhilarating than is customary, results will be proportionately consoling. At least, the flowers of such planting will be hope and aspiration, which are ever more desirable than depression.

A Lesson from Nature

AS to the specific manner of sowing the seed, the sowers do not always agree. New methods in catechism spring up from time to time. The shred of a recollection of one such pedagogical novelty brings to mind a picture of plump little robins hopping about on the grass. Teddy, my six-year-old theological student, whose exterior semblance doth belie his soul's immensity, is to learn inferentially from the existence of the birdlings the existence of God. Subtly, cleverly, cautiously, I endeavor to lead Teddy from a consideration of the creature to a realization of the Creator. Teddy, listening, squints his round blue eyes at the care-free objects of our study and presses his lips together. He is thinking deeply. I am gratified.

"What are you thinking about, Teddy?"

Teddy glances up quickly. An overmastering idea has him in thrall. A "new-fledged hope" begins to "flutter in his breast."

"Now—now—can I ketch one of them robins," he sputters, "if I put salt on his tail?"

At six, or even at ten, twelve, or fourteen, the vision through nature, up to nature's God, is apt to be slightly obscured. "Earth fills her lap with pleasures of her own," and in their presence, be the occasion ever so solemn, to rise above the impulses of boyhood is hard. Much easier and more heartening is it when the teacher, in the circumscribed area of the classroom, sternly asks, "Who made you?" to shout out, loud and clear and with no distraction from fish or fowl, the wholly satisfying answer one has learned from the little blue catechism, "God made me." And when one is able to inform the teacher that "God is the Maker of heaven and of earth and of all things," one has a fuller apperception of the First Cause than if one had conscientiously observed the unnumbered descendants of every bird and beast that emerged from Noah's ark, at the subsidence of the great deluge.

The Misleading Graphs

ANOTHER new method, also perhaps of dubious value, concerns itself with graphic representations of eternal truths. God, for example, is represented by a large circle drawn on the blackboard. Sanctifying grace is symbolized by little chalk marks depicting a long chain which connects the large circle with a smaller circle, that is, the soul. Mortal sin breaks a link in the chain. (The board eraser is employed to enforce this lesson.) The soul is thus separated from God. The method may have merits. Certainly a graphic presentation of God, a picture of God would reach the child's mind more quickly, would impress it more permanently than an explanation of what God is. The main objection to the graphic system, however, is that it pictures God to the child as a circle, or as a triangle, or as some other concrete symbol which God is not.

That the system, on the other hand, is a treasure-trove to the teacher there is no denying. It interests the children. It entertains them. It has all the charm of the contemporaneous, the charm that attaches to "language" as a substitute for grammar, and to "phonetics" as a substitute for mere spelling. But what brain-fagged instructor in college English does not lament the departure of those days when boys and girls in the grades "learned by heart" the definitions of the compound and complex sentence and the rule for doubling a final consonant before adding to a word a syllable beginning with a vowel? And what pastor, wearied out with explaining the ecclesiastical precepts to the headstrong young men and women of his fold, does not long for the return of that method which forced the pupil to repeat almost every morning that injunction of Mother Church, "Not to marry persons who are not Catholics, or who are related to us within the fourth degree of kindred, nor privately without witnesses, nor to solemnize marriage at forbidden times?"

Assuredly, that old method had palmary advantages. Some of them will be discussed in our next.

SOCIOLOGY

Construction and "Camouflage"

BY favor of the correspondence page of this review, one C. Connolly rose up a few weeks ago, to exercise what Henry Watterson has called the free and untrammeled right of every American citizen to prove that he is blood-brother to the equus asinus. C. Connolly buzzes like a stirred-up hornet's nest over what he calls a fateful "conspiracy of silence," in which Catholics have "always been participants." He also views with alarm and with wild regret, the action of sundry "cardinals and other clergy," who have urged the Faithful to contribute to the Knights of Columbus and the Red Cross funds, while "who," he asks plaintively, "has gathered one dollar in any Church to save a girl's soul from a life too horrible to contemplate?" This is rather a large question; happily it is answered by C. Connolly himself, who says that no one has, except a "noble body of women who have recently banded themselves together." I may be mistaken, but I think that these ladies gathered their dollars not in a church, but through the columns of an enterprising New York newspaper; however that may be, I am willing to admit that none of them were Catholics.

An Audible Conspiracy

THE "conspiracy of silence" refers to the social evil. C. Connolly ought to be satisfied, for this conspiracy has of late been given as much publicity as a three-ring circus in a country village. The head of the noble band in question daily contributes a column or so to a New York newspaper, which prints just short of a million copies whenever it goes to press. That is making a "conspiracy of silence" fairly audible. A quarterly, edited in New York, treats no other subject; the same is true of a bulletin issued twice a month; few sociological journals are complete without some reference to the matter; and within the last ten years. nearly every large American city has published the results of its "investigations." Historians trace the sordid subject back to early ages; theologians, moralists, political economists, are well acquainted with it. As far as I know, it has never been suppressed by any "conspiracy of silence." Complete information on its current features has always been accessible to all who had any right to know anything about it, as well as to too many who were led on simply by hurtful curiosity. The subject is particularly in the open today, when it has been certified as a proper topic for discussion in grammar schools and at the dinner-table, as well as in university lecture-halls; and the backrooms of gin-mills in the slums. On this, as on other evils upon which the spot-light has been thrown by enterprising publishers, for the delectation of morbid curiosity, there has been talk and to spare. Talk is cheap as well as ineffective. Perhaps that explains why, on the list submitted by C. Connolly, there are no Catholics.

Beneath the Surface

CARDINAL NEWMAN explains the Church's ordinary program in his contrast between Savonarola, the fearless preacher of Florence, and the gentle Saint of Rome, St. Philip Neri. Who does not sympathize with the friar in his fierce denunciation of the evils of his day, and through the smoke that arises from the holocaust of a city's instruments of sin, hopefully look for the dawn of a new era of civic righteousness? Yet it was not Savonarola with his knotted scourge, but Philip Neri, preaching the doctrine of personal reform and sanctification through prayer and the Sacraments, who exemplified the more excellent way of regenerating a community. The Lord is not always in the whirlwind. Only in Dickens is evil overcome by some Nicholas Nickleby, youthful and valiant, who warms the cockles of our hearts by triumphantly hurling the tyrannical Squeers to the ground. But the schoolmaster resumed his nefarious operations when Nicholas walked out, and, in fact, never experienced a change of heart. The big stick and the bonfire rarely convert; except in the ring, the fist to the point of the jaw is a poor argument.

The truth seems to be, that while the rod must be laid mightily from time to time across the back of flaunting iniquity, it is the gentle nun who in her cloister lifts up white hands of prayer to Heaven, and souls like her, that speak of real victories in the warfare against iniquity. The Kingdom of God is established among men, not by societies for the promotion of this and the prevention of that, but, primarily, by the acceptance of the Gospel, given into the keeping of that perfect society, the Church. In so far as knowingly or unconsciously they are in conformity with the mind of the Church, but only under that supposition, do these associations serve a good purpose, and in this case they should, and generally do, receive the hearty cooperation of Catholics. Otherwise their efforts to check the social or any other moral evil are, at best, as futile as the attempt to cure a cancer by carefully dusting it with Mennen's violet talcum powder, and at their worst, like vitriol in an open wound.

The Real Factors

A CATHOLIC our critic may be, but not a Catholic in touch with Catholic tradition and Catholic practice. Social reform is not a matter of Billy Sundays, backed by committees and advertising space. It is a moral question, and the solution begins, not with the signing of a contract with a press-agent, but with the moral reconstruction of the individual. Men are not saved or condemned in masses; neither can they be kicked up the ladder that leads to godliness, or find salvation in a handshake at the end of the sawdust trail. If they cannot be induced to ascend of their own record, by a renewal of the interior life, brought about by personal cooperation with the grace of God, they will never rise. It is the Catholic Church alone that preaches a gospel of restraint in a day which glorifies liberty in all things; and, whatever the optimists may profess, in a being made up of body and soul, without self-denial there can be no such thing as personal purity. Through the teachings of the Gospel, she holds up positive ideals; in prayer and the Sacraments, she gives practical means of translating these ideals into life. Does C. Connolly know what a truly Catholic home is? Or has he ever made himself acquainted with a Catholic school? In these sanctuaries, second only in holiness to precincts hallowed by Christ's sacramental presence, are nurtured the forces that in the end will conquer evil and renew a broken world in Christ. Or has he never gone into any Catholic church of a Saturday afternoon where > the only sound was the occasional footfall of an unseen suppliant, and on the distant high altar, shimmering and white at the end of the long perspective of the empty aisle, there rested the power she believed more powerful than all on earth beside. She made her confession . . . and at its end she received not only the benediction that she traced to Heaven, but the shrewd advice that came direct from the big heart of a worldly-wise and beneficent man.

> "Thank you, Father," she added to the words of the ritual, as she rose to go, "I'll do me best to stick it out, but times be when it's powerful hard." The experience had encouraged her. . . .

And a similar experience has encouraged thousands of other girls to pass as Una, innocent and unafraid, through a world of cunning and iniquity. Yet when, and O, the pity of it! wickedness has worked its way, there are those sanctuaries in which the revivifying love of Christ for the lost sheep is given visible expression, the Houses of the Good Shepherd.

Catholic Apathy

AT this point, for the first time, I begin to feel myself in sympathy with C. Connolly. "We are apathetic," says the critic. Touching the parochial schools, it is hardly true to say that we are "apathetic"; but we have scant reason for self-congratulation as long as more than half of our children are in schools that either flout the name of Jesus Christ, or are ashamed, or afraid, or too indifferent, to acknowledge Him. Possibly the parents of these unhappy children are working by day and toiling by night to counteract the influence of this godless education; but I advance the proposition with some doubt. Few acts entail graver consequences than that so easily assumed by the pseudo-Catholic parent who deprives the child of the right to a Christian education; and these consequences will be felt in after years, first by the individual, then by the community. The greatest constructive force at work today among our young people, exercising an influence that will make them law-abiding citizens, because of their training in religion, is the parochial school. To weaken that influence is to deprive the State of a defense of incalculable value. Had C. Connolly raised a protesting voice in favor of our schools, and of such reconstructive factors as Christianity reduced to practice in the Houses of the Good Shepherd, I would gladly have sung second, and made the strain a duet.

Catholic Snobbery

CANON SHEEHAN says somewhere that in these homes the teachings of Jesus Christ are given their most perfect interpretation. They reconstruct, not by ignoring sin, but by teaching repentance, and by supplying a motive for a new life. Today in many cities their work is impeded by bigots who find the Cross a scandal, by "uplifters" who will uplift anything, if the process holds out a financial recompense, and by sciolists who prefer the 'cottage system" to Christianity. Among their other foes are Catholics who, seeking the favor of social and financial barons, patronize whatever uplift society will give a quid of advertising in return for the quo of a donation. Surely, there is something rotten in the inner state of Catholics, who pass by our own efficient works, to tail in with the procession that begins in the office of a trust company, and ends in a social cult.

The Catholic's neglect to call attention to the "conspiracy of silence," by beating a tom-tom at Forty-second and Broadway, is of little consequence. That corner is always crowded. His neglect of the parochial school, and of such reconstructive powers as Houses of the Good Shepherd, may become a matter of serious consequence, both to the Church and to the community.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Ministers and Mates Together

CONGREGATIONALISM is progressing very fast in England. The London Tablet offers the following interesting items taken from the Daily News:

> At King's Weigh House Church, Duke Street, Oxford Street, last evening, Mr. Claud Coltman, M.A., and Miss Constance Todd, B.D., were ordained as Congregational ministers. The ceremony was remarkable in that both a man and a woman were ordained at the same service, and additional interest was provided by the fact that they are to be married this morning.

Perfectly lovely! But what of St. Paul's "Suffer not a woman to teach"?

Eucharistic Peace Volunteers

THE Lamp has conceived the excellent idea of raising a Regiment of Eucharistic Volunteers, pledging themselves to receive Holy Communion frequently and to pray for peace. The daily communicants are called "volunteers" and the companies of weekly communicants, who find it impossible to receive Our Divine Lord each day, are known as "auxiliaries." In an editorial written in the earlier part of the year and suggesting daily Communion for peace, the Lamp wrote:

> How can the Catholics of this great nation more certainly and infallibly move to mercy and compassion God the Father Almighty than by crowding the tribunal of penance and flocking to Holy Communion daily in every individual case where that is possible, and weekly in those instances where daily reception is beyond their power.

This idea will not conflict with the novena for peace, and might well be taken up in our parishes and schools. The novena itself might be made a novena of daily Communions as well as of prayers wherever this is possible.

A Great Benefactress of the Church

THE death of Mrs. Thomas F. Ryan, noted for her extensive Catholic charities, took place October 17 at Suffern, N. Y. She had cherished a great devotion to the Blessed Sacrament, which found its practical expression in the erection of Catholic churches and chapels throughout a large section of the United States, from North Dakota to Texas and from New York to Virginia. She was likewise instrumental in establishing at Washington, D. C., the Nuns of the Perpetual Adoration. Educational institutions, hospitals and other works of charity were remembered in her benefactions. It is impossible to discover the number of buildings erected, bought or reconstructed by her, whether Catholic churches, chapels, hospitals or schools, and how many she supported or made self-supporting. Mr. Ryan, too, has been most generous in his donations. A gift of $1,000,000 is said to have built the Cathedral at Richmond, and a gift of $1,000,000, recently made by him, erected the Church of St. Jean Baptiste at New York. Among the notable benefactions of Mrs. Ryan are the school and hospital for the Sisters of Charity, Richmond; St. Thomas Church, Plymouth, Va.; St. Michael's Church, Danville, Va.; St. Agnes' Church, Fall Church, Va.; Ryan Hall, Georgetown University; Church of the Sacred Heart, Suffern, N. Y.; Hospital for the Sisters of Charity, New York City; fifteen chapels in Arizona, New Mexico and Oklahoma; altars and windows in a score or more of churches in New York City; rooms in many hospitals for special purposes, and more than one hundred other chapels, schools, hospitals and homes for children and the infirm. A chapel was likewise erected by her at the Jesuit novitiate of St. Andrew-on-Hudson. Here, therefore, was a wealthy Catholic who gave freely of her wealth, and generously devoted all her donations to entirely Catholic interests. She was a practical business woman, who did not build for display, but knew her purpose and skilfully adapted her work to the special need that had attracted her attention. She is said never to have given her name to public subscriptions, but desired that it should not be mentioned in connection with the deserving charities to which she contributed. Hence the impossibility of ascertaining the full extent of her donations. In one point, particularly, her example can be imitated by all Catholics, whether rich or poor, in that they bestow upon Catholic interests the alms they are enabled to give. The special honors conferred upon her by Rome were well deserved.

Bishop Beaven's Jubilee

ON October 18, the Rt. Rev. Thomas D. Beaven, D.D., Bishop of Springfield, observed the silver jubilee of his consecration. In a modest letter of greeting he sent to his clergy, religious and laity, he gives interesting statistics of the growth of the see since its erection in 1870. There were 43 priests in the diocese then, now there are more than 400. There were scarcely a dozen Sisters then, but there are now more than 1,200. Against some 45 parishes in 1870, they now number at least 200, and the Catholic population of the diocese has increased during those 47 years from 80,000 to more than 300,000. The special object of Bishop Beaven's zeal has been the equipment of his diocese with all kinds of charitable and educational institutions. He has established homes for the aged, and for orphans, excellent hospitals and sanatoriums have been erected, working girls have homes provided for them and there is also a House of the Good Shepherd in the diocese. These "institutions are completely unlimbered of burdens," the Bishop reports, "with only exceptions that suggest not even a passing disturbance." The Springfield diocese is also fully equipped with institutions for the Catholic education of its children and young people. There are 30,000 boys and girls in its parish schools, and Bishop Beaven's zeal for higher education is shown, to give but one instance, by his erection of Beaven Hall at Holy Cross College. It was his wish that there should be no dioscesan celebration of the jubilee. Only "offerings of prayer and devotional practices in thanksgiving" for all the spiritual and temporal blessings the diocese of Springfield has enjoyed during the past twenty-five years. AMERICA unites with Bishop Beaven's countless friends in wishing him and his diocese many more years of even greater blessings.

Is Esperanto a Failure?

CONSIDERABLE attention has of late been given to the Esperanto language. The recent death of Zamenhof, its inventor, naturally called forth many discussions, favorable and unfavorable, in the daily press. The Rochester Post Express believes that Esperanto, the first and most successful of artificial languages, has clearly demonstrated the fact that "No such made-to-order tongues have any important uses in the world." Jargons like Hindustani and Yiddish, it admits, serve a purpose, but deliberate attempts at language manufacture are a failure.

> Languages grow, and there is about as much difference between a natural tree and an imitation tree as there is between English and any of the invented tongues. All of them without exception, Esperanto, Ido which attempted to improve upon it, Volapuk, Bolak, Ro and the rest of them, are inherently, incurably crude and grotesque. The noblest passage in the literature of any people is a joke when rewritten in any one of these gibberish tongues. All the glorious past of words, their associations, suggestions, their beauty and romance are lost in these hodgepodge, dog-Latin languages. The Lord's Prayer, a Milton sonnet, a Burns song lose as much by reproduction into Esperanto as the forests would lose if all their boles and branches were made straight and their infinite diversity of leafage reduced to round, square and triangular forms.

On the other hand there is a letter by Joseph Silbernik, New York delegate of the Universal Esperanto Association, which appeared in the New York Sun and indicates without any doubt that Esperanto is at all events not a "dead issue." It tells of the Esperanto movement in France and suggests the consultation of a Parisian telephone directory.

> Nearly half a column of this mystic book is devoted to Esperanto groups, Esperanto classes, Esperanto clubs, Esperanto societies, Esperanto periodicals, Esperanto institutes, Esperanto Gospels and Esperanto Catholic prayer books. There are Esperanto lead pencils, Esperanto stationery, Esperanto watches, and last but by no means least Esperanto whisky, called viskio.

Esperanto, the writer continues, counts among its devoted promoters the Archbishop of Paris, who presided in person at two Catholic international Esperanto congresses, both held at the Catholic University of Paris and to both of which the Pope sent his blessing. The "awful Esperanto virus" has attacked one "immortal" and several Senators, while shortly before the outbreak of the war there were forty Esperantists in the Chamber of Deputies. Worse than that, "it attacked Rollet de'Isle, the chief engineer of the French navy, who—if you have tears, prepare to shed them now—has been afflicted by the Esperanto virus to such an extent as to become the secretary of the Scienca Asocio." He is likewise assistant editor of the Scienca Gazeto, the Esperanto organ, to which General Sebert, member of the French Academy of Science, is a regular contributor. Even the hardheaded mathematician, Professor Charles Bourlet, whose text-books are used in the French academies to the exclusion of all others, was not proof "against the bacillus of this silly cult."

> Of course after seeing the havoc played by Esperanto in the ranks of the matter-of-fact scientists, what chance had mere litterateurs? So publicists, novelists and playwrights just caved in at the first whiff, the worst victims having been poor Tristan Bernard, poor Abel Hermant and poor, poor Alexandre Hepp, who, before the war, assisted by a hundred or so of other victims used to be let loose once a month in the Sorbonne, and used to make the nights hideous with their Esperanto ravings.

So the Esperantist delegate blithely proceeds with his clever defense and shows how the virus crossed the Atlantic and attacked such men as Dr. D. O. S. Lowell, headmaster of the Roxbury Latin School; Henry W. Fisher, superintending engineer of the Standard Underground Cable Company; Dr. Frederick G. Cottrell, chief metallurgist, Bureau of Mines, and other "weaklings." He has proved his point, that Esperanto is not an abandoned cause, but has its banners and its lances in the field.

The War.—During the past week General Haig delivered two serious attacks against the German lines in Flanders. The first was along the Ypres-Staden railroad; the second along that line and along the Passchendaele Ridge as far south as Gheluvelt. On both sides he made substantial gains. On the Ypres-Staden line, the British efforts centered especially about Houthulst Wood, complete possession of which will eliminate the semicircular German line running from Dixmude to the wood and endangering the German position on this part of Belgium. The northern end of the arc rests on Dixmude, the Yser River and canals, the southern end on the Houthulst Forest. The forest is the main strength of the German line north of Passchendaele. The British are on the outskirts of the southern tip of the forest and have mastered a part of its eastern slopes. On the Ypres-Gheluvelt line they have reached as far north as Polderhoek Château. Futhermore the Allies have succeeded in occupying the Mercken Peninsula south of Dixmude, thus weakening the Germans' defensive.

Bulletin, Oct. 22, p.m.-Oct. 29, a.m.

On the line from Soissons to Laon, with Laon as their objective the French have also won considerable success. On October 23 attacking on a six-mile front they threw back the German forces north of the Aisne, about seven miles northeast of Soissons. They carried Malmaison Fort on the center of their offensive, and the villages of Alemant and Vaudesson on the left, seized the positions dominating Pargny-Filain and pushed on to Chavignon, the furthest point of their advance on the first day, about two and one-fifth miles. They subsequently extended their gains to Monkey Mountain, east of Vauxaillon village and the Forest of Pinon and Froidmont farm. The French claim to have taken more than 12,000 prisoners and about 150 guns.

The most tragic event of the week took place on the Italian front. By a terrific drive like the one on the Dunajec in 1915 which rolled back the Russians, German and Austrian troops broke through the left of the Italian army near Tolmino and Flitsch (Plezzo), and in the northern part of the Bainsizza plateau. They forced the crossings of the Isonzo at two weakly defended points, Santa Lucia and Santa Maria, carried the attack to the western bank of the river, captured Gorizia and Cividale and took 100,000 prisoners and 700 cannon. At this date the Italian second and third armies are in retreat and the Germans are preparing to attack Udine.

On the Russian front, the Germans in the beginning of the week landed troops on the Werder Peninsula at the northern end of the Gulf of Riga, thus making a way for an advance on Hapsal. Another attempt made by them north of Werder, east of Moon Sound, was not successful. According to reports from Petrograd, the Germans have left their advanced positions and have retired about fifteen miles in the Riga region, near the Pskoff highroad in the sector of the Little Jaegel River.

The American Headquarters in France have officially announced that in continuation of their training a contingent of American troops is already in the first-line trenches of a quiet sector on the French front, supported by some batteries of American artillery. The first shots have already been exchanged with the enemy.

At Rio Janeiro, October 26, by a vote of 149 to 1, the Chamber of Deputies declared that a state of war exists between Germany and Brazil. The vote was at once followed by the approval of the Senate and the official proclamation of the President. Brazil revoked her decree of neutrality last June. The trouble between the Republic and Germany reached a climax in April when the Brazilian steamship Parana was torpedoed by the Germans. The German Minister received his passports, and anti-German riots broke out in several cities. A large number of German vessels in Brazilian ports were seized. Recent dispatches from Buenos Ayres reported disclosures of German intrigue to bring about a conflict between Brazil, Argentina and Uruguay. These reports and the news of the torpedoing of the Brazilian steamship Macao in the Bay of Biscay greatly inflamed the public mind, and the final break between the two countries was only a question of time. The day after the official proclamation of the existence of a state of war between the Republic and Germany, Germans set on fire and sank the German gunboat Eber, a vessel of 984 tons, which had been interned in the port of Bahia. This was in anticipation of the seizure of the gunboat by the Brazilian authorities.

Brazil at War with Germany

Canada.—The coalition Union Ministry, recently formed under the leadership of Sir Robert Borden, is making preparation for the oncoming elections. The program of policies outlined includes vigorous prosecution of the war, immediate enforcement of the Military Service act, thorough cooperation in all matters pertaining to the war, civil service reform, abolition of patronage, extension of the franchise to women, adequate taxation of war-profits, increased income-taxes, a strong progressive policy of immigration and colonization, effective arrangements for demobilization and for the care and vocational training of returned soldiers, the development of transportation facilities, cooperative management of railways, encouragement of ship-building industries, reduction of public expenditures, avoidance of waste, prohibition of hoarding and of excessive profits, cooperation in industries, adequate consideration of the needs of labor, general development of all Canada's resources. This appears an impossible program, but the statesmen are apparently in earnest about it. To help in its realization a new portfolio of immigration and colonization is proposed, as well as a new permanent committee of the Cabinet for the prosecution of the war. The papers are divided in opinion about the program. The Ottawa Journal, the Vancouver Province, the Montreal Star and the Toronto News speak approvingly of it; the last-mentioned paper thinks it a worthy successor of Magna Charta, the Quebec act, the Constitutional act, the British North America act. Other papers condemn and even ridicule the policy. Le Soleil declares:

A New Policy

> The real spirit that animates the coalition Cabinet is quite devoid of real enthusiasm. Already the famous win-the-war is relegated to the background, and in that vote-trap it is the bid for the Canadian vote that takes the first place. Hence the list of questions of exclusive Canadian interest inserted in the manifesto.

The Toronto Telegram says:

> It is seldom, indeed, that a political manifesto is regarded as a contribution to humorous literature. It is because of this novelty that the Union platform of 1917 is destined to find a place in political history. The folk who know the component parts of the Cabinet from which said manifesto emanated absolutely refuse to take it seriously.

The Halifax Chronicle, viewing the platform from a political standpoint, writes:

> Cooperation with a Union Government does not require a Liberal to leave his party or a Conservative to leave his. In these circumstances, and for these purposes, this paper believes that the Liberal party of Nova Scotia should give its cooperation to the new Government. We believe further that the Liberal party of this province should accept the invitation of Sir Robert Borden to name a representative of that party to sit in the Cabinet of Ottawa, and by so doing further strengthen the claim of the new Government to be in name and fact a Union Government.

Important men like the Attorney General of Alberta "predicts a majority of forty for Laurier in the new House" and Le Canada is of opinion that

> The bartering taking place between a few Liberals who are not in the first ranks of the party in no way engages any one but themselves. Whatever may happen, Sir William Laurier rests the undisputed representative of Liberal ideals and the Liberal cause, he being the inveterate enemy of the grafters, the trusts, and being the one man able to restore harmony throughout the Dominion. In fact, this coalition of special interests, the one absolutely opposed to the other, is completely dominated by the Tory autocratic military and protectionist party. It will, in fact, be a strange union of forces. As for the Liberal party, it keeps its interests and principles intact as well as its organization.

The Unionists hope to carry the election by a lively campaign.

France.—The Painlevé Ministry has just weathered a severe crisis. Dissatisfaction openly expressed led the members to the decision that they ought to retire. The Premier tendered the resignations of his Cabinet to President Poincaré. The latter refused to accept them on the ground that tradition and usage did not justify him in doing so, because the Chamber of Deputies, after a debate on the policy of the Government, had passed a vote of confidence. The only course left to the Premier was to readjust his Cabinet, a step which his Ministers gave him a free hand to accomplish. At first, it is said, he intended drastic reorganization, and invited several Socialists to join the Cabinet. It appears that both René Viviani and Albert Thomas, among others, refused to enter it and that for this reason Premier Painlevé kept the Ministry practically as it was, making but one change.

Reorganization of Ministry

M. Alexandre Ribot resigned the Foreign Portfolio, and M. J. Louis Barthou, previously Minister of State and a member of the War Council, was recommended in his place. President Poincaré signed the decree, and the Ministry as thus reorganized, but without a new Minister of State having been appointed, received a vote of confidence which stood 288 to 137. In spite of this, the Ministry has not been received with enthusiasm, and it is doubtful if it can survive very long.

The main cause of the crisis was the disagreement between Premier Painlevé and the Socialists. La Victoire says that the blame for the trouble is to be traced to the presence in the Cabinet of Ribot, the ex-Premier and ex-Foreign Minister, who had gravely offended the Socialists by refusing them permission, while Premier, to attend the Stockholm conference, and had dismissed Albert Thomas, one of the leading Socialists of France, from the post of Minister of Munitions. M. Albert Thomas himself has declared that he was influenced in refusing to join the Cabinet, not by the fact that Ribot was a member of it, but by his disapprobation of the entire composition of the Cabinet its want of an effective plan of reorganization and the weakness of its war committee.

Le Temps ascribes his refusal to cooperate with Painlevé to the ambition of Thomas, who had set his heart on the Portfolio of the Minister of Foreign Affairs or the Minister of War, and preferred to wait for another Cabinet in which he would have a place of greater prominence. The Gazette de Lausanne, quoting Gompre-Morel, one of the leaders of the Majority Socialists, takes the same view as the writer in Le Temps. The Minority Socialists, he says, were absolutely opposed to cooperation with Painlevé, whereas the Majority Socialists were in favor of cooperation. When, however, Albert Thomas declared his stand, his party, the Majority Socialists, determined to support him and lined up with the Minority Socialists. The withdrawal of M. Ribot has placated the Socialists to a certain degree and somewhat restored friendly relations between them and the Government, but the agreement does not rest on a very secure foundation.

Ireland.—On October 23 Messrs. Dillon, Devlin and Redmond crossed swords with Lloyd George on the Irish question. At the outset of the discussion Mr. Redmond offered this motion which was defeated by a vote of 211 to 78:

Home Rule and Sinn Fein

This House deplores the policy which has been pursued by the Irish Executive Government and the Irish military authorities at a time when the highest interests of Ireland and the Empire demand the creation of an atmosphere favorable to a successful result of the deliberations of the Irish convention.

In the course of his remarks Mr. Redmond criticized the Chief Secretary for Ireland for such irritating acts as the prohibition of Swedish gymnastics, the arrest of boy scouts for drilling and the search of "every house and hall in Ireland where national volunteer arms could be found," this last despite the fact that "no attempt had been made to seize Sinn Fein or Ulster arms." The Chief Secretary defended his policy on the score that the Sinn Feiners were endeavoring to stir up revolt. These men, he claimed, had been told that "they had a considerable store of arms and would have more before the fateful day arrived." He quoted De Valera as saying:

We have arms and we shall use them when the time comes. We are ready and you will be more successful than you were the last time. If anybody offers us a helping hand from France, America, or Germany we shall take it.

Continuing he asserted there were people in Ireland who, at the very time that the success of the Convention seemed assured, were bent on making government impossible. All this necessitated vigilance and drastic action. Asquith, sometime Premier, pleaded for harmony, hoping that in a few months there would be presented a scheme of government for Ireland, satisfactory to a large majority of the Irish people. Lloyd George declared that incitement to rebellion would not be permitted, nor would organization for rebellion, nor, on the other hand, would England ever consent to Irish independence. In answer to a question from John Dillon the Premier said: "I have no hesitation in declaring that so far as the Government is concerned it will use all its power to press the House to put into legislative form the conclusions reached by the Convention." Meantime Sinn Fein, 700 strong, has met in Dublin and elected De Valera chairman. The Secretary reported the existence of 1,000 clubs with a membership of 125,000. The conference has already adopted a provisional constitution aimed at securing international recognition of Ireland as a republic and providing for the convocation of a constitutional assembly.

Italy.—After a precarious existence of sixteen months the Italian Ministry has resigned. Premier Boselli, it will be remembered, formed his Cabinet, in June, 1916, after the Austrian successes in the Trentino had precipitated the fall of the Salandra Government. Recent Teutonic successes along the Isonzo together with the great losses of many thousand soldiers, while not altogether responsible for the fall of the Boselli Ministry, brought to a climax the dissatisfaction which has long been felt in official quarters over the manner in which the economic situation was being handled and especially the administration of food. A vote of confidence was asked for, but the result was unfavorable to the Government, only ninety-six out of 410 deputies signifying their approval of the Premier's policy. In face of this overwhelming expression of lack of confidence, Boselli and his Cabinet handed their resignations to the King.

Boselli Ministry Resigns

Some of the reasons for the dissatisfaction which culminated in the Cabinet crisis, apart from the advanced age of M. Boselli, are as follows: Italy failed to assume control of foodstuffs until June, 1915; intensive culture of the soil was not recommended, nor was sufficient supervision exercised over the distribution and consumption of supplies. Added to this was the fact that the recent harvest was below normal. As a consequence Italy has been subjected to considerable suffering owing to lack of food. The people felt that the Ministry has not made sufficiently explicit and insistent representations to the Allies concerning Italy's needs, and in general that it had shown itself incompetent to deal with the situation.

Just before the vote was taken, Baron Sonnino, Minister of Foreign Affairs, made an important speech in which he emphasized the fact that Italy entered the war because the people wanted it and was prepared to make any sacrifices that were needed to bring it to a successful termination. He called attention to the fact that the Allies were in perfect accord and expressed his confidence that the Russian democracy, to which the Allied Governments had pledged their support, would eventually triumph. Greece, he said, was now ready to take her place with the nations fighting the Central Powers.

Sonnino Discusses Papal Note

Taking up the note of the Pope, he said that Italy was in sympathy with its general purpose, but found it too vague for practical utility; the Allies were ready to discuss any serious proposition tending toward peace, irrespective of the source from which it emanated, but the recent notes of the Central Powers made it clear that they were not prepared to bind themselves on any point whatsoever. The purpose of the Central Powers was to sow dissension among their enemies, and untimely peace propaganda would only further this design.

Disarmament, arbitration, abolition of compulsory service, and the freedom of the seas, advocated by the Pope, theoretically commended themselves, he declared, to every one, but the difficulty was to find a practical application of them, in view of Germany's continued disregard of the obligations of international law and the repeated violation of its solemn word. He drew a distinction between damages inevitable to war and "damages purposely inflicted against all the rules and conventions of international law and of the Hague Conference"; and concluded that it was impossible to speak of "reciprocal condonation of indemnities."

On the question of restoring conquered territory the Baron said that to "consider the case of Belgium violated and invaded on the same basis as a justified warlike enterprise would amount to the same as to proclaim solemnly the right of brute force against all the principles of international law."

Carranza and President Wilson

Mexico.—For some time past the Carranzistas have been rejoicing over the recognition of the First Chief by our Government. Under the title "Texto de la Carta del Presidente W. Wilson." El Universal recently published this document which, it asserts, is a reproduction of an autograph letter written by Mr. Wilson to Carranaza:

My Great and Good Friend:

I have received the letter of May 1 last, in which Your Excellency communicated to me your exaltation to the First Magistracy of that (sic) prosperous country. Cordially gratified by this event, I take the liberty of expressing to Your Excellency my best wishes for the happiness of that (sic) people, now confided to Your Excellency's rule. Making vows (sic) for your personal good fortune and subscribing myself Your Excellency's cordial friend,

W. WILSON.

Internal evidence seems to indicate that the author of this version of the letter has a chair in El Universal's office.

Despite General Obregon's statement to the contrary, conditions in Mexico are altogether bad. This is evidenced by a debate recently held in the Mexican Congress; portions of this debate will be reproduced in a future issue of AMERICA.

Internal Conditions

At the very time that Obregon was declaring that there was general satisfaction with the First Chief, this dispatch was sent out from Mexico City:

MEXICO CITY, Oct. 25.—Suspension of the thirteenth article of the new Mexican Constitution was considered today by the House of Representatives at the request of President Carranza, who informed the members that action was necessary to enable the Government to deal adequately with offenders against the public peace and constitutional order. What is purposed to be done corresponds broadly to a suspension of the habeas corpus in the United States.

It is explained that the Government intends to deal more rigorously with members of the Catholic clergy, especially in Guadalajara and Guanajuato, who are accused of inciting rebellion. The anti-Government press also will be regulated with a heavy hand, and plotting groups in the large cities will be prosecuted if the power asked by the President is granted him.

Those who know the tactics of the Mexican revolutionists will perceive that, amongst other things, a new pretext is sought for persecuting the clergy. Moreover, last week more than 200 prominent Mexicans were exiled by Carranza. They were sent into the United States by way of Laredo, an incident that seems to confirm the report that the railroad between Mexico City and Vera Cruz is under the control of counter-revolutionists. The subjoined abstracts from letters written in Mexico by Mexicans will give a fair estimate of the state of affairs:

(1) You will have meditated on all the information I gave you about the political situation and the condition of the Church in this unhappy land. There does not seem to be much hope here. The revolution having completely exploded, everybody is disposed to accept some transition system which would bring about peace and order and stimulate business so that all classes might work again. (2) The greatest disaster suffered by the troops which General Alvarado was leading against the Felicistas was the complete loss of his artillery, due to the nature of the ground and the mud. The loss of the artillery was responsible for the collapse of the expedition. (3) The Felicista General, C. Perez, is complete master of the rich territory of St. Andrés, Tuxtra. The planters and merchants willingly pay the taxes he imposes, for he is everywhere giving them protection, and under him business is thriving. The town of St. Andrés alone is in the power of Carranza. General Galan, at the head of a Felicista brigade, has his headquarters about two miles from Penuela Station, whence he practically controls all traffic on the Mexican railway between the City of Mexico and Vera Cruz. A few days ago he captured a train carrying a Carranzista paymaster, and 41,000 pesos. The Felicista generals, Cejudo and Corona, at the head of a strong column, are operating around Jalapa and are in practical control of the Interoceanic Railway, just as Galan holds the Mexican Railroad. Carranza has practically lost control of all communications with the first port of the Republic. General Caraveo, who was thought to be in the State of San Luis Potosí, is actually not far from Puebla and has united his forces to those of the ex-Zapatista commander, Ayaquica. The two commanders have defeated a Carranzista column under General Arenas. The latter was killed in the fight. The Carranzista troops that survived the battle went over with all their arms and equipment to Caraveo. (4) A few days ago proclamations from General Diaz were posted in the City of Mexico calling upon all the leaders of the former Federal army to rally around him in order to put an end to the Carranza régime. Only one of the newspapers of the capital was bold enough to refer to these proclamations, which had been posted in a mysterious manner. The police hastened to do away with them as speedily as possible. Before they were able to do so, they had been read by thousands.

This hardly bears out General Obregon's contention that peace and order have been restored.

CHARLES DAWSON

AS I look down the street from my study window, I see at the corner our parish church. It is a squat, factory-like building of pressed brick, of the combination type, ever more serviceable than attractive, with the auditorium on the first floor, classrooms on the second and a "hall" for gatherings in the basement. When I walk three very short blocks west and four somewhat longer squares north I come to the church of St. Giles, an architectural gem with a still more marvelously beautiful parochial school on the opposite corner. Again, by walking scarcely a mile from my home, I can reach three other churches, St. Maur's in a northeasterly direction, St. Bede's directly south and St. Brendan's almost due west.

By way of explanation permit me to state that I live in a suburb of a great mid-western city which is likewise an archdiocesan see. I am on the outskirts of a thickly-settled area and about a mile and a half from my home are truck farms that supply the tables of the city with greens. A few years ago our suburb was without a Catholic church, was reputed, in fact, to be contemptuous of Catholics. Now within its confines are three of the churches I have mentioned, while the remaining two and several others are just beyond the limits.

Our pastor has an assistant. So have the pastors of St. Giles and of St. Maur. St. Bede's and St. Brendan's have but one priest. Then there is a Catholic hospital nearby with a resident chaplain who has been known to answer sick calls. Thus in all there are nine priests who could quickly reach my bedside, were I suddenly stricken with serious illness. Were they to walk the entire distance none would be longer than twenty minutes on the way.

All this occurred to me as I sat this evening with a copy of our diocesan paper in my hand. Four articles, on as many pages, had attracted my attention. The first was in the nature of a news item, telling of the falling off in attendance at our theological schools. The number of seminarists, it seems, has been considerably reduced in this the first year of our participation in the war. The second article was an editorial emphasizing that the chronic shortage of priests in America will be grievously aggravated by this reduction in the ranks of the seminarists and by the enrolment of the many necessary military and naval chaplains. The third article was grouped with the foreign correspondence and told how 5,000 French priests, out of a total of 23,000, have fallen in the war. The figures were attributed to the Vicar General of Paris and have an authoritative ring. The last article is of the same order and asserts that there are, today, ninety-three vacant chaplaincies in the British expeditionary forces in France, while the English troops in Salonica and Mesopotamia are wholly without priests. There are men falling every day on "No Man's Land" who have but a dozen breaths to gasp and they spend these in an unanswered plea for a priest. There are men borne back to the trenches and the dressing stations, who scan the groups about them searching for a gun-metal cross pinned to a khaki shoulder strap. And those eyes soon close without having found the object of their last desire, the priest. Then there are the base hospitals back of the lines, where men die every hour, and there are the huge ships that carry their cargoes of the shattered soldiers across the Channel, always reaching port with fewer souls than were aboard at sailing time. Those souls went to judgment unshriven and unanointed, because there was no priest. This it is that made me reflect and count those nine of God's ordained within my beck or call.

I know, of course, that were our Archbishop to take a curate either from our parish or from the adjoining one, to send him to France to replace one of the fallen 5,000 there, or to minister to the British troops in Flanders, Salonica or Mesopotamia—why should some not go?—a delegation of parishioners would visit his Grace, complain of the hardship he was forcing upon them and insist that the absent priest be replaced by another.

At present we have at our church four Masses on Sunday, at intervals of an hour and a half, between six-thirty and eleven o'clock. I frequently attend the first Mass. Even in summer, when the hour is the most charming of the day, the attendance is scarcely one-eighth of the auditorium's seating capacity. The second Mass is said for a somewhat larger congregation. At the nine o'clock Mass there is a throng. But at the last Mass, which is followed by Benediction, you will again have a wide choice of seats.

The Confessions of the parish are heard almost entirely on Saturday evening. Except during Easter time, there will rarely be more penitents than can be heard by one confessor in the course of three or four hours. To be liberal, set six hours as the combined total time that the priests must spend each week in the confessional. Surely that is no hardship, unless perhaps the six hours happen to fall on Saturday. Then there are the sick calls, but I have never heard the curate, who answers practically all, complain of their number.

I am not stupid enough to imagine that this constitutes the sum-total of the work of our two priests. My little boy tells me that the curate came into school today and gave catechetical instructions in preparation for Confirmation. My wife returned from the afternoon meeting of the Married Ladies' Sodality and reported that the pastor was present and expressed his gratification over the gift of the new altar-cloths made by the society. I have a daughter who is tonight attending a social given by the St. Cecilia's Young Ladies' Band, and I am certain that she will report that the group was chaperoned by one of the priests and some elderly laymen. Even so, I always meet either my pastor or his assistant when I attend the Holy Name Society meetings.

Former classmates of my oldest son have been ordained, some this last June. One is stationed at St. Giles, so he comes over occasionally in the evening for a smoke and chat. By the way, he is the first curate at that church. I attended High Mass there a year ago, when the pastor was still unassisted and when there were but two Masses on Sunday. I doubt whether there were 300 people in the church though its seating capacity is 800. This young curate had a complaint to make last evening. It was, I admit, a most unpleasant October day, a chill wind was driving and there was a disagreeable drizzle. He said that he had gone out to the cemetery in the morning with a funeral. The deceased was a boy of twelve, whom the curate had visited twice weekly during a lingering illness and to whom he had at last administered the Viaticum and Extreme Unction. There was a Solemn High Mass at the church and then the priest, as I have already said, went to the cemetery to offer a prayer as the body was lowered into the grave. The curate had spent the remainder of the day in taking the parish census.

Somehow all these thoughts force themselves upon me tonight when I know that many of those who fell in Haig's advance had gone into battle without even the consolation of having received Absolution. They were not, of course, Americans, but they were Catholics and English-speaking Catholics at that.

I do not intend to blame. If I have uttered a word of censure it was when I made mention of the delegation of parishioners that would go to his Grace with a protest, were our curate sent abroad. Still, I know that if, as a consequence of the curate's absence, we had but two Masses on Sunday, one at seven and the other at nine, the first would be very poorly attended, while from the second people would actually be turned away. I know, too, that if the pastor were alone to hear Confessions and would announce that to avoid a press he would be in the confessional on Friday as well as Saturday, on the first evening scarcely a dozen pious old grandmothers would come, while on the second evening there would be grumblers at the delay and some would sooner turn away with a bushel of sins on their souls than wait an hour for an opportunity to confess. I suspect that, with the curate gone, our pastor would be quite busy and that one of the school Sisters would have to give the Confirmation instruction. Possibly, too, there would not be a priest at every sodality meeting. I suppose that were the pastor to plead that he be excused from going to the cemetery with a funeral, because of other more pressing obligations, the bereaved would feel grieved and perhaps show how deeply the slight affected them by reducing, if not omitting entirely, their usual contribution to the monthly collection. I know all this well enough. I am certain that these would be the conditions consequent on the departure of our curate for France and on the failure of the Archbishop to appoint a successor. But somehow I dismiss all these things as trifles as I think of the unchaplained men in Flanders, in Salonica and in Mesopotamia, of the dying heroes of No Man's Land and of the dressing stations, of the base hospitals and the Red Cross ships.

There hangs before me a photograph of my grandfather. He had a broad sweep of high forehead and a wide, firm jaw. The picture is sadly faded, yet the eyes have a piercing sternness. He seems impatient of the few moments he must idle while the camera man finds the focus. He was a convert to the Faith. I wonder how that came about in an almost priestless land? I do know that, after his conversion, if a missionary offered up the Holy Sacrifice within seventy miles of his dwelling, he was numbered in the congregation. I ask myself now, is he as proud of his son's son, as I am of him and his son? He would not have objected, if one or two or three or four of twelve nearby priests went "off to the wars."

Incidentally, there was another item, bearing on the point, in that issue of the diocesan weekly. The announcement was made of the appointment of the young priests recently ordained for our diocese. One went to St. Benedict's church to replace Father Mars, long curate there. Father Mars has lately been appointed to a special work, editing a paper published for the benefit of an orphans' home. A layman held this position with credit for a number of years. I met him the other day. He said he considered the appointment of Father Mars quite fortunate for the little monthly because, being a priest, the new editor had been able to secure the interest and cooperation of some local pastors in the work. The ex-editor held no hard feelings. He had made far better connections, at least financially, and his sole word of complaint was that now he was working only for the almighty dollar. This matter, too, is forced on my mind with the thought of half-empty seminaries, of 5,000 priests dead in the trenches and of soldiers dying in Flanders, in Salonica and in Mesopotamia, with an unanswered plea on their lips that the words of Absolution be the last to sound in their ears. Will the small and unimportant paper keep a priest from the front, where he is so much needed?

One is likely, these days, to grow foolishly sentimental over soldiers and their woes. Witness the women who compelled the ministers to tolerate knitting during Sunday service. Perhaps I have been like these women. But with so many near relatives who will shortly join Pershing, I must plead your tolerance and beg for priests for our fighting men.

A last thought occurs to me. I have no head for figures. I cannot remember the population of Jerusalem in Christ's day. I wonder whether that city was more populous than the four square miles or so that I might map out around my home, and in which there are six parishes with a total of at least twelve priests. Christ instructed but twelve Apostles and these were to work not the conversion of Jerusalem alone, but of the entire world. When the Apostles threw their cloaks about their shoulders and took their staves in hand for missionary journeys to far countries, did their converts of Pentecost come in protest to Peter?

Religion served on a silver platter by a dozen priests is our demand today, and "over there" are thousands of soldiers who will die unshriven and unanointed. Who will be to blame? This is a question worth earnest, prayerful consideration.

Marriage and a Novel

J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

MR. HUGHES, in his novel, "We Can't Have Everything," having completed his entirely erroneous historical discussion of marriage, essays to show, through the medium of his lawyer, that divorce is permissible on purely Scriptural grounds. He says:

> According to St. Matthew, Christ allowed divorce on the ground of adultery. According to Mark and Luke he made no such allowance. New York State follows St. Matthew. The Catholic Church follows Luke and John. Old Martin Luther said that marriage was none of the Church's business. And that is what I think.

There is no need of discussing the futility of the statement that New York State follows St. Matthew. It does nothing of the kind and makes no pretense to do so. Whatever may have been the reasons which led jurists and legislators to legalize divorce in New York State on the ground of adultery, they were not guided by St. Matthew nor did they base their action on his teaching.

Why the name of St. John is brought into the controversy is hard to see, for he is not usually quoted on the subject of matrimony, nor is there any text of his which throws light on the doctrine of divorce. It would be a distinct contribution to the subject if Mr. Hughes would indicate the passage in St. John on which the Church relies, for it has hitherto escaped the attention of the controversialists on both sides. The truth of the matter is, that St. John has not left in writing anything which settles the question one way or the other.

What "Old Martin Luther" thought on any subject is not of interest to Catholics. Luther himself was not very clear as to what he did think on marriage. A variety of reasons, some of which are rather obvious, led him in the end to say equivalently what Mr. Hughes credits him with thinking; but he did not make his pronouncement secularizing marriage, until after he had written, and this subsequently to his break with Rome, that "Marriage is a Sacrament, an external sign of the most high, holy, noble thing that ever was or ever will be, the union of the Divine and human nature in Christ." It is to be noted in passing that the sign is like the thing signified, and that therefore the union of man and woman in marriage should be like the union of Christ's Divinity and humanity, that is, inseparable. Later, stress of deplorable circumstances caused Luther to say: "It is not forbidden that a man should have more than one wife. I could not forbid it today." (Erlangen Ed., Vol. XXXIII, p. 324). For the sake of public decency Mr. Hughes should popularize the Reformer's former opinion; he will hardly agree with the latter. In all events he should be cautious about following Luther's theology. Even Protestants make large reservations in doing so.

Mr. Hughes is very dogmatic in his statement about the teaching of the synoptics. As it happens, he is correct in saying that according to St. Mark and St. Luke, Christ made no allowance for divorce on the ground of adultery. He might have added St. Paul's name to theirs, for the Apostle is no less silent than they. But he is in error in stating that "According to St. Matthew, Christ allowed divorce on the ground of adultery." Divorce in the sense intended by the novelist was not permitted by St. Matthew for any reason whatever. St. Matthew deals with the subject in two passages, chapter v:31 sq. and chapter xix:3 sq.; and in each passage Christ is recorded as forbidding divorce, the very opposite to what Mr. Hughes says St. Matthew represents Him as teaching.

The passages from St. Matthew are as follows:

> And it has been said: Whosoever shall put away his wife, let him give her a bill of divorce But I say to you that whosoever shall put away his wife, excepting for the case of fornication, maketh her to commit adultery: and he that shall marry her that is put away, committeth adultery. (V: 31, 32.)
> Moses by reason of the hardness of your heart permitted you to put away your wives: but from the beginning it was not so. And I say to you, that whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery; and he that shall marry her that is put away, committeth adultery. (XIX: 7, 8.)

If these passages were obscure, which they are not, they should be interpreted according to the recognized principle of exegesis by parallel passages which are clear. Now St. Mark, St. Luke and St. Paul writing on the same subject do not admit divorce for any reason whatsoever. St. Mark says:

> And he said to them: Whosoever shall put away his wife and marry another, committeth adultery against her. And if the wife shall put away her husband and be married to another, she committeth adultery. (X: 12.)

St. Luke says:

> Every one that putteth away his wife, and marrieth another, committeth adultery: and he that marrieth her that is put away from her husband, committeth adultery. (XVI: 18.)

St. Paul says:

> For the woman that hath a husband, whilst her husband liveth is bound to the law. But if her husband be dead, she is loosed from the law. Therefore, whilst her husband liveth, she shall be called an adulteress, if she be with another man; but if her husband be dead, she is delivered from the law of her husband; so that she is not an adulteress, if she be with another man. (Rom. VII: 2, 3.)

Here we find absolute unanimity on the subject, an unrestricted prohibition of divorce. St. Matthew is recording the same doctrine as they. There can be no opposition between them, his meaning cannot contradict theirs. Therefore according to the laws of exegesis the words of St. Matthew, were they doubtful, should be understood in the sense made clear by the other inspired writers, if indeed the words are susceptible of such a sense. That they are susceptible of such a meaning is clear from a reading of them.

Moreover that sense is their natural, obvious sense. The only reason for questioning whether or not that is their natural sense is the presence of the exceptive phrase in chapter five, and the exceptive clause in chapter nineteen. To what does the exception concerning fornication refer? In both cases the exception gives a man the right to put away his wife, should she be guilty of violation of her marriage vows, but in neither case is there any permission given for the divorce for which Mr. Hughes argues.

That the bond of matrimony still persists in spite of the separation appears from the context in both passages. Christ says that if the man who has put away his wife marries again, or if the woman who has been put away marries again, or if any other man marries the woman who has been put away; they all alike commit adultery. He could not say this except on the supposition that the relation of husband and wife remains. The meaning, therefore, of Christ's words, as recorded by St. Matthew, is as follows: A man may separate from his wife if she is unfaithful. If he separates from her for any other reason, he exposes her to temptation and is partially responsible for sins she may commit. If he separates from her on account of her unfaithfulness, the responsibility rests wholly with her. He may not, however, marry again, nor can the woman who has been put away marry again. If either of them attempts to do so, they will be guilty of adultery.

A difficulty has been raised concerning the passage in chapter nineteen, some claiming that the exceptive clause refers both to the words which immediately precede it and to the words "and marry another" which follow it. But the laws of logic forbid such a supposition. An example will make this clear. In the sentence: "He who eats meat on Friday, without a dispensation, and becomes intoxicated, commits sin," there is an exceptive clause similar to the one in St. Matthew; but obviously it can refer only to what precedes it. The same is true of the clause, "except it be for fornication."

Another reason for holding that St. Matthew does not mean to say that Christ allowed divorce is the fact that His disciples found His doctrine extremely hard. "The disciples say unto Him, if the case of a man with his wife be so, it is not expedient to marry." (XIV: 10.) Evidently Christ was promulgating a new doctrine; but the doctrine which Mr. Hughes says St. Matthew attributes to Christ was not a new doctrine, for it was the current teaching of the school of Schammai in Jerusalem at the very time Christ was preaching.

Besides the Pharisees used the doctrine of Christ in order to "tempt him," to set him in opposition to the law. But the doctrine according to which divorce was permissible on the ground of adultery was not in opposition to the law. Christ has explicitly said in the Sermon on the Mount that the doctrine of the Jews on the question of putting away wives must be different from that of the Pharisees; and the context in chapter nineteen shows that Christ was doing away with concessions and restoring the ancient custom, which he formulated in the law: "What God has joined together, let no man put asunder."

Sensible men do not write on subjects of which they have no knowledge. This is a counsel of ordinary prudence, which is absolutely imperative where the matter treated is one of proverbial difficulty. Popular novelists, it would appear, have not learned this lesson. Without special training in exegesis, which is an admittedly difficult subject and requires very special training, they essay to determine the meaning of certain texts of Sacred Scripture, the most difficult of all subjects of exegesis; and not content to hazard an amateur's judgment on matters which are properly restricted to specialists, they propound an opinion which runs counter to the views of men who have given their lives to the study. They do this without so much as hinting that there are literally thousands of pages, written at various times, in many centuries, in many languages and in many lands, with exhaustive commentaries, which demonstrate the very contrary of what they assert.

The Liberty Loan and the Army

GERALD C. TREACY, U. S. A.

WITH the second Liberty Loan a matter of history, it may prove interesting to recount how the Army rallied to the call of the Government and supported the war with its money as it is supporting it with its blood. As soon as the $5,000,000,000 drive began, the commanding generals of the different departments were notified to start the Liberty Loan campaign among the soldiers. The department commanders notified the different camps and posts within their jurisdiction, and each regiment got to work. The method followed at the Syracuse mobilization camp was typical of the way in which our fighting forces were lined up for a financial campaign.

Three days were set aside for Liberty Loan meetings, October 11, 18 and 24. On October 10 Col. Wm. S. Bennett called the officers of the 39th Infantry and informed them of the Government's plan to interest the soldiers in the second loan. After this meeting the Colonel, the Adjutant, and the Chaplain met to confer on the details of the regimental campaign. It was decided that the Chaplain should direct the efforts of all the company commanders who were nearest to the men. We began by putting up a tent, the Liberty Loan headquarters of the 39th Infantry, and from this tent we sent out Liberty Loan literature, and information was furnished there to officers and men. There were three enlisted men assigned to the Chaplain as clerks, all of them high-school graduates. They kept record of all company returns, and each day posted the regimental returns on all company bulletin boards. At the end of each day the Chaplain made his report to the Adjutant, who in turn reported to camp headquarters. At the end of each week camp headquarters telegraphed the camp totals to the officers' exchange at Governors Island, headquarters of the Eastern Department.

At our first rally on October 11, the Liberty Loan Committee of Syracuse sent out to the camp Mr. Hudson, a Syracuse banker, who spoke to the regiment and explained the Liberty bond as an investment. The method of procedure at this rally was as follows: The regiment was assembled on the parade grounds, and after a very good concert by the band the Colonel addressed the troops. Then the Chaplain did likewise and introduced the speaker of the occasion. At the close of the meeting the band played popular airs, the troops singing the choruses. "Over There," George Cohan's popular marching song, has been the "hit" with these soldier-singers, and very few of the civilians present heard this rousing soldier-chorus without a touch of the spine-tremor.

After the rally, the real work of getting subscriptions had to be done through the Liberty Loan headquarters and the company commanders. Between drills the orderly rooms on the different company streets were busy places with men coming in to sign for the best investment they could make this side of heaven. We urged the purchase of them more as an investment than as a duty. Their khaki was proof sufficient that they were doing their duty. Now we asked them to help the Government by helping themselves. They were offered as security the total credit of the Government and the people of the United States, and as interest four per cent, payable May 15 and November 15. They could buy for cash, by instalment payment, November 15, December 15 and January 15, or by the army allotment plan. While the Government might call the bond for payment in ten years, it would be due in twenty-five years. But they could sell the bond at any time in the Army or out of the Army. When paid for, the bond was theirs, and the banks would lend them money on it, if they needed money. They would not have to worry about taking care of the bond. The Government would do that, whether the bond-buyer was overseas or at home. And the Government would deliver it to them or to any person they designated.

We were handling the bonds for the men by the Army allotment plan, and this is the way it was managed: The enlisted man may allot a portion of his pay each month to a relative, dependent, etc., and he does it by signifying the amount of money he wishes to go to the person designated. His allotment blank goes to Washington, while the money is sent by the Government to the person he has named, and just that amount of money is deducted from his month's pay. Under the allotment system the blanks were to be executed not later than October 25, in favor of the Federal Reserve Bank. For each fifty-dollar bond subscribed five dollars were assigned each month for nine months and four dollars and seventy-five cents for the tenth month, commencing October 1 of this year and expiring July 31 next year. On the back of the allotment blank the purchaser signed his name and declared whether he wished the bond to be delivered to him personally, to be sent to a person designated by him, or to be held for him in trust by the Government. The original allotment was mailed to the depot quartermaster in Washington and a duplicate filed in the company records. In the event of the purchaser's separation from the service the bond will be sold at its market value and his share of the proceeds turned over to him, or his legal representative in case the separation is due to death. On October 25 the amount of money subscribed for bonds in all the camps and posts in the Eastern Department was telegraphed to Governors Island and bonds were held to satisfy the amount of money designated by wire.

By privilege the allotment system was extended to officers and permanent civilian employees of the military establishment for the purchase of bonds for the Second Liberty Loan. I believe Secretary of War Baker put the Army viewpoint splendidly when he declared that he was delighted that arrangements had been made so that the fighting forces at home or abroad might have ample opportunity of purchasing Liberty Loan bonds: "It is a magnificent tribute to the fine spirit of our fighting forces when they not only choose to lend their minds and bodies to the support of their Government and its principles of democracy, but are actually helping to finance their own campaign and that of their allies by the purchasing of these bonds."

Intellectual Harakiri

DANIEL A. LORD, S.J.

SCEPTICISM, like flowing whiskers or Grecian fillets, has its periods of vogue. The phrase, "Really, I believe in nothing, don't you know," carries with it a dashing hardihood that has fascinated more or less intensely certain types of mind from the ages lost in Egyptian darkness to our own days of colleges and cabarets. Pyrrho and Arcesilaus made universal doubt the smart philosophy among the élite of Greece. Montaigne, whom our own O. Henry refers to as his bully old pal, spun this theory through the pages of his fascinating essays. In England, David Hume held positively that one can be positive about nothing, and a sceptical attitude toward all truth is not at all uncommon even in this present day.

Yet modern science, with its positive assurance that immutable laws underlie all things, has done much to make ridiculous the man who doubts about everything, who doubts that he doubts, and is not quite sure that he doubts that he doubts. Ibsen could hold that perhaps on the moon two and two make four; but if he went the inevitable step further and doubted if anything be true, he would be considered to violate what is at present philosophical good form. The universal sceptic is not uncommon, it is true, but he is rather a curious relic of a past age when men spun long arguments to prove that an arrow shot from a bow cannot by any possible chance move toward its target. Modern siege guns somehow do not fit in with theories like that.

Yet it is absolutely necessary to begin our essays in "Armchair Philosophy" by assuring ourselves that we are certain about a great many things. With this once established, we have a clear space with a fine bedrock foundation for our structure.

The most cursory glance is enough to convince us that we act all our lives on the supposition that we are certain about any number of things. The man who acted otherwise would be worse off than the man who stood still. We arise in the morning certain that the sun will give forth light, and we put our feet out of bed in the calm assurance that they will find a floor under the bed. We splash around in our bath assuming with certainty that the water will not suddenly burst into flames. We eat our breakfast in the certainty that eggs and bacon and cereal and rolls are a necessary condition of our bodily strength. The conductor returns us twenty cents from our quarter, and we are certain that twenty cents plus five cents make the fourth part of a dollar.

Downtown, we dodge a swiftly moving car because we are sure that a heavy object hurts when it hits. We enter our office-building certain that our office has not moved itself to a higher floor nor dropped down the elevator shaft. All day we labor at our desk in the certainty that the earth will revolve without our worry, that the letters we read have a real significance, that our answers to them will be intelligible to their recipient, that we are serving our loved ones with each tick of the clock, and that the night is coming when no man can work. When we return in the evening, we are certain that food is not poison, that armchairs are not to be used as tennis rackets, and that books are intended to be read and not smoked in a pipe. Life, even in its most commonplace aspects, is grounded on a certainty which the average man would never be stupid enough to question.

Not so my grave philosophical sceptic. He doubts everything. He is certain, or says he is, about nothing. Perhaps when he puts his feet out of bed, they may hang over the brink of the universe. The water may turn his bath into a miniature inferno; life may be sustained without food; twenty cents plus five cents may, by some trick of elastic currency, total a dollar. The oncoming trolley may pass over his form with the lightness of a zephyr. How is he to be sure? Poor chap, he lives in a continuous mental tremble for fear that the world may suddenly crumble beneath his feet; for who knows but that, like the children's moon, it is made of green cheese and honeycombed with mice?

Certainly if any theory ever deserved the title of intellectual harakiri, it is this theory of universal doubt. Like some Japanese suicide, it rips itself open with its own knife. One likes for the good name of human kind, to believe that it is after all a mere mental pose. Our philosophical sceptic fights against all the patent facts of life furiously and with all his subtle acumen. "I am certain of nothing," he summarizes. Argument with such a man is like foxtrotting with an eel, but you attempt it. "Are you quite sure of that?" you inquire ingratiatingly. "Absolutely," he answers. "There," you retort in triumph, "at least you are certain that your theory is correct, so you really do not doubt everything." He stammers. "That was a slip," he says. "I should rather say, I am not certain even of my theory." "Yet you are certain that you have a theory, and you are certain that you doubt it; you are sure that such a person as yourself exists to doubt the theory, and quite sure that other people do not hold that sort of nonsense. Anyway, how dare you fight for a theory which you are sure is only doubtful? As one of Father Benson's young Londoners would say, "Isn't it all dreadful tush?"

As a working hypothesis or a theory of life, universal doubt would make the Mock Turtle smile. Be sure you are right and then go ahead, would be revamped by the sceptic to read: Be sure you are right, and since you never can be sure of anything, do not dare to move. In the quiet of his room the universal sceptic is quite sure he is certain of nothing; but just dare him to leap from an aeroplane on the supposition that he might fall up and not down. Hand him a red parasol and invite him to walk in a pasture where grazes a bull blessed with sharp horns and a vicious disposition. Suggest that he try doing without food on the supposition that food may not be necessary for life. Pay him for fifty dollars' worth of goods with two ten-dollar bills, explaining that you are not sure but what they may make the desired amount. In an instant his fine theorizing evaporates like alcohol left in the sun. Life and his theory lie in different planetary systems.

Philosopher of the armchair, I am not waging warfare on tin soldiers. Men have existed and do exist who persuade themselves that they are certain of nothing. And their theory undermines the whole edifice of philosophical certainty.

The chief difficulty in the way of the universal sceptic's sanity is his unwillingness to accept the obvious. To his mind, philosophers are the only ones with any claims to knowledge. In the past, man has made some rather large mistakes, believing, for example, that the world is flat; in consequence, he doubts the value of all the truths grounded in human experience. On the contrary, the sane philosopher is not the one who rejects and derides the obvious; he examines it further, discovers the foundations on which it rests, and drives it to its ultimate conclusions. He does not claim to be an intellectual Balboa standing on the shores of a hitherto unknown sea. He knows that we are certain about many things, and he goes further in his efforts to prove the sanity of this conviction. The philosopher who in the pursuit of truth spurns the natural certainty of all men is simply diving into a cave open only at one end.

Universal doubt is, then, contradictory as a theory and as a practical basis for action about as useful as are handcuffs on a juggler. We are so certain of some facts that we build our lives upon them. The amusing part of it is that the most blatant of sceptics is ultimately forced to do precisely the same things as the rest of mankind.

Another point to be insisted on is that any philosophical theory that would lead us back to the point where we could be certain of nothing is on the face of it false and destructive. Men make mistakes, it is true, when without sufficient reflection they form snap judgments; they are often inclined to give a ready assent without investigating the reasons which should lie back of every affirmation. But for all that, our minds are blessed with a certainty that no intellectual sleight-of-hand can ever cause to disappear. Any theory, then, that endangers the certainty without which we cannot so much as raise a finger, pet a baby, or converse with a friend, must find its way to the philosophical scrap-heap. By its side, an ox team or a high-wheel bicycle is a tremendous vehicle of progress.

The Work of an American Catholic Artist

VICTORIA A. LARMOUR, M.A.

TO the average person perhaps the most striking difference between the art of our day and that of previous ages is the almost entire absence of sacred themes in our contemporary art. Most persons take this as a matter of course. The faith that produced Christian art is to the non-Catholic a thing of the past. The skill that produced it is to the mind of the Catholic similarly a thing of the past. The conception and execution of any important original work in religious art by an artist in our own day in our own country comes, therefore, as a surprise. A frieze in four panels, characterized as "An Allegory of Learning," recently completed by Adelaide Magner is, in view of these facts, a notable achievement.

The artist, a native of Minnesota, received her early education from the Sisters of St. Francis, and obtained her professional training from the best masters, first in the Minneapolis School of Fine Arts, and later in the New York art schools. Travel abroad, and study of the great works in the galleries and churches of the Netherlands, France and Italy, exerted a broadening influence on the work of the already earnest and promising artist. She exhibited professionally first at the National Academy of Design in New York and at the Fellowship of the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, Philadelphia. Since then, her work has appeared at art exhibitions in St. Paul, Minneapolis, and Portland, Oregon.

The frieze referred to was conceived as a decoration for the library of a Catholic institution for the higher education of women. Franciscan saints and scholars are emphasized. The four panels represent a series of figures, some historic, and others symbolic of steps in learning and achievements in learning. The panels are characterized by the artist as follows: First panel—First Steps or Stages of Christian Education. Second panel—The Fine Arts. Third panel—Heroic Women. Fourth panel—Great Saints and Scholars.

The first panel represents the first steps or stages of Christian education. A mother teaches her babe to pray, and a group of children of varying ages start on their way to school. The youngest of these is being led or sent forth, but innocently turns back to babyhood and play, an item indicated by the tiny flower in her hand and the butterflies which float above her head. An angel guards and directs this group. A boy, still indifferent, but going forth obediently, is listening to an older youth who has been roused to enthusiasm by the sight of the scholars next in order. A young man, in the dress of a medieval student, seeks learning at the hands of the friars, represented by Roger Bacon, a thirteenth-century English Franciscan friar, still acknowledged as the father of natural science, shown in his friar's gown, and with a worn face as of the scholarly ascetic. The last group on this panel is of three young women of the Italian universities, Elena Cornaro, a doctor of philosophy of the University of Padua in the seventeenth century; Maria di Novello, professor of mathematics at Bologna University in the thirteenth century; Laura Bassi, a doctor of philosophy in the University of Bologna in the seventeenth century.

The second panel contains figures symbolic of the fine arts. Literature is represented by two figures, Dante in the Florentine hood and cloak of the Bargello portrait, and a female figure in blue with a green veil, representing Poesy. Two figures represent Music, one in yellow with a violin, is Instrumental Music, a singing figure in lavender robe, Vocal Music. Dramatic Art is represented by a figure in rose, bearing the tragic and comic masks and being drawn forward by Mirth, peeping from under her cloak. Three figures represent the plastic arts, Painting, a woman in a gown of the renaissance, the great period of color; Sculpture, one of the Pisani who revived sculpture in the thirteenth century, shown looking at a small statue of the Madonna; lastly, Giotto, the first great master of the Florentine renaissance, pictured holding in his hands a sketch of the beautiful Campanile of Florence, which he designed.

The third panel portrays heroic women. St. Teresa, the great Carmelite nun of the sixteenth century, the Saint of the interior life, whose scholarly and saintly writings are reckoned among the masterpieces of literature, is represented as writing the manuscript of the "Castle of the Soul." St. Clare, the first Franciscan nun, who drew to her foundation, made under the direction of St. Francis of Assisi, great numbers of Italian noblewomen, is shown receiving a young woman, who kneels at the feet of the Saint, asking to devote youth, beauty, and wealth to the service of God. St. Catherine of Siena, called the Joan of Arc of the Papacy, is shown holding in her hands the Papal crown. Blessed Joan of Arc, an ideal of purity, loyalty, and whole-hearted devotion, in armor and bearing her battle standard, is the central figure of this panel. To her left is a group centering around Queen Isabella of Spain, who promised, if necessary, to pledge her jewels to furnish Columbus the means to pursue the voyages which resulted in the discovery of America. A page presents the casket to her. Columbus is being presented by Father Perez, the Franciscan Prior of La Rabida, who had from the first befriended Columbus, and procured for him the interest of the queen.

The fourth panel represents great saints and scholars. St. Thomas Aquinas, an ideal for all Christian schools, is shown in the habit of the Order of Preachers; a dove hovering close to his ear symbolizes the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. St. Francis of Assisi, an ideal of saintly charity and gentle tolerance, is displayed with the wolf of Gubbio. St. Bonaventure, representing the humility so befitting a saintly scholar, is pictured wiping the dishes, and waving aside, until he has finished his humble task, the biretta and insignia of the cardinalate which are being presented to him by two prelates. The last group centers around St. Elizabeth of Hungary. In the costume of a German princess of the thirteenth century, she gives bread to two poor children; her page holds back her cloak. St. Elizabeth has been described as the first settlement worker, and she, with St. Francis of Assisi, form the Catholic ideals for the new movement for social service.

To appreciate fully the significance and importance of such a work as Miss Magner's, one must view it in relation to what has been done with the religious theme in the plastic art, and the church architecture of this country. Due to the fact that sacred art has been so great in the past, it has been customary in the United States to copy, or at least to adapt, older models of painting, sculpture, and architecture. Considering the history of the Catholic Church in the United States it could hardly have been otherwise.

The history of the Church, for our purposes, may be reviewed in three stages concomitant with the natural periods of (1) exploration, (2) colonization and national development, and (3) further growth through immigration.

During the period of exploration, when the congregations consisted of nomadic Indians, and when the missionaries themselves were explorers, any attempt at stable architecture was, of course, impossible. Gradually, as the priests, usually monks or friars, established themselves in fixed abodes, fostered civilization among the natives, and encouraged the building of villages, there arose the need of churches and schools. The conception and execution of architectural plans naturally devolved upon the missionaries. These men brought with them memories and traditions of the glorious art of the Old World. To erect in the new country a house of prayer like those of his native land was then, as it is today, the fondest dream of the missioner. Difference in available materials necessitated modification, adaptation. In the mission houses of old California we find still standing examples of this virile readaptation of old art ideals to new conditions. The result in such cases was a fresh creation.

In the colonies founded and settled by non-Catholics, the Catholic population, up to the great period of nineteenth-century immigration, remained a small minority. Where Catholics were so few and scattered that one priest often had jurisdiction over a wide territory, when Mass was celebrated more frequently in a private home or a public hall than in a church, there could scarcely be any serious architectural production. In these States there came a great change with the tidal wave of immigration during the latter half of the nineteenth century. Especially in the cities, congregations that numbered a few score now numbered hundreds or even thousands. More churches and larger churches had to be built; and they had to be built quickly. It was an age when the engineer and the manufacturer usurped the realm of the architect and the artist, and foisted upon the American public bridges and buildings dripping with steel filigree and wooden garlands, which, factory owners triumphantly and boastfully proclaimed, could be produced at so many thousand an hour. He who, in those days, resisted the spell of cheap and quick production was a rare soul indeed. Hard-pressed bishops and priests followed generally one of two courses. They might let out a contract to a local builder, perhaps entirely lacking in artistic sense, who made futile attempts to cover up the barrenness of his architectural foundation with the tawdry multiplicity of manufactured ornamentation. Or, recognizing the inferiority of such architecture to that of Europe, the bishop or pastor might choose to copy an Old World model. Shipping and manufacturing facilities made it possible to reproduce in a few months a structure that had taken decades or generations to produce. Though every stick and stone often bore the stigma of machine work, the total effect was, in many cases, good. And, withal, the characteristic American Catholic church in Romanesque, Gothic or Renaissance style has had no mean influence upon its congregation; it has been usually the best, and often the only, art-appeal in the lives of its parishioners; it has familiarized American Catholics with some of the finest types of architecture the world has produced. Considering, on the one hand, the pressure of the demand for rapidly built and spacious churches, and, on the other, the unintelligent aims and ideals of the day, we cannot but be grateful to the men who chose, under those circumstances, to copy the art of Europe.

In the matter of painting, sculpture, and mural decoration, similar practices prevailed in our churches and schools. Isolated examples of original work may be found in the Paulist church, Fifty-ninth Street, in New York, where fine and distinguished work by the American artists, John La Farge, Stanford White, Bela L. Pratt, Frederick MacMonnies, and William Laurel Harris, help to create the ensemble of a beautiful and inspiring church interior. The general custom, however, has been to copy Old World models.

Thus, during these decades of her phenomenal growth in numbers and in strength, the Church in our country has produced almost no new art. Secular art, meanwhile, has developed gradually and steadily. The combined force of the Protestant attack upon images, the Puritan condemnation of all art, and the Catholic veneration of the past to the neglect of the present, have resulted in the divorce of art and religion.

Only by positive and definite encouragement of new and fresh art creation can the Church restore the old relation between religion and art. Condemnation and neglect of present art is, at best, only negative, and produces no positive results. Even the veneration of past art can accomplish little, as it still leaves the impression that religious art is of the past, and not of the present. This only reaffirms and strengthens the prevalent exclusion of religious and spiritual themes from art productions. On moral grounds, therefore, there is need that the Church should aim at fostering original Catholic productions in art.

From the point of view of art, this need is very urgent. At best, a reproduction is a mechanical achievement, never an art creation. At worst, by long abuse of once living sweetness, it may become mere triviality. In the words of Alice Meynell, "Nothing can look duller than the future of a second-hand and multiplying world." Similarly, referring to these conditions, Robert Henri writes that American institutions should "look forward rather than backward for their art. The past is a great experience. It should be estimated and used. But we have our own record to make, and our record will be a shame, if it is only an echo." No longer can the Church in our country plead poverty or distress. No longer does she need to build churches over night. In art, no less than in letters, men and women of talent and experience are to be found among her children. Is it not the duty of churches and schools to do all in their power to turn Catholic talent in the direction of Catholic art?

Soldiers and Scapulars

To the Editor of AMERICA:

We are indebted to some very respectable authorities for the statement that we are living in a materialistic age. I suppose that this means that many are prone to be more solicitous for the welfare of the body than for the needs of the soul; that they exhibit a generous zeal in their efforts to keep the outside of the platter clean, regardless as to whether the inside is always fit for inspection; and that the energy expended by some in striving after their material welfare is often to the partial or complete prejudice of the supernatural end of man's existence.

This materialism, if that is what we should call it, manifests itself as a genuine cult, in what is known as sanitation. It will be observed that individuals or peoples who neglect the cultivation of the supernatural are ardent advocates of having everything very sanitary. Not that there is any necessary conflict between cleanliness and godliness, as some might illogically deduce from the preceding sentence, but that human limitations are such that, in the struggle for human happiness and creature comforts, on the one hand, and the glory of God and the salvation of the soul, on the other, one is apt to be favored and the other to be slighted, according as the agent views the relative values of the abovecited terms of human conduct. The Gospel story of the futility of trying to serve God and mammon makes this fact very clear. And that such a result is natural is borne out by the theories of the schoolmen, regarding what they call conatus.

This struggle for ascendency between the spiritual and the material would present a hopeless condition were it not possible to combine them in such a way that both will serve the same high object, and the law of the spirit always supersede the law of the members. Christ did not condemn keeping the outside of the platter clean, except when it exceeded the bounds of propriety and was to the detriment of the final attainment of the "one thing necessary." And St. Paul, the maximus theologus, advocates what we commonly call practical ideas or the use of material things and conditions to promote spiritual ends, as is evident from his injunction to be "all things to all men, to bring all men to Christ."

Therefore, there are many instances of the prudent indulgence of the Church towards the weakened condition of human nature, of the tact with which she meets the halting progress of mankind and of the ingenuity with which she bridges over many natural obstacles. And eminently among these was the authorization by Pope Pius X of the scapular medal.

Soldiers are required to wear an identification tag, which consists of an aluminum disc on which are inscribed the name and organization of the wearer. The scapular medal is likewise of aluminum. Let the scapular medal form the center of the identification tag, with a sufficient margin for the necessary inscription. If there be an incongruity in combining the identification tag and the scapular medal, both might be worn, suspended from the neck by an aluminum chain.

I am averse to bringing in the coroner on the case of the scapular medal for soldiers until some further attempt is made to save its life. Let the matter be taken up by the Chaplains' Aid Association or by the War Committee of the Knights of Columbus and let them include "Scapular Medal Identification Tags" in the supplies which they are sending to Catholic chaplains.

Dr. O'Malley and Osteopathy

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I wish to bring to the attention of all osteopathic physicians and their patients who read your paper, the insulting attack of Austin O'Malley, M.D., on one of the foremost of the new scientific means of therapy. It was embodied in an article of his in your issue of October 13, entitled, "Euthanasia and the Quack." What he said about euthanasia was nothing new, nor particularly enlightening: it only expressed the views of any high-principled physician of any school. But listen to his attack on osteopathy, which he calls, "one of the vagaries of our lofty American civilization":

> These professions are taken up lucratively by ambitious barbers and bankrupt druggists, and legalized by legislatures. These doctors strut in high places; they have suites in office-buildings which a real physician could not pay for; they foregather in what they call medical congresses. They stroke and pummel the tremulous awnings on alcoholic and gouty pillars of Church and State commendably, after the manner of any rubber in a Turkish bath house. They manhandle women who have strange notions of decency, they maltreat defenseless children, they rob the ignorant, they are a disgrace to Christianity.

I can imagine a small-minded bigot in any profession condemning another, but he should at least have respect for his own. This is what Dr. O'Malley says about allopaths:

> In the Journal of the American Medical Association for June, 1913, was a list of post-mortem examinations reported from a leading eastern city where the diagnoses had been made by men with a reputation for fair work. In 100 cases of acute inflammation of the kidneys, 84 were false; in the same number of abscesses of the liver, 80 were false; in 100 cases of inflammation of the sac in which the heart lies, 80 were false. . . . In small towns the diagnoses are much worse. . . . The ordinary man goes on through a lifetime of gross errors and calls his homicides medical experience. . . . These ordinary men are not quacks; they are called our reputable physicians; but what they do not know in medicine is appalling.

It takes some courage in the face of this exposure, to criticize the work of earnest and educated men and women who are making their successes from the failures of such "reputable physicians" as Dr. O'Malley speaks of. Who is this man above men? I believe I find the answer where he says: "Some internists are practically always correct in their diagnoses; but these men are very rare, there are about three in Philadelphia." He doesn't mention the names of the other two.

A Faithful Guardian

MEN are naturally hero-worshipers. They too often, however, restrict their homage to the great and the powerful. The splendors of a throne dazzle the eyes of the multitude; the luster of martial achievements, the accomplishments of genius in the field of literature, science and art easily win its admiration. But the world pays scant homage to the countless heroes unclassified and unknown, whose epic has remained unsung. It neglects or despises the men who occupied but a small space on the stage of life but who, in simplicity and lowliness and unfaltering loyalty to duty, give the world one of its most needed lessons.

The Church of God is not like the world. In her eyes man's true worth must be gaged not by his wealth or his position, not even by his heroic achievements. His worth, his dignity and beauty are in his soul. Though the world may never have heard of him, once she is sure that a man has kept his soul stainless, she reveres and celebrates his memory and his name.

When just 300 years ago this very month an humble Jesuit lay brother, Alphonsus Rodriguez, died in the Jesuit college of Majorca, but few had heard his name. It is true that for forty-six years generations of students coming and going with their books under their arms had seen him in his porter's lodge. They had watched the gentle old man ceaselessly telling his beads, rapt in prayer before the Tabernacle or the image of Our Lady. They had seen with wonder and awe the light of another world beaming on the face of that faithful guardian of their college halls. Viceroys and magistrates had come to ask for his prayers and his advice. His brethren in religion knew of his extraordinary obedience, of his heroic penances, of his gift of prayer, of his angelic purity, of his never-failing patience. A saint, Peter Claver, had sat by the old man's side in the garden of the college under the shade of the palms and had been told by him in prophetic accents that beyond the western main souls were waiting for him as their apostle. In after years when toiling for the slaves in Carthagena, Claver never forgot the humble brother whose words had kindled in his soul the love of the suffering and the outcast. And the disciple was worthy of the master.

Yet the busy world heard little of Alphonsus Rodriguez. For six and forty years he opened and closed, and kept faithful ward over the college gates. He played no part in the world's life. He was lost to its activities. But he kept guard over his own soul. He had done so in the world as a merchant, with all the honor and integrity of a Spanish gentleman. As a father and a husband he had guarded its tenderest affection for his loved ones. He had purified and sanctified it with a Christian's resigned sorrow when God took them away. Called later to religion he unreservedly gave to God his service and devotion. He became in the Society of Jesus the embodiment of the rule, of devotion to small and commonplace duties. When she lifted him to the honors of the altar, the Church glorified humility and canonized fidelity to duty. Alphonsus Rodriguez is the Saint of the hidden life, of the household tasks, of the virtues of the home. Commonplace in the eyes of the world, in the eyes of the Church and of God his life is truly sublime. The world may forget the tercentenary of the Jesuit lay brother, but the Church of God, better inspired and with a nobler vision, asks her children to embody in their conduct the simple but heroic virtues of which he gave example.

For the Nation's Gaiety

THESE are dismal days portentous of great struggle and sorrow, and anything that promotes the gaiety of the nation should be welcomed, even by the venerable directors and members of the Bona Mors Society.

It was this patriotic idea, no doubt, that prompted the National Teachers Agency, Inc., to send the following circular, not only to sprightly Calvinists and dancing Methodists, but even to dour, gum-shoed Papists, who cannot distinguish Ash Wednesday from a New York New Year's Eve:

October 12, 1917.

VACANCIES TODAY.

Calvin smiled once in his life; he would have smiled twice had he seen this document, and under the same circumstances Luther would have thrown his beer-mug not his ink-pot at the devil. Of a truth the nation should offer the National Teachers Agency, Inc., a vote of thanks for its comedy, and pedagogues—ladies and gentlemen who talk psychology all their lives and three days after they die—should pray it God's blessing, for enriching their science. Come to think of it, so should athletes, too.

Now for the first time in the history of this hoary old world the pons asinorum will be crossed by the Old Two Seed in the Spirit Predestinarian method, Spanish will be lisped with a Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene accent, German will be spoken, as it should be, with a Schwenfelder guttural, Italian will drop from lips made unctuous by a Winebrennarian pose, the distance from the top of a tower to the ground will be found in Holy Roller fashion and history will be illustrated by Pillar of Fire means. As for athletics, there will be a Soft Shell Baptist punt and a Hard Shell Baptist kick, and when the scrimmage is fiercest, the Quaker shiver and the Shaker quiver will be most useful.

There is only one difficulty about the remarkable circular, it does not provide courses enough for the 200 or more sects of the country. Perhaps the National Teachers Agency, Inc., could increase its patronage by suggesting a course in bathing according to Free Colored Methodist standards, and a course in diving by a Six Principle Baptist. But whatever else the Agency does, may it never issue a call for 1,000 Protestants to defend dangerous positions at the front. If it should do so, hardy superintendents and principals of the kind mentioned will either lose their molars overnight or forthwith fall in love and wake up a justice of the peace at two in the morning. Exemption at all cost.

Reflections on Secretary Daniels' Speech

LAST week the Secretary of the Navy spoke to a clinical congress of surgeons of North America on moral conditions in the navy, and pious people over seventy-five years of age were shocked beyond repair by the "revelations." But in the first place there were no revelations, the Secretary recounted facts that most people already knew, and in the second place, deplorable as are the conditions in both arms of the service, they are scarcely worse than those that obtain in civil life. Our nation is sick, very sick indeed, from vice. And the saddest feature of the problem is that the only sure remedy, Christ, is rejected by a majority of our citizens.

Mr. Daniels approaches the difficulty with verbal strenuosity, but the heart of man is still untouched.

The remedy? he asks, There is but one, continence. It must be preached in the home, in the school, in the marts of trade, in the pulpit and military camps and among shipmates afloat. The eradication of the evil effects must be thorough, but the teacher who will be heard and heeded when the teachings of all others will fall on deaf ears is the word of authority from the medical profession.

That is all very well. But how get continence? Preach it, of course. Excellent. Cry the word in the home, in the school, in the marts of trade, in the camp, on the ships, from the pulpit, and men will probably be just as they were, not better surely, and maybe a bit worse. Unlike Mesopotamia continence is not a magic word. But Christ is, and better still His doctrine is the sovereign remedy against an animal life. Religion is the only safeguard of man's purity and woman's honor. He who thinks that the advice of medical men is more potent than the saving grace of God, does not know history or human nature or religion. Why not face the problem manfully and apply the remedy bravely? Why not? That would mean the systematic teaching of religion to our boys and girls, and "Rome must never conquer."

The Awakening

"HE has awakened from the dream of life," was the felicitous epitaph written on the tomb of one who had ended a turbulent career with a peaceful death. The shadows that had long been the object of his feverish quest had passed away, and for the first time he saw only realities. The truths that he had understood but dimly, as in a glass darkly, were now of crystal clearness. In retrospect life seemed to be a fitful dream from which the bright dawn of eternity had awakened the sleeper. A like change has now come over those who only a little while ago were our fellow-dreamers here. The instant they died their eyes were opened by a sudden vision of God. Judgment was as quick, and each disembodied soul at once received its deserts: the perfect, everlasting bliss, the unrepentant, endless woe; those whose sins had not been fully expiated were "confined to fast in fires" till all was atoned for.

It is these last who, particularly during November, are the special objects of the Church's concern. They themselves can do nothing to hasten their deliverance from the prison of the King. The duration of their banishment from heaven depends to a large extent on the mindful piety of their relatives and friends on earth. If Masses, prayers, alms-deeds and other good works are generously offered for the souls in purgatory by those on whose loving remembrance the holy dead have the strongest claims, the close of November will doubtless find myriads of these patient sufferers, their purgation ended, singing grateful alleluias in the courts of heaven.

Because charity is perfect there, when the Holy Souls at last are made God's courtiers, they will never forget those whose intercession hastened the coming of that joyful event. Without question they will be particularly eager to gain for their earthly benefactors the gift of true discernment. For these new-made saints behold with compassion their fellow-men in this world, mistaking like dreamers, shadows for realities, and carelessly letting golden opportunities of increasing their heavenly inheritance slip by. Souls that have been detained in purgatory have learned there to understand so clearly the high value every moment of their sojourn here possessed and they have regretted so keenly while in their prison-house all their failures, when they also were pilgrims, to shun sin and practise virtue, that they now plead unceasingly before God's throne for an abundance of enlightening grace for their relatives and friends still on earth. By their efforts perhaps we shall all stop our dreaming and awake forthwith, long before we die, to the tremendous importance of the everlasting realities.

Editors at Bay

EDITORS, like other professional men, good, bad and indifferent, fall from brotherly love now and then, and after a bout or two, one or other puts his head in the sand, and explains to his opponent that the origin of the difficulty is inadvertence or inaccuracy or the office cat or the printer's devil. All explanations are equally plausible and satisfying, and the opponent throws up the sponge and blushes at his stupidity in not seeing the point before manly blood had been spilled.

It so happened that some weeks ago the Editor of AMERICA deprecated a fanatical movement to keep tobacco from our soldiers in the following words:

> This whole incident would not be worthy of notice, did it not point to a growing tendency which is working itself out in various forms of fanaticism, like absolute prohibition of alcoholic beverages and tobacco. A persistent and unwise minority, forgetful of the rights of the majority and oblivious of the fact that men cannot be dragooned into virtue, clamor for executive orders and legislation that defeat the purpose in view. Unfortunately such men triumph in the end, only to take to cover when the inevitable reaction against unnecessary and unpopular laws sets in. Let the soldiers smoke cigars, if they can get them; cigarettes, if they like them; pipes, if nothing else is at hand. And let the poor workman drink a glass of beer at lunch. It will cheer his heart and probably save his wife from many a gruff rebuke.

Absolutely nothing was said or insinuated about the excellent governmental order forbidding alcoholic beverages in the camps. Despite this, however, the Methodist Northwestern Christian Advocate of Chicago, under date of September 19, 1917, wrote as follows:

> AMERICA is the name of the Roman Catholic weekly. It is supposed to reflect the mature judgment of that Church. What does AMERICA think about the battle for the elimination of intoxicating liquors? The answer must be found in the following editorial expression:
> > The movement to keep drink (italics inserted) and tobacco from the camp would not be worthy of notice had (sic) it not pointed to a growing tendency which is working itself out in various forms of fanaticism, like absolute prohibition of alcoholic beverages and tobacco. Let the soldiers smoke cigars, if they can get them; cigarettes, if they like them, and let the poor hard-working man drink a glass of beer at lunch. It will cheer his heart and probably save his wife from many a gruff rebuke.
> By the insertion of some words and the suppression of others the "editorial expression" was given a sinister significance, and AMERICA asked an explanation as follows:
> October 6, 1917.
> To the Editor of the Northwestern Christian Advocate:
> The Advocate for September 19 carries an article entitled "Roman Catholic Church Favors Prohibition?" in which occurs the following passage attributed to AMERICA:
> > The movement to keep drink and tobacco from the camp would not be worthy of notice, had it not pointed to a growing tendency which is working itself out in various forms of fanaticism, like absolute prohibition of alcoholic beverage and tobacco.
> I wrote the editorial expression which you pretend to quote verbatim, and I did not insert anything about the "movement to keep drink from the camp." Nor does the printer appear to be at fault, for the words do not occur in any of the hundred or more copies of AMERICA now in our office. An editor myself, I am naturally interested in the ethics and psychology of the sanctum, and I would be very grateful to you if you would let me know how you managed to attribute these words to me.
> I am, Sir, Very respectfully,

> My dear Sir: I have your letter in which you call attention to the apparent error in quoting an editorial from your publication in the Northwestern Christian Advocate of September 19. I have had the copy which I prepared brought to my desk, but am unable from the excerpt to judge of the correctness or incorrectness of my use of the expression, "The movement to keep drink and tobacco from the camps," as a preface to the other part of your editorial which I quote and which you, of course, are responsible for, since I see it is clipped from the body of the editorial. I have not the rest of the editorial at hand and therefore cannot know the context. If you would kindly send me the entire editorial I think I could prove my case. In the excerpt which I quote and which you admit was your own, you do say: "Let the soldiers smoke cigars if they can get them, cigarettes if they like them," etc. An editorial expression of this sort would, I think, be in entire harmony with the sentiment that begins the quotation, which you disclaim, "The movement to keep drink and tobacco from the camps would not be worthy of notice," etc. However, if you will kindly send me the entire editorial I should be glad to study it and, in the spirit of absolute fairness, make any amends that a full reading would demand.

Thanking you for calling my attention to the matter, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

E. ROBB ZARING.

To this AMERICA countered:

October 11, 1917.

To the Editor of the Northwestern Christian Advocate:

In accordance with your request I am forwarding to you the copy of AMERICA for which you asked. As you seem to be under some misapprehension about the point at issue, I shall take this occasion to restate my difficulty. The Advocate, pretending to quote my very words, attributes to me this expression, amongst others: "The movement to keep drink . . . from the camp would not be worthy of notice," etc. As I never wrote such words I am asking you why you set them down as a quotation. For the rest I beg to thank you for informing me that in your opinion "Let the soldiers smoke cigars if they can get them, cigarettes, if they like them," etc., is "in entire harmony" with "The movement to keep drink and tobacco from the camp would not be worthy of notice," etc. Should I undergo an intellectual or ethical evolution I may arrive at an appreciation of this harmony. Meantime this particular point may be dismissed as irrelevant to the problem at issue, which concerns a pretended literal quotation from an editorial, and only that. I am, Sir,

Very respectfully,

R. H. TIERNEY,
Editor.

Finally the Advocate delivered itself of this confession:

17 October, 1917.

Editor AMERICA:
Champion (sic) House,
39 West Eighty-sixth Street,
New York City.

My dear Sir: I am in receipt of the copy of AMERICA containing the entire editorial from which you state I made an imperfect quotation. I have gone carefully over both the editorial and my quotation and am willing to confess that your contention is correct and that the quotation made reference only to tobacco. I have begun a statement calling attention to the inaccuracy, which I am hoping to insert in as prominent a place as the original quotation. I remain,

Very truly,

E. ROBB ZARING.

That is very sweet, as the ladies say, but it is an explanation which does not explain. From the very beginning the inaccuracy was patent even to the blear-eyed; but the cause of the "inaccuracy," a happy word indeed, is still a mystery and will probably remain so till the Day of Judgment, but not thereafter. Meantime it is pertinent to remark that of late these inaccuracies are multiplying with singular rapidity, and, strange to say, they always score a good point against the Papist, an effect which, in the ordinary course of events, is the fruit of careful thought.

Normal Dogs and Abnormal Women

DOGS are always normal, principally because they are led by unerring instinct to a preordained end; some women are generally abnormal, for their crass emotions rise high and sweep them from one vulgar diversion to another. An illustration of the latter fact is found in this news item taken from the Baltimore Evening Sun under date of September 22:

Colorado Springs, Col., September 22.—Miss Dahlee Winks Chin Chin, daughter of Nowata Li Cho and Pekin Chusan, of Peking, China, is Mrs. Rufus of Bulmer today. The couple were married by ceremonies more elaborate and in surroundings more opulent than have graced any wedding of the élite in Colorado Springs in years.

Rufus of Bulmer is a blue-blooded Pekinese spaniel and his bride is a canine lady of equally high degree. The wedding was performed in the residence of Mrs. John Frederick Huckel and her sister, Miss Sybil Harvey, both of Kansas City.

The bride and groom were bedecked in gorgeous canine raiment, including such habiliments as diamond-studded collars, ropes of pearls, georgette crepe gowns with bodice low cut and other costly finery.

The ceremony, approved by the London Pekinese Spaniels' Club, was read by Mrs. Huckel and the bride and groom responded, as good dogs should, in barks well modulated and low. After the ceremony a wedding dinner of biscuits, bonbons and cream was served on silver platters and from rare Haviland china mugs.

Allowing for all exaggerations the central fact of this narration is a scandalous travesty on a ceremony held sacred by civilized nations. Moreover, it is past understanding how women whose chiefest protection lies in the holiness of matrimony can bring themselves to a degradation so absolutely inhuman. Is their nature perverted? Be that as it may, one thing is sure, the ultimate effect of dog-marriages and all such brutish ceremonies arranged and carried through by women, is disregard not for the dogs but for the women. The brutes go up a peg, the women move down many a peg. And man goes with them, but the latter always remains the stronger creature, the wolf maybe, or the lion made doubly ravening by woman's conduct. For the rest, kind Providence may yet send to the washtub or to the scullery those persons who, at a time when the poor are ill-clad and ill-fed, deck dogs in "costly finery" and serve them a wedding breakfast of biscuts, bonbons and cream, on silver platters and from rare Haviland china mugs. The mill of God grinds slow, but well, and before the end it separates the wheat from the chaff. In that day costly finery, silver platters and rare Haviland china mugs will avail nothing to protect from God's discerning wrath silly women who shame their sex by a travesty on holy matrimony.

Literature

A CATHOLIC SOLDIER-POET

AMONG the twenty-eight fine lyrics that make up Mr. Joyce Kilmer's latest volume, "Main Street and Other Poems" (Doran, $1.00), there is one called "The Proud Poet," which is an excellent commentary on an important step recently taken by the author of the book. For he answers thus a "Devil" who came to tempt and taunt him:

When you say of the making of ballads and songs that it is woman's work,
You forget all the fighting poets that have been in every land.
There was Byron who left all his lady-loves to fight against the Turk,
And David, the Singing King of the Jews, who was born with a sword in his hand.
It was yesterday that Rupert Brooke went out to the Wars and died,
And Sir Philip Sidney's lyric voice was as sweet as his arm was strong;
And Sir Walter Raleigh met the axe as a lover meets his bride,
Because he carried in his soul the courage of his song.

Because Mr. Kilmer also belongs to that high-hearted company of warrior-poets, when the call to arms sounded, what could he do but enlist? He was just above the draft age and consequently had no hope of being conscripted, so instead of going to an officers' training camp, he entered the ranks of the Seventh Regiment, New York Infantry, last summer, and then in the hope of reaching France and the firing-line all the earlier, he asked to be transferred to the 165th New York Infantry, formerly the renowned Sixty-ninth. As Mr. Kilmer's request was granted, no doubt his next book of poems will contain many a stirring lyric inspired by the life of the cantonments and the trenches. For as he sings in the "Apology," one of the best poems in the present volume:

For nothing keeps a poet
In his high singing mood
Like unappeasable hunger
For unattainable food . . .
Lord Byron and Shelley and Plunkett,
McDonagh and Hunt and Pearse
See now why their hatred of tyrants
Was so insistently fierce.
Is freedom only a Will-o'-the-wisp
To cheat a poet's eye?
Be it phantom or fact, it's a noble cause
In which to sing and to die!

Besides the more martial lyrics in the book, there are other poems which are fresh examples of that Wordsworthian gift Mr. Kilmer has of giving the human touch to the seemingly commonplace and of idealizing realities. "Delicatessen," "Twelve-Forty-Five" and "The Apartment House"; in his earlier volume entitled, "Trees and Other Poems," are striking instances of this rare faculty, and in the book under review "Main Street," which he finds "humaner than any other street," and "The Snowman in the Yard," appropriately dedicated to Thomas Augustine Daly, have those same charming characteristics. In proof let us quote a stanza from each:

God be thanked for the Milky Way that runs across the sky,
That's the path that my feet would tread whenever I have to die.
Some folks call it a Silver Sword, and some a Pearly Crown,
But the only thing I think it is, is Main Street, Heaventown.

But I have something no architect or gardener ever made,
A thing that is shaped by the busy touch of little mittened hands;
And the Judge would give up his lonely estate, where the level snow is laid
For the tiny house with the trampled yard, the yard where the snowman stands.

One of Mr. Kilmer's recent reviewers, though he discerningly recognizes our poet's skill at casting a glamour over the things of everyday life, bids "dour Protestant" readers pay little attention to Mr. Kilmer's carols, prayers, etc., for they are only the "gestures" that every Catholic poet is expected to make, and consequently, the reviewer would have us infer, are of trifling lyrical value. Among the poems thus lightly dismissed, however, would have to be classed, no doubt, "The Robe of Christ," "The Singing Girl" and "Gates and Doors," which most critics would consider the best in the book, and which on being reprinted in these columns gave great pleasure to the readers of AMERICA.

Even free verse in Mr. Kilmer's hands becomes something quite distinctive, as is evidenced by his poem called "A Blue Valentine," and dedicated to his wife, the last stanza of which runs as follows:

Monsignore,
I have never before troubled you with a request.
The saints whose ears I chiefly worry with my pleas are the most exquisite and maternal Brigid,
Gallant Saint Stephen, who puts fire in my blood,
And your brother bishop, my patron,
The generous and jovial Saint Nicholas of Bari.
But, of your courtesy, Monsignore,
Do me this favor:
When you this morning make your way
To the Ivory Throne that bursts into bloom with roses because of her who sits upon it.
When you come to pay your devoir to Our Lady,
I beg you, say to her:
"Madame, a poor poet, one of your singing servants yet on earth,
Has asked me to say that at this moment he is especially grateful to you
For wearing a blue gown."

In the sonnet to "Father Gerard Hopkins, S.J.," there are a perfection of form and crystallized beauty of phrase that are admirable mediums for Mr. Kilmer's fine tribute to that poet-priest; in "Easter Week" he melodiously describes what took place in Dublin a year ago last spring, and in "The White Ships and the Red," he gives us the best stanzas that were written on the Lusitania disaster. Indeed, in this third volume of poetry from Mr. Kilmer's pen he maintains the same high standard of artistry in execution and forcefulness in thought that characterized his former books. As has been the case with so many other converts, it was not till he entered the Church that his muse really found her wings. It only remains for Catholics to see that this gifted young poet's work is properly appreciated. For now that this singer of the sanctities of home and of the nobility of faith, this discerner of the beauties hidden in the commonplace has gallantly marched away to fight for his country, we can say of him in a fuller, truer sense than he sang it of another:

This man has home, and child and wife
And battle set for every day.
This man has God and love and life,
These stand: all else shall pass away.

Life and Letters of Maggie Benson. By Her Brother, ARTHUR CHRISTOPHER BENSON. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $2.50.

Here are 444 more pages about the Benson family. Most American readers will doubtless agree that the subject has been somewhat overworked, but as Mr. Arthur C. Benson, it seems, cannot well avoid turning out a new book every few months, the death of his sister, Margaret, in June, 1915, necessarily occasioned the writing of this life. It is safe to say that many another English woman of our time has deserved a biography no less than Miss Benson did, but the latter happened to have a prolific literary brother to undertake the work. The author says of his sister: "She was not in the least degree or at any time ordinary," yet a good number of Miss Benson's letters that he quotes so lavishly could not be called at all extraordinary, considering what her education and environment were. Though an invalid during a large part of her fifty years of life, Miss Benson appears to have been a person of strong will-power, of great intellectual activity, and of a very winning disposition. She had intended to write a book on the relation of philosophy to religion, and "The Venture of Rational Faith" is what came of it, and she busied herself with excavations and Egyptology and read the Greek Testament constantly.

A good letter she wrote to a cousin, whose faith was weakening, contains a forceful presentation of the advantages even modern unbelievers have derived from Christianity, and she had a delicate sense of humor which flashes out in many of the letters written to her brothers. "I think it's hard," she once complained, "that with three brothers there should be nary a new book ready for me this week," but finds an explanation of the phenomenon in the fact that "it must be self-denial week," as "Mr. A. C. Benson refrains from publishing a book." On the sudden death of her brother, Hugh, Miss Benson wrote that "He was the only person in those [last] years who gave one any sense of religion—and one felt the love of God was the essence of it, and the love of humanity came next." Miss Benson's own religious convictions seem to have been quite as vague as the average Anglican's of today. "She did not set much store by formal doctrine," her biographer attests, but she was very prayerful. With regard to Catholicism she seems to have borne with composure her brother Hugh's conversion, and owned in one of her letters to a "weakness for confessionals," but found "unsurmountable . . . the place of the Virgin in worship." Tennyson. How to Know Him. By RAYMOND MACDONALD ALDEN, Professor of English, Leland Stanford Jr. University. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Co. $1.50.

We are very far now in ideals, thought and tendencies from the Victorian age. Many waters have flowed under the bridge since "The Brook" was written. There is a wide gap between John Masefield and Alfred Tennyson. One result of Professor Alden's study of the most representative poet of the Victorian period will be to make us realize that we are living now under a literary economy quite different from that which prevailed when Ladies Clara Vere de Vere and Ladies of Shalott were popular. But his book gives us also a reliable study of Tennyson himself.

The volume begins with a short review of the poet's life, character and training. Then follow chapters on Tennyson's "Lyrical Poetry," his "Arthurian Epic," his "Interpretations of Character," his "Interpretations of Contemporary Thought," and finally an interesting study, "Tennyson, the Victorian and Ourselves." Professor Alden knows his Tennyson, and with his gift of clear, easy, methodical presentation succeeds in transferring his knowledge to the reader, as far as the limited scope of the book allows. In the final estimate of the poet, he is inclined to believe that his permanent place will be with poets like Milton, Pope, Keats, the artist-poets, rather than the great poetical thinkers, with the men who derive their inspiration from contemporary movements, rather than with those who strike out a new and original path for themselves. As a lyric poet, says Mr. Alden, the great Victorian, when at his best, need fear comparison with "no other poet whatsoever," a judgment which some perhaps would like to see qualified. He concludes with the statement that some of the things which at the present, owing to quite different currents of thought, obscure the worth of Tennyson's poetry are the very ones which will secure it a permanent place in the future. Judicious readers will, we think, accept in its main lines this verdict. J. C. R.

The Catholic Encyclopedia and Its Makers. New York: The Encyclopedia Press, Inc. $2.50.

Hilaire Belloc called "The Catholic Encyclopedia" one of the most powerful influences working in favor of truth, and the Dublin Review styled it the "greatest triumph of Christian science in the English tongue." Many thousands now have a set of this indispensable work of reference in daily use throughout the world, and, no doubt, they have a justifiable curiosity about its making and its makers. This information is supplied in the present volume, which details the literary and mechanical evolution of the enterprise that enlisted the joint labors of 1452 Catholic men and women, representing the clergy, the laity, the professions and the various lines of scientific and literary activity in forty-three different countries. Such an aggregation was never before accomplished, and biographical data and the portraits of most of these contributors are given. The compiler of the volume very truly remarks that "The list of contributors to each volume is in itself an object lesson; it shows in a concrete way the intellectual forces that the Church has developed and animated with her spirit." Not the least of the merits of "The Catholic Encyclopedia" is the fact that it has located and made available this legion of sturdy champions of the Faith.

A Harmony of the Synoptic Gospels, for Historical and Critical Study. By ERNEST DE WITT BURTON and EDGAR JOHNSON GOODSPEED. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.

Twenty-three years ago, Dr. Burton, cooperating with Dr. Stevens, published his "Harmony of the Four Gospels." He now throws out the Fourth Gospel; it is not rated as history by the critical school of Chicago University. How that university is evolving! What a nondescript agglomeration of free-lance, wild opinions are being foisted on the market of Biblical vagaries by Foster, Burton, Matthews, Soares, Goodspeed, and other up-to-date, à-tout-prix Baptist clergymen, who deform rather than inform the future Baptist ministers that study at Chicago University! One wonders why such men bother their heads about the Bible. Why does Dr. Burton, for instance, remain a Christian? He tells us, in the Biblical World for December, 1909. He remains a Christian, because Christianity is what you will! "Christianity is a religion of intellectual liberty. . . . It is able to appropriate to itself truth from whatever source it comes, and, what is even more difficult, leave behind its own out-lived elements." And what is truth? Whatsoever is "of spiritual power"! Whatsoever is worth the while now! In keeping with such pragmatist-ideas of truth and Christianity, the three synoptic Gospels are now carved up and served by Dr. Burton, according to the so-called historical and genetic findings of the two-source theory. Besides Mark, we have Q, the Logia, as a source to Matthew and Luke. But Burton and Goodspeed find that we also need a document, PL, which Matthew unfortunately did not lay hands on; and PM, which Luke never dreamed of; and several other documents, which Burton and Goodspeed would have used if either of them had been the author of Matthew or of Luke. All these vagaries are avoided, if one admit, as the sources of the synoptics, the various catecheses, written or oral or both, which Matthew, Peter and Paul likely enough used in their Christian communities. BOOKS AND AUTHORS

All our Catholic teachers, let us hope, are regular readers of the excellent North American Teacher, a new monthly published from September to June, inclusive, by the North American Teacher Publishing Co., Room 223, Old South Building, Boston, and ably conducted by Denis A. McCarthy, formerly an editor of the Sacred Heart Review, and by Mary C. Austin. The October number contains a number of papers which are full of practical counsels for teachers in the grade schools. "Preparatory Geography," "How to Find the Key Note," "Second Grade Arithmetic," "An Outline for Studying a Poem," and "Teaching I Have Observed," being the titles of some of the articles. The monthly's subscription price is $1.00 a year.

The dozen papers that make up "The Foes of Our Own Household" (Doran, $1.50), Colonel Roosevelt's latest book, appeared during the past year in the Metropolitan Magazine and vigorously express his well-known opinions on such subjects as preparedness, anti-Germanism, social justice, race suicide, etc. The two last chapters, "The Parasite Woman" and "Birth-Reform" contain a great deal of common-sense regarding the family with which all right-thinking people will agree. He well says, for instance:

> If Americans of the old stock . . . are afflicted by that bare fear of living which, whether for the sake of themselves or of their children, forbids them to have more than one or two children, disaster awaits the nation. . . . It is utterly futile to make believe that fussy activity for somebody else's babies atones for failure of personal parenthood.

Exempting large families from taxes, as Colonel Roosevelt suggests, would no doubt be a partial corrective of this evil, but the universal practice of vital Christianity would be the only effective remedy. In the appendix is the interesting correspondence about the author's volunteer division.

Though the well-known Emma McChesney appears in Edna Ferber's new novel, "Fanny Herself" (Stokes, $1.40), the central figure of the story is an enterprising Jewish girl who grows up in a western town and then becomes a power in a big Chicago store. The chapters describing Fanny's girlhood are the best, but there are good characterizations throughout the book, and shop-talk without end about "the trade." Father Fitzpatrick is clearly a non-Catholic's portrait of a priest.——J. C. Smith's "The Coming" (Appleton, $1.50), is an uninteresting story which is made positively objectionable by the irreverent way Our Lord is introduced. He is supposed to return in order to bring peace to the warring world through the medium of the stage.——"The Fortunes of Richard Mahony" (Holt, $1.50), by Henry Handel Richardson is a story of Australia during the pioneer days of the fifties. The leading character is a young physician who gives up a modest practice at home in order to make a fortune in the colonies, but failing to do so returns in disgust. The story is well told and would have been timely in England sixty years ago.——"Tomorrow Morning" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.55), by Edith Barnard Delano, is a slight but pleasantly told tale of a married couple whose happiness is menaced with disaster owing to the invasion of their home by a "clinging-vine" young woman. But through the wife's adroit behavior the situation is saved.

That silent deeds of heroism are daily done on the torn fields of the war is a fact that we well should credit, but it is just such books as William Yorke Stevenson's "At the Front in a Flivver" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.25) that give that belief a concrete realization and assurance. These acts of heroism done by the ambulance drivers gleam like stars in the darkness of horrors that the book has to tell, as here a trench caves in on a poor soldier and his life goes out, here a soldier, shot high into the air by his own exploding shell, is wounded before touching earth by a shot from an enemy gun, here a fallen aviator burns to death before the helpless onlookers. The author has only words of praise for the priests and says of them, among other things: "All the priests at the front are an exceptional class of men, and many carry the Croix de Guerre.——"The Coming Democracy" (Dutton, $2.00), by Hermann Fernau, a German, is a scathing arraignment of the German Government. His aim is to exonerate the German people from all blame for the present war by showing how they are misled and misinformed by their rulers. In assigning the causes at work in the past which made for the upbuilding of the present Hohenzollern despotism, the author speaks of the pure emanation from Protestanism as though it were a medieval institution. But for Machiavelli and Luther it never could have existed. In his condemnation of Bismarck and others, he overlooks the fact that Luther was the first great "Realpolitical" thinker Germany had (Cf. Grisar III, p. 514).

In a masterly pamphlet called, "No Small Stir" (The Society of SS. Peter and Paul, London, sixpence), "Diplomaticus," a High Church clergyman of England, tells his countrymen "What the Pope really said about the great war." He takes up in order and triumphantly refutes the following charges: (1) The Pope had no right to remain neutral in the present conflict; (2) It was a neutrality favorable to the Central Powers; (3) He has plotted against Italy; (4) He is intriguing to restore the Holy Roman Empire, and (5) His ideals are in harmony with the theories of Prussia. He concludes with a "Word to Anglo-Catholic Circles," saying:

> Painful circumstances may have severed them [High Anglicans] from the communion of the Holy See in England, but they do not for that forget that every blow at the Papacy today is a blow at the common faith. You do not tire of telling us, and rightly too, that the delinquencies of Protestantizing authorities threaten the Church in this country with a crisis. We earnestly warn you of a crisis of another kind. If communion with the Anglican Episcopate is to be made the badge of a dishonorable warfare against our Catholic brethren of the West and against the See we have most reason to revere in Christendom, the crash will come and will not be long delayed.

As the truths fearlessly spoken in "No Small Stir" regarding Pope Benedict's attitude in the present war are from a non-Catholic source, they should come home to all.

Edwin L. Sabin, the author of "Opening the West with Lewis and Clark" (Lippincott, $1.25), cleverly dovetails a historical fact, true in the main, with many imaginative and picturesque details of fiction. Dangers, trails, sicknesses, encounters with Indians, encounters that made the explorers' "scalps feel mighty loose" on their heads, elk, bear and buffalo hunting, and rapid-shooting add charm and variety to the narrative, and hurry the reader "to the smell of salt water," to "the sound of the surf," to the Pacific itself, where appeared "gray swells as far as the eye could see, rolling in to burst thunderously upon the white sand and the naked rocks." The book is wholesome reading for youths interested in early American history.——"The Newcomers" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.25), by Elia W. Peattie, a pleasant, clean story for older girls about the coming of a family of young people with their devoted mother into a "mean little town," disrupted by feuds and jealousy, and of what they achieved there. The book is full of lively dialogue and clean-cut characterization, and teaches a good lesson regarding the value of faith, hope and charity in the trials of life. ——"The Raccoon Lake Mystery" (Lippincott, $1.25), by Nevil Monroe Hopkins, has enough incipient plots in it for four novels. The reader is lost in its mazes. The character-drawing is also unsatisfactory, but the author's vivid portrayal of woodland life and scenes makes the book worth reading.

EDUCATION

II. Catechism in the Grades

AFTER all, the old method of making the child memorize question and answer from the catechism and of limiting explanation to what is essential, has distinct advantages. Not the least of these is that the child is storing up treasures of knowledge and wisdom for future years, despite the circumstance that he may not understand fully each day's lesson. Nor is it necessary that he should at first understand all. If the words are fastened deep in his memory, their meaning will gradually unfold itself, as his mind develops. The old questions and answers, indeed, that we learned "in concert," that we sang in a pleasing rhythm and to a melody of our own hearts' composing, will ring forever in our ears.

First: I am the Lord, thy God: Thou shalt not have strange gods before Me.

What matters it that the chanted words conjured up in our childish imaginations a picture of grotesque graven images, seated in rows on rows "before" the throne of the Almighty?

The Newer Vision

AS the years grew upon us, that mistaken vision faded imperceptibly, inevitably, and the "strange gods" were surely recognized in every creature that would lure us from our allegiance to the King. It was as if we had borne with us a mystic charm, the power of which we could not know until the special occasion of employing its arose. Who, moreover, that has been obliged by an adventurous grade teacher to pronounce "cov-et-ous-ness" over and over, can forget that second of the seven deadly sins? And covetousness was not hard to realize, when Sister had illustrated its heinousness by explaining that one must not wish to possess, instead of one's cheap little wooden pencil-holder, the more aristocratic lacquered receptacle flaunted by Maysie McCann. Besides if in childhood one has been schooled not to covet Maysie's Japanese pencil box, in later years one will not be strongly tempted to covet Maysie's motor-car, as one trudges wearily though bravely to the scene of daily toil. How strengthening it must be, too, at sixty, how consoling, when men all about us are wailing for the "world's wrong," to recall, with renewed confidence in the Creator, that question and answer learned when we were six, "Who made the world? God made the world." If God made the world, why worry? It is no "rat-pit." Our lots are in His hands. And how more than grateful we should be to the little five-cent catechism, when we can answer today's poignant "Cui bono? What's the use of living?" with, "God made us to know Him, to love Him, to serve Him in this life, and to be happy with Him forever in the next."

The Capable Instructor

SUCH words of wisdom, such sources of spiritual strength, are the invaluable possession of pupils trained under what is regarded in some quarters today as an antediluvian system. Its advantages extend also to the instructor. Few grade teachers are persons speaking with authority on the subject of religion; few are theologians; few are priests. In the case of those who are not priests, that is, in the case of the large majority, lack of the grace of ordination and of special training would seem to be the most forceful argument for the retention of the old method. For the old method, with its insistence upon memory work and its restricting of explanation to what is absolutely essential, removes from the instructor both the temptation and the risk of infringing upon ground which belongs alone to the interpreters of God's law. That priests may become the only teachers of Christian doctrine is a consummation devoutly to be dreamed of, however improbable of realization. Yet special training in philosophy and theology, and the grace of ordination are not necessary to the efficient grade catechist; they are no more necessary, indeed, than are a study of advanced English, and high creative gifts, to the teacher of grammar. Familiarity with the technique of the novel or of the short-story, poetic inspiration equal to that of the author of "The Hound of Heaven" would scarcely assist the teacher of grammar to impress upou her pupil's memories the definition and nature of the complex sentence; neither are Holy Orders and a knowledge of all the proofs for the existence of the Creator, and for the immortality of the soul, indispensable in the catechist's task of fixing deep in the minds of the little ones the Commandments of God and of His Church.

In Parables

THE average catechist in the grades, then, will be wisely true to his or her name, that is, "one who teaches by question and answer." He or she, however, would surely not overstep bounds in supplementing the memory work with an appeal to the child's imagination. And the appeal to the imagination is best made through story-telling. Was there ever a child who did not love a story? Was there ever a child who did not live the stories that he loved? How many tiny Robinson Crusoes walk the earth, and we purblind adults all unaware of their existence? As you sit at your desk some morning, looking down at rows and rows of shining round faces, call suddenly upon Jack the Giant Killer or Cinderella, to rise. If your ferocity does not instantly frighten them away, they will stand there before you. You will think them merely tow-headed Dannie McKeon or that listless-eyed wisp of humanity, Anna Maria Zabriski. Yes, Dannie is embarrassedly shifting from one foot to the other in the aisle there, and Anna Maria is nervously smiling up at you, and twisting the corner of her freshly laundered apron, into an ugly tight little ball. You know them both. But what you do not know is that Dannie is also Jack the Giant Killer, and that Anna Maria has been Cinderella this many a day; in fact, ever since with a well-earned penny, she bought the story of the famous lost slipper in the dingy candy shop around the corner. And if you were to call upon Buffalo Bill, and George Washington, and Little Red Ridinghood and Pocahontas, you would have them all there before you, a trifle shamefaced, perhaps, at your discovery of their presence in your classroom, but just as worthy of your consideration as are all the other little men and women, who try your patience to the breaking-point from nine to three each day. For almost every child is, in imagination, some one else besides himself. Then why not use this faculty of make-believe ad majorem Dei gloriam? Stories from the lives of the Saints will offer to the children food for dreams such as were never suggested by the gems of fairy lore, or by the most thrilling tales of the Wild West. An account of a bear hunt in the Rockies, the narrative of the pigmies, or of the golden fleece, or of the minotaur, will become insipid in comparison with the dramatic story of Sebastian shot through and through with arrows, or of Saint Lawrence tortured on the gridiron, or of Saint Paul boldly claiming his right to decapitation, or of Saint Peter begging to be crucified head downwards, since he was all unworthy to die a death like that of his Master and Lord. Not altogether fruitless are those moments in which a boy imagines himself in the arena, like that brave young Pancratius, with folded arms and eyes raised to heaven, calmly waiting the attack of the hungry leopard; not wholly unrelated to her spiritual growth is the little girl's identification of herself with the gentle Saint Cecelia dying on the rack, or with the tender child, Saint Agnes, whom one must always and inevitably picture as standing before her pagan judge in her long white flowing robes, the aureole gleaming round her innocent fair head and the martyr's palm already in her hand.

The Source of Power

BUT, though "a dream in a sea of doom sets surely the ultimate isles," he who would suggest that dream to others must himself be a dreamer of high and glorious things. Any effort to stimulate the pupils' imaginations in relation to religious subjects will be ineffectual if the teacher himself does not possess a sincere enthusiasm for the cause of God. It would be a truism to say that personality, ideals, secure results more certainly than any method fabricated in the labyrinthine ways of the pedagogical mind. If that mind, instead of troubling itself with the myriad methods of today, is centered upon the Divine Teacher, upon His kindness and His love for the little ones, the catechism period will be the most exhilarating, as it should be the most important, of all the periods from nine to three. Love of the Divine Master, not anticipation of the diocesan examinations, is for the earnest instructor in catechism, the motive power of each hour's work. And love of the Divine Master, not mere scientific acquisition of truth, is surely the end of all catechism teaching. Love of the Divine Master, not alone fear of His just judgments, is the fruit that those priceless souls, hidden in tiny, sometimes unattractive, little bodies of clay, should gather from their years of religious instruction in the classroom. If these little ones of Christ are inspired by their teacher with an admiration for virtue, if they are prompted not only to shun evil but to do good, if they are imbued with a right idea of God, who is Love, if they are led to the foot of the mountain that slopes heavenwards, and are directed to look up to the Divine Leader far ahead of them, but smiling back at them and urging them to follow, they will bravely begin the ascent, and, one may dare to hope, whatever storms arise to dim that glorious vision, will chant always, even if it be but feebly, with their lips and with their hearts, "My God, Thy Kingdom Come!"

Sentimentality and Sentiment

THERE is a hill city in the eastern United States where many of the streets stand with heads rearing into every rain cloud that passes. The houses cling to the streets like bronco-wranglers, and in moments of relaxed attention they slide down into mine caves. Near the heels of one of these streets lived Tommie, a small boy. His father was a laudanum drinker, and in rare moments of sobriety he was a pathetic, faded, human wisp, blown along the world. Between sobriety and intoxication he was a professional ex-Romanist for revenue. Tommie's mother, like Micky Free's, took whisky in her tay, and on other opportunities. Between father and mother the little lad had few chances for ethical culture. He appeared in a Methodist Sabbath school shortly before Christmas annually, and listened to the young lady as she pointed out on the map just where Jerusalem lies, traced the genealogy of Herod Agrippa, or got other such profound and practical religious truths out of her system; but after the Christmas tree Tommie disappeared.

His First Appearance

ONE wintry night when the city hills were sheeted with frozen sleet, Tommie climbed, with broken shoes slipping, to the pinnacle of the topmost street. The arc hissed and clicked on the deserted corner, but the wind covered the sound, and shuttled black shadows over the icy pavement. The police had long settled into sleep. Tommie took a steel nut from his pocket, cracked the glass on the corner firebox and pulled the alarm. Then he cowered under a garden wall out of the wind, and watched with glistening eyes down the long hill.

Presently through the wind he heard the first clang of a fire engine, and far down the hill he could see the glint of trailing sparks from the fire box. He danced out on the icy hilltop, his head tossing, his thin arms beckoning. Up the cruel hill the horses plunged and fought, slipping, stumbling, dragging the great creaking engine yard by weary yards, the froth freezing on the bits, the steam lifting from their heaving flanks, fire flashing from the strokes of their big hoofs. The man on the driver's seat shouted to the agonizing grays, and two firemen clung on the footboards, and one stood behind the fire-box, all leaning out sidewise and peering upward into the dark.

At last the gasping beasts won the top of the hill, and stood a moment trembling. The men could find no fire. There was none—Tommie wanted to see the engine run. The driver saw Tommie and shouted: "Where's the fire, kid?" Tommie pointed down the far slope of the hill.

Over the crest the man urged the horses. Within twenty feet of the start the engine skidded, rolled over on the horses; then the engine, the screaming horses and the four silent men were ground into a dim tangle of smashed machinery, smoldering coals, steam, broken bones and blood.

Tommie slunk away like an alley cat. The four men who had seen him were dead at the foot of the icy hill, and could tell no tales. The newspapers reported the catastrophe, the false alarm, and the customary information that the detectives were working on a clew as usual.

The "Sob-Sisters"

A WEEK later Tommie struck an alarm on another icy hill; a patrol wagon and a fire engine collided, and two men were crippled for life. The detectives began to work on another clew. Finally, Tommie began to boast so openly that even a detective could detect him, and he was arrested. He was taken to a comfortable room under the charge of the matron of a station-house.

The newspapers spread the story vehemently, and a sob-sister wrote in moist relentment of Tommie's bonnie blue eyes and tousled locks. Then the lady dog-fanciers began to crowd into the station house with bonbons and roses; even the "white-chokered" pastor of the annual Sabbath school gave interviews; and Tommie had the time of his life. They hired an Irish lawyer, who could squeeze tears out of a lime kiln, to defend the sweet child, and went before a judge. Tommie, bathed and combed, in a white sailor blouse and pressed trousers looked like a barbered angel. After the Irish lawyer had set all noses blowing, Tommie fell on his knees at what is called the psychological moment, and began to plead with the judge. The judge blew his nose a second time and discharged Tommie with glory, after apologizing for the policeman that arrested the young rat.

A week later, Tommie stole a big touring car, ran it twenty miles from the city, and wrecked it. Unfortunately he escaped without even a scratch. He had killed his four common firemen with impunity, but he erred in judgment in this automobile joy ride because the car belonged to an influential citizen. Even the dog-fanciers and the preacher deserted him, and the same judge incontinently hustled him into a State reformatory to be reformed in vice and crime, after the learned man, laudator temporis acti, had delivered an oration on the degeneracy of the time.

The treatment of Tommie is an example of sentimentality, of sentiment overblown. Sentiment under the control of reason is good, often virtuous; sentiment running loose from reason is sentimentality, and at best it is untimely braying; commonly it is grave crime.

The Lady and Mary Mulhearn

IN the same hill city there was a lady. The term lady is used here with absolute literalness. She was so fearless that the buzzing of her friends at the bridge table did not arise far enough to amuse her. She was a big, auburn Celt, with level eyes that could soften and quiet starved babes in an orphan court, or glint over her outthrust chin and cow a snarling souper into fawning and train-wagging. Her chief amusement was plucking souls back from the lintel of hell for the love of the God of the Irish.

There was a group of eminently respectable Catholic women who called themselves her friends. These women played bridge assiduously. Their mothers had played forty-fives-asthore. The bridge players were quite sure the lady's court rescue-work was a little too much. One woman assured the bridge players that the lady's conduct was "altogether outré." Just like that, avic. The outré woman's mother used to say, "Push over thim petaties, alanna."

Late one wintry night, a night that would be chosen by Tommie for pulling the fire alarms, a woman court-probationer went to the lady with the word that Mary Mulhearn had left husband and children again, and was living with Cutthroat Harry, a cocaine-addict, in the worst slum of the city. Harry got his funnny-paper name from an abortive attempt at suicide. Mary Mulhearn was past sixty, fat, frowsy, permanently drunk, and she had white hair after an arrest and the accompanying bath. She had a respectable daughter, and this daughter wanted to have her taken out of the slum. The probation officer was frankly afraid to go to Murderer's Row, and would the lady help her? The lady would.

The Street and the Convent

SHE put a fur coat over her gown, and got into a taxi with two armed detectives. The lady waited under a street lamp at the edge of Murderer's Row. Presently the detectives returned with Mary between them, and a pair of very cold and altogether unnecessary automatic pistols against her swollen face. The foul old derelict was shuddering with cold and fear, and the detectives were assuring her that if she gave one peep they would blow, and so on. The bridge players were all asleep piously.

Within a minute, by a kind word and an Irish tongue, the lady had Mary's dirty hand within her own costly muff, and the taxi was going toward the Convent of the Good Shepherd. The lady left the detectives with their field guns without and went in with Mary Mulhearn. The office clock struck one.

Then the Mother Superior glided in, white, tired, wraithlike, with quiet eyes. She looked at Mary Mulhearn. Mary's draggled hair had fallen, her lower jaw drooped, and she stared with red-rimmed eyes at the White Nun. The color surged up into the face of the White Nun; her eyes softened, grew wet. Then she spread her arms wide in the form of a cross. Mary Mulhearn stumbled into the outstretched arms, and her dirty hair and tears fell over the White Nun's guimpe.

The big red Celt blew her own nose, and went home. Mary Mulhearn is still at the Convent of the Good Shepherd.

That is what I call sentiment as opposed to sentimentality.

NOTE AND COMMENT

A Protestant Minister and Martin Luther

UNDER the above heading the Boston Herald and Journal, for October 20, publishes a letter from Roland D. Sawyer: While we do not profess to be in sympathy with the social theories espoused by this writer in previous years, there can be no doubt that he has here taken the only scientifically critical and historical attitude than can be assumed towards that "sadly over-estimated figure in history," Martin Luther. Many other causes, "rather than Luther's ninety-five theses," as he rightly says, are accountable for such progress as the world has made. As for Luther himself, the only final word that our century can consistently pronounce upon him, as a century deeply interested in economic questions, is foreshadowed in the following passage:

> In his attitude toward the peasants Luther shows himself either a traitor or a brutal monster, who used them as dupes to his own end and then deserted them. One cannot plead ignorance for him, for his earlier pamphlets show that he appreciated the injustices done the peasants.
> Luther's pamphlet issued in 1525 "Against the Thieving and Murderous Bands of Peasants," and his harangues against the Jews, quite put him outside the lines of those men whom we must look upon as truly great. His words are directed against the poor peasants struggling to redress their wrongs, and waging one of the most unequal and grave battles against injustice; of them this Luther says, "In the case of an insurgent peasant, every man is both judge and executioner. Whoever can, should knock down, strangle, stab, stamp upon, either secretly or publicly, all such. Nothing is so venomous, pernicious and devilish as an insurgent peasant. So wonderful are these times that a prince merits heaven by bloodshed better than a peasant by prayer." Toward the Jews Luther preached: "Burn their synagogues and schools; what will not burn, bury with earth that neither stone nor rubbish remain. Break into their houses, forbid their rabbis to teach on pain of life and limb. Take away their prayer books and Talmuds, in which is nothing but cursing, lies, godlessness."
> Such was the man that conventional history honors as a great hero, and that conventional Protestant churches will soon honor as a saint.

These facts have already been placed before the readers of AMERICA, but it is well to hear them repeated by one who presents them from a strictly Protestant point of view, and in a setting that is far from Catholic.

The Autovan Catholic Truth Campaign

THE first season's work of the Catholic Truth Gild, established at Boston with the consent and blessing of his Eminence Cardinal O'Connell, deserves the closest study and consideration on the part of American Catholics. It demonstrates the fact that a public explanation and defense of the Church's doctrines, in the streets of our modern cities, are not merely possible, but eminently practical. Why, indeed, we always wondered, should this be less feasible now than in the days when the Apostles first preached Christ in Jewish villages or pagan towns? Over 150,000 persons were addressed, in eighty open-air meetings, from a specially constructed autovan. In all this time there were practically no disrespectful interruptions or jeerings on the part of the random, non-Catholic audiences attracted by the discourses dealing with the fundamental teachings of the Church. How deeply, moreover, public interest was aroused is plain from the many thousand volumes of Catholic literature sold at these meetings. Socialists themselves have never been more successful in this regard. Mr. David Goldstein, Mrs. Martha Moore Avery, and others connected with this new venture have done a distinct service to the Church in thus demonstrating beyond all cavil the practicability of open-air Catholic truth campaigns. Accompanied by Sergeant Arthur B. Corbett, Mr. Goldstein will begin a three months' tour in California on the first of January. Thence they will direct their way home to Boston, over the Lincoln Highway, speaking in the leading cities en route. Dates for the itinerary are now being arranged by the Catholic Truth Gild at its quarters, 468 Massachusetts Avenue, Boston. Those, therefore, who are interested in introducing into their own cities the autovan outdoor campaign, as it has been conducted in Salem, Beverly and Boston, can avail themselves of the present opportunity. Protestants have not neglected this work, and their series of automobile religious services along Broadway averaged, during the Summer months, an attendance of 396. A grand total of 1,219 meetings were held by thirty-two speakers, seventeen of whom were laymen, chiefly business and professional men. Nine were secretaries and six ministers. Evidently there is here a splendid field for the Catholic apostolate.

The Haven of Irish Immigrant Girls

A SWEET charity is that which for forty-four years has been performed by the New York Mission of Our Lady of the Rosary for the protection of the Irish immigrant girls. During that period it has received, free of charge, 100,000 of these strangers arriving on our shores, and has secured places of employment for 12,000 of them.

> While comparatively few come to the Mission now, there is no change in its attitude toward the immigrant. The priests of the Mission make frequent visits to the landing piers and to the immigrant hospitals and are at all times ready to render any assistance in their power. The Mission continues to employ a representative at Ellis Island to look out for the Irish immigrant's interest. It uses its influence to protect Irish girls on shipboard and examines the claims and fitness of the relatives or friends who call for the immigrants discharged to the Home. It receives, free of charge, such girls as are discharged to the Mission by the immigration authorities. It tries to locate relatives of those who bring indefinite addresses. It secures positions in good families for those ready to go to work. And, in keeping with a rule observed since the founding of the Mission, the service in whatever form is gratuitous.

The expenses of this work are met by the kind and generous people of the parish of Our Lady of the Rosary, by donations of a few friends outside the parish, and by the Rosary Society. The dues of the latter are twenty-five cents a year, and in pious return three Masses are celebrated weekly for the members, living and dead. It is neither a work of philanthropy nor of social "uplift," but of Divine charity, such as the Church has unostentatiously practised through all the centuries.

Exploiting Women for Profit

THE disastrous effects of the entrance of women into men's occupations, where this can possibly be avoided, are thus excellently summed up in Il Giornale Italiano of New York:

> Woman's work tends to the disadvantage of man's work. The competition of woman in the field of labor has upon the wages of men an influence more disastrously harmful than the competition of negroes, Chinese or Hindus. The enormous number of women who are working to withdraw themselves from household affairs depreciates female labor. For every woman who works—at a ridiculous wage—there is a man who cannot get himself well-paid and thus is obliged to send his wife also to work. The pay of a man and woman in the same family combined does not exceed what ought to be a fair wage for the man alone, if so many women, with their work, did not depreciate male labor, to the profit of greedy manufacturers and to the detriment of society. The work of women destroys the children.

The truth of these words is thoroughly comprehended by the American Federation of Labor. Its efforts deserve our earnest support, where it is honestly fighting this abuse. A correspondent to a New York paper refers to a factory that discharged 150 men, not one of whom had been drafted, and substituted cheaper woman labor with the calamity cry: "The war has taken our men." We may not overlook the obvious necessities created by war conditions, nor the need of women who must earn their own livelihood in occupations suitable to their sex. But anything that destroys the ideal of Christian womanhood or of the Christian home, whether it be capitalism or Socialism, must be fought to the death.

The War.—In the beginning of the week the Austro-German troops of the Fourteenth Army, after having taken Cormons and Udine, pressed forward toward the lower reaches of the Tagliamento River, while another army advancing from the Carnic Alps reached Italian soil, took Gemona and swept toward the upper courses of the stream. The Italians were everywhere forced to yield, in the mountains, on the Friuli plain, and along the Udine-Codroipo railway. They halted at the Tagliamento, but the strong bridgehead positions at Codroipo and Dignano were carried against them by the Bavarian and Wurtemberg troops while those divisions which were maintaining their lines on the eastern bank of the River near Pinzano and Latisana were either driven back or taken prisoners. By November 2, the Austro-German armies were in complete control of the eastern banks of the Tagliamento from the Fella Valley to the Adriatic. In their drive, according to the Berlin War Office, the Austro-Germans have taken more than 200,000 prisoners and 1,800 guns.

Bulletin, Oct. 29, p.m.-Nov. 5, a.m.

On the Western front, while the British have made considerable advance in the Ypres district, the most important gain has been on the French front north of the Aisne. The whole section of this front extending from the Oise-Aisne canal on the west to Corbeny on the east, a distance of thirteen miles, comprising the western end of the Chemin des Dames, has been evacuated by the Germans who retreated one mile to the north bank of the Ailette River. The French followed and are now on the south bank of the river, after occupying the villages of Courtecon, Cerny, Ailles, and Chevreux, all of which are about eight miles south of Laon, the present French objective.

In Palestine the British have captured Beersheba forty miles south of Jerusalem, taking almost 2,000 prisoners. The capture of Beersheba was followed a few days after by an advance of almost three miles on the western and southwestern defenses of Gaza.

The rumors rife during the week that Dr. Michaelis was to be retired from the post of Imperial German Chancellor have finally been confirmed by the official announcement that Count George F. von Hertling, Prime Minister of Bavaria, has been selected and that he has accepted the position. He also assumed the duties of Prussian Prime Minister. Dr. Karl Helfferich, Vice-Chancellor and Minister of the Interior, and Herr von Waldow, Food Dictator, have resigned. The progressive leader in the Reichstag, Friedrich von Payer, will, it is said, become Vice-Chancellor, and Herr Friedberg, national Liberal leader, Vice-President of the Prussian Ministry. Admiral von Capelle's resignation as Minister of Marine has not as yet been accepted.

The New German Chancellor

Count George F. von Hertling is a Catholic. He is seventy-four years old and has long been prominent in the councils of the Empire. He is widely known as a writer. Books of his authorship are "John Locke and the Cambridge School," "Matter and Form and the Definition of the Soul," "Beyond the Borders of the Mechanical," "The Principles of Catholicism and Science." He was born at Darmstadt, and was educated at Munich, Berlin and Bonn. In the latter university he became a professor extraordinary in 1880, and in 1882 a regular professor. In 1876 he founded the Goerres Gesellschaft and became its President. He was made a life member of the Bavarian Chamber of the Reichsrat until 1912, when he became Bavarian Foreign Minister and Cabinet President. He opposed the last policies of von Bethmann-Hollweg when the latter was Chancellor, and once before was offered the post by the Kaiser but declined it, recommending Dr. Michaelis, who was appointed. Reports have declared that Count von Hertling favors an immediate peace without indemnities.

Norway Protests

In a note presented by the Norwegian Minister at Berlin to the German Minister of Foreign Affairs, Norway has protested against the sinking of Norwegian steamships in the convoy of neutral merchantmen attacked by German cruisers in the North Sea last month. The note calls attention to the fact that a year ago, after the destruction of Norwegian ships in the Polar Seas, Germany was notified that the Norwegian people would consider any new case of the kind a violation of the laws of humanity. Among other things the note says:

> The Norwegian Government will not again state its views, as it has already done so on several occasions, about the violation of the principles of freedom of the high seas incurred by the proclamation of large tracts of the ocean as a war zone, and by the sinking of neutral merchant ships not carrying contraband.
> It is owing to various measures of this kind that Norwegian ships, as well as those of other neutral countries, have been compelled, in order to procure for Norway her essential imports, to seek protection in the past, as they will in the future, by allowing themselves to be convoyed by warships belonging to Germany's enemies. The Norwegian Government bears in mind that in the memorandum addressed to the German Government on October 20, 1916, occasioned by the sinking of Norwegian ships in the ice-cold sea by German submarines, it called attention to the fact that the Norwegian nation considered in the light of a violation of the laws of humanity the last fresh case in which the death of Norwegian sailors was caused or their lives or health exposed to danger. On that occasion the Norwegian Government once again requested the German Government to take measures so that the commanders of German submarines should not expose the lives of Norwegian sailors to danger, whether by negligence or error of judgment.

It has made a profound impression on the Norwegian people that not only have German submarines continued to sink peaceful neutral merchant ships, paying no attention to the fate of their crews, but that even German warships adopted the same tactics. The Norwegian Government decided to send this note in order to bring to the attention of the German Government the impression these acts have made upon the Norwegian people.

The note of its Government has met with the approval of the Norwegian people.

Great Britain.—The London Times is, or pretends to be, seriously agitated over the danger of revolution in England. According to the aforesaid paper, revolutionary propaganda is widespread. The movement appeals especially to discontented workmen who are intent on making "demand upon demand," on causing "strike after strike," on hitting "blow after blow," until the capitalistic State is destroyed. In general, according to the statement, there are two classes in the nation, the working class, which is progressive and Socialistic in tendency, and the unprogressive Old England class, composed of landed proprietors, members of the learned professions, merchants and so on. At the outbreak of the war the total income of the former class was about £600,000,000; this has increased to £1,000,000,000. Despite this apparent prosperity the workmen are not content; they are anxious to possess the whole product of industry, and protest moreover that the military burdens are not equally distributed. Things have proceeded so far that the workmen have emancipated themselves from the control of the national authority, which finds itself baffled by the problem, a triumph for the revolutionary movement. A greater difficulty is now presenting itself for solution. Under the circumstances.

Labor Troubles

All that can be obtained from the labor section of the nation is the relatively small amount which they will pay in increased taxation. From the other section no amount can justly be obtained from those whose present incomes are below the average of the wage-earning class. There remain the wealthy individualists, say, those whose incomes exceed £250 per annum. But the total amount of these incomes comes to only £1,000,000,000 per annum, of which a large proportion is already paid away in direct taxation and in subscription to war loans. It follows that the amount can only be obtained in the future, as it has been mainly obtained in the past, by an expansion of the currency, which is equivalent to a depreciation of its purchasing value. Thus we are caught in the vicious circle of increased wages to meet high prices, and a further rise in prices to pay the increased wages. One half of the nation raises its standard of living; the other half has to bear the burden of this rise, as well as the greater part of all the other burdens imposed by this war, and even so we are hurrying on to the time when the machinery of money will entirely fail of its purpose.

The Times fears that if this state of affairs continues for long labor will accept the guidance of revolutionists, and will then be faced with the problem of rebuilding the nation from its foundation, a task that will be undertaken "under the same conditions and with the same prospects of success in London as in Petrograd." The solution is a strong, intelligent Parliament brave enough to act at once. The sanest judgment on this affair is contained in this editorial from the Liverpool Catholic Times and Catholic Opinion:

Following in the wake of the Times, a number of journals have been discussing the growth of a revolutionary movement amongst the British toilers. Does such a movement exist, and if so, is it formidable? That a change of a far-reaching character has come to pass in the sentiments of the workers is certain, and it may be called revolutionary in the sense that its object is to bring about great reforms. In the first place, the people are dissatisfied with the privileges enjoyed by the ruling classes. They are particularly alive to the danger of leaving in their hands without checks the fashioning of diplomatic policies. The lesson taught by the Kaiser's attack on the liberties of nations has also made a deep impression on them, and their attitude towards monarchy as a form of government is not what it was before the war began. Moreover, the workers are discontented with the manner in which the affairs of the nation have been conducted by Ministers during this period of trial. They want those with whom authority rests to be less inclined to conceal blunders and more responsive to popular feeling. There is, therefore, a good deal of unrest amongst the masses of the population, but it would be a mistake to imagine that it portends immediate peril to the State. What it means is that the Government must be prepared to promote democratic reforms of a thorough kind.

Apparently England will witness great changes at least in its economic and social structure, if not in its form of government.

Ireland.—Sinn Fein is still conducting a vigorous campaign for the complete separation of Ireland from England. Just at present its efforts are promoted in no small measure by revelations of cynical cruelty to Ashe who recently died in prison as a result of a "hunger strike." The Convention sitting under the presidency of De Valera has set forth these resolutions in its agenda:

Sinn Fein Convention

Article I. Whereas, the people of Ireland never relinquished their claim to separate nationhood; and, whereas, the provisional Government of the Irish Republic at Easter, 1916, in the name of the Irish people, and continuing the fight made by previous generations, reasserted the inalienable right of the Irish nation to sovereign independence, and reaffirmed the determination of the Irish people to achieve it; and,

Whereas, the proclamation of the Irish Republic at Easter, 1916, and the supreme courage and glorious sacrifices of the men who gave their lives to maintain it have united the people of Ireland under the flag of the Irish Republic, be it

Resolved, That we, the delegated representatives of the Irish people in convention assembled, hereby declare the following to be the constitution of Sinn Fein: (1) The name of this organization shall be Sinn Fein. (2) Sinn Fein aims at securing international recognition of Ireland as an independent Irish Republic. Having achieved that status, the Irish people may by referendum freely choose their own form of Government. (3) This object shall be attained through the Sinn Fein organization, which shall in the name of the sovereign Irish people, (a) deny the right and oppose the will of the British Parliament and the British Crown or any other foreign Government to legislate for Ireland, (b) make use of any and every means available to render impotent the power of England to hold Ireland in subjection by military force or otherwise.

Whereas, no law made without the authority and consent of the Irish people is or ever can be binding on their conscience, therefore, in accordance with the resolution of Sinn Fein, adopted in the convention of 1915, a constituent assembly shall be convoked, comprising persons chosen by Irish constituencies as supreme national authority to speak and act in the name of the Irish people and to devise and formulate measures for the welfare of the whole people of Ireland, such as: (a) The introduction of a prospective system for Irish industries and commerce by combined action of the Irish councils, urban councils, rural councils, poor law boards, harbor boards and other bodies directly responsible to the Irish people; (b) the establishment and maintenance under the direction of the National Assembly or other authority approved by the people of Ireland, of an Irish consular service for the advancement of Irish commerce and Irish interests generally; (c) the reestablishment of an Irish mercantile marine to facilitate direct trading between Ireland and the countries of continental Europe, America, Africa and the Far East; (d) an industrial survey of Ireland and development of its mineral resources under the auspices of the National Assembly or other national authority, approved by the people of Ireland; (e) the establishment of a national stock exchange; (f) the creation of a national civil service embracing all employes of county councils, rural councils, poor law boards, harbor boards and other bodies responsible to the Irish people by the institution of a common, national qualifying examination and local competitive examinations, the latter at the discretion of the local bodies; (g) the establishment of Sinn Fein courts of arbitration for the speedy and satisfactory adjustment of disputes; (h) the development of transit by railroad and water, and of waste lands for the national benefit by a national authority approved by the people of Ireland; (i) the development of the Irish Sea fisheries by the National Assembly or other national authority, approved by the people of Ireland; (j) the reform of education to render its basis national and industrial by the compulsory teaching of Irish language, Irish history, and Irish agriculture and manufacturing potentialities in a primary system and, in addition, to elevate to a position of dominance in the university system Irish agriculture and economics; (k) the abolition of the poor law system and the substitution in its stead of adequate out-door relief to the aged and infirm and employment of the able-bodied in the reclamation of waste lands, afforestation, and other national and reproductive works.

Article II. A special meeting of the executive may be summoned on three days' notice by the President on a requisition presented to him, signed by six members of the executive, specifying the object for which the meeting is called. In a case of urgent emergency the President shall call all the members of the executive to an urgency meeting, and may take action in the name of the executive. In case he secures the approval of an absolute majority of the entire executive, the action taken is to be reported for confirmation at the next ordinary meeting of the executive.

Article III. Where Irish resources are being developed or where industries exist, Sinn Feiners should make it their business to secure assurance that workers are paid living wages.

Article IV. That equality of men and women in this organization shall be emphasized in all speeches and leaflets.

The immediate effect of all this is hard to foresee but it is significant that three Irish Bishops have lately warned the people against the danger of revolution.

Italy.—Party differences, according to dispatches, have been wiped out by the German invasion of Italy, and official statements made by the various political groups, and notably by the Catholics and the Socialists, have declared that political expediency must give way to the national need. A new Ministry has been formed with Vittorio Orlando, Minister of the Interior under the Boselli Ministry, as Premier. The Cabinet, in which Orlando retains his former post, is as follows: Premier and Minister of the Interior, Vittorio Orlando; Minister of Foreign Affairs, Baron Sonnino; Minister of the Colonies, Signor Colosimo; Minister of Justice, Signor Sacchi; Minister of Finance, Signor Meda; Minister of the Treasury, Francesco Nitti; Minister of War, General Alfieri; Minister of the Navy, Vice-Admiral Delbono; Minister of Munitions, General Alfredo Dallolio; Minister of Military Aid and War Pensions, Signor Dissolad; Minister of Education, Signor Barenini; Minister of Public Works, Signor Bari; Minister of Agriculture, Signor Miliani; Minister of Commerce and Labor, Signor Giufelli; Minister of Posts, Signor Fara; Minister of Transports, Signor Bianchi.

The New Ministry

The policy of the new Cabinet appears to be an aggressive carrying on of the war. An evidence of this is the message addressed to the Italians of the United States by the Italian Ambassador, Count di Cellore, in which he assures his compatriots that the people and army of Italy, in spite of the recent successes of the Central Powers, are irrevocably set in their determination to fight the invaders until Italy is crowned with victory.

Rome.—A delayed copy of Cardinal Gasparri's letter, in which the Papal Secretary of State comments on the pastoral written by Mgr. de Gibergues, Bishop of Valence, shows that the Cardinal had not only anticipated the Italian objections to the Papal Note recently voiced by Baron Sonnino, but at the same time answered the criticisms made by the antagonistic section of the French press.

The Pope's Note

Taking up the statement that the Holy Father was pro-German in his proposals the Cardinal declares that "If in the Pontifical Note there are nations favored in a special manner they are Belgium and France." That Belgium is of the opinion that the Pope has been especially solicitous for the welfare of the Belgians is clear from the gratitude generally expressed in that country. The Cardinal's opinion has been publicly confirmed as far as Belgium is concerned by the text of the official reply of King Albert's Government to the Papal peace proposals, already published in AMERICA. It has also been pointed out that the Central Powers have complained that they have been the only Powers condemned by the Holy See.

The Cardinal by anticipation refutes Sonnino's charge that the Pope has put the invasion of Belgium on the same plane with the conquest of the German colonies, by stating that although the Holy Father proposed reciprocal condonation of damages as a general principle, he added, nevertheless, that if in certain cases there were special reasons against it ("as in the case of Belgium") they must be considered in equity and justice.

Conceived as it was in a general way, says Cardinal Gasparri, the Papal Note, does not stand in the way of compensation being demanded by France for damages done without military necessity. To the same general principle of not demanding war indemnity France has already been committed, he says, by M. Ribot, the ex-Premier of France, in conjunction with the Provisory Government of Russia, without, however, excluding the right of France to demand compensation for damages inflicted by the ill-will of military commanders without military necessity. The Cardinal adds, however, that:

> Apart from the enormous difficulty of deciding precisely which are the damages done, without military necessity, by the fault of the military commanders, it is for France to judge if it suits her, even in the hypothesis of victory, to prolong the war, be it only for a year, in order to exact from the enemy reparation of those damages, taking into account the loss of money that prolongation of the war must entail, the still graver loss in men, and the heaps of ruins in which the war would leave Belgium and the French territory now occupied by the Germans.

Answering the strictures on the Papal Note with regard to the Holy Father's suggestions about the settlement of the question of Alsace and Lorraine, strictures which have been very prominent in certain sections of the French press, Cardinal Gasparri says:

> And lastly, in his fifth point, the Holy Father does not, and could not, propose any solution of the question of Alsace and Lorraine. But he expresses a wish that France and Germany may examine it in a conciliatory disposition, and have regard, so far as may be just and possible, to the aspirations of the people concerned. It is therefore hard to see how such desires and hopes could be offensive to French patriotism; on the contrary if this question, which is the apple of discord between two great nations, could be solved peaceably and in way satisfactory to both parties (and no one will say this is impossible), would it not be better, not only for Germany and France, but for all mankind?

The Cardinal's letter concludes as follows:

> It is, therefore, clear that if the Pontiff's appeal favors France on various points, on none does it offend her, and that leads to the hope that, after the first rather too hasty impression, France will give the Pontifical act a juster and more favorable appreciation.

Cardinal Bourne, Archbishop of Westminster, had made a vigorous protest against the misrepresentations of the Pope's proposals by the English press, declaring that never in the history of the newspapers of England has there been so utter a confusion of ideas as in the treatment of the Note of the Holy Father. His Eminence said in part:

> I do not think it is out of place to protest against the attempts which have been made, notably by some of our evening papers, to misrepresent entirely the whole attitude of the Pope. If the writers knew the facts, then they have been lying; but if they do not know the facts, which is probably the case, they have been showing a most extraordinary want of care in dealing with issues so great. The authority of the Holy See does not enter into the matter, but, coming from the source it does, every reasonable man and every right-thinking person ought to give to such a document all the consideration it deserves.

Further comments on this subject will be printed in the next issue of AMERICA.

Russia.—Municipal elections have been held in many parts of Russia, and according to press dispatches have resulted in a victory for non-partisan and conservative Socialist groups. The returns from 643 cities and towns indicate that the radical Bolsheviki candidates have been defeated in every instance. In large cities the Bolsheviki polled 7 per cent of the vote, in towns 2.2 per cent. About 50 per cent of the vote in small towns was cast by independents. Just now it appears that the Bolsheviki are losing favor. The demonstration against the war, set for November 2, did not take place. The decision not to hold it that day was reached at a secret meeting of the Maximalists, who are dominated by Lenine, the radical agitator. The meeting is listed for a later day kept secret for the present by the radicals. These improvements in conditions are apparent rather than real. Food is scarce and the people, especially infants, are suffering great hardships. The army is still disorganized, and according to Kerensky the very existence of Russia is threatened. At this date there is no authentic news about the bill fathered by the Minister of War, "providing for the establishment of qualified regimental disciplinary tribunals which will apply a system of penalties under which entire regiments, if convicted of lack of discipline, will have their leave stopped and their rations considerably reduced." From a recent motion for clemency for degraded army officers, made by Alexieff, former Chief of Staff, it appears that so far 10,000 officers have been expelled from the army. Such wholesale punishment is probably the reason why Parliament appointed a Council of Defense, consisting of thirty-eight members, to sit continuously in order to carry out the Government's measures for improving the morale of the troops.

The Elections

The Cause of the Irish Martyrs

OF RELIGION

A. HILLIARD ATTERIDGE

DURING the month of September the ecclesiastical commission for the cause of the Irish Martyrs held several sittings in Dublin, and good progress was made in the drawing up of the "Apostolic Process." The first formal steps in this matter were taken more than twelve years ago, when the Archbishop of Dublin conducted a preliminary investigation, and in February, 1905, transmitted a first report to the Sacred Congregation of Rites. This report contained a long list of reputed martyrdoms from the days of the persecution under Henry VIII to the early years of the eighteenth century. It was accompanied by a large collection of books, transcripts of documents and the record of evidence as to local tradition. This was the first formal step toward the beatification. Informal efforts in the same direction had been made in earlier times, and in the seventeenth century Irish exiles on the Continent drew up several catalogues of those who had suffered for the Faith in Ireland with some narratives of their lives and deaths. But until 1904-1905 no steps had been taken for the regular introduction of the cause of beatification at Rome.

The stage in the ecclesiastical process now reached may be described in popular language as the preparation of the evidence to be laid before the Roman Congregation, the proceedings of 1904-'05 having already established a primâ facie case. The first list sent to Rome has been reduced to about 300 names, and it is not unlikely that there will be a still further reduction. We may take it as a practical certainty that a far greater number of Catholics, priests and lay folk, were put to death for their religion in the days of the Irish persecution, in the time of the Tudors, the Stuarts and the Cromwellian commonwealth. But the very character of the persecution has involved in utter obscurity the names of hundreds of these heroes of the Faith, and in many other cases what is known of them is so meagre that it would be impossible to build up the complete evidence required in the process of beatification and canonization.

One case stands apart from the rest, that of the Venerable Oliver Plunkett, Archbishop of Armagh, executed at Tyburn, London, on Friday, July 11, 1681. His execution was the last of the long series of martyrdoms at Tyburn, during a century and a half of the persecution in England. He was brought to Westminster for trial, and thanks to this fact we have the full record of the proceedings in court and an abundance of further evidence in the British and Irish State Papers. The cause was introduced with that of more than 200 martyrs of the English persecution, and in 1886 Leo XIII signed the decree which gave to the martyred Archbishop the title of Venerable, the first stage toward beatification. But among the martyrs in Ireland itself it is quite the exception to have a full record of their trial and condemnation. Few of them were arraigned before a regular court. They were executed in many instances under the summary process of martial law. In other cases they were put to death without even the pretense of a trial. In some cases the State papers afford evidence of the proceedings against the martyr. Thus in the case of Dermod O'Hurley, Archbishop of Cashel, who was hanged at Stephen's Green, Dublin, in 1584, we have the correspondence between the Irish Lords Justices and Walsingham, Queen Elizabeth's Secretary of State. The Justices wrote that it was considered advisable to examine the Archbishop under torture, but as there was no rack in Dublin they suggested that he should be sent to London. Walsingham replied that he might be tortured by fire, instead of the rack, and this cruel course was followed. After the torture the Justices reported that there was no evidence on which a court could convict the prisoner of treason, under Irish law. Walsingham solved the difficulty by suggesting that the Archbishop should be executed under sentence of a court martial, so the court was convened and gave the required sentence.

In many cases there are records of martyrdoms, without the names of the martyrs. Thus there are instances where monasteries and friaries were sacked and the whole community put to death, but the monastic records that would have given us the names, disappeared when the home of the martyrs was laid in ruins. In other cases the names recorded in documents of the time are obviously written down incorrectly. Sometimes patient investigation enables us to discover the real name. Then there is often another difficulty. Death in a just cause is among the highest forms of self-sacrifice but it is not necessarily martyrdom. The martyr, in the strict sense of the word, is one who dies rather than deny his faith or is put to death in hatred of the Faith. The same difficulty arose in the case of the English martyrs who were nominally condemned for high treason, a civil offense. In carrying through their cause it had to be shown that the motive of their condemnation was their religion, not their political action. This was facilitated by the fact that the full records of their trial were available. In some of the cases of reputed martyrdoms during the Irish wars, with executions under martial law and only the scantiest records of the occurrence, the problem of completing the proof is more complex.

All things considered, it is highly satisfactory that so many martyrs' names and so much historical detail about their heroic lives and deaths have been collected from the very incomplete records of the penal times. Even in Ireland, itself, there is amongst the people only a vague knowledge of the ferocious persecution which during 150 years deluged the land with Catholic blood. In some places the stones are pointed out which in penal days were used as altars, in hidden valleys and on lonely hillsides. But with the exception of Venerable Oliver Plunkett, and perhaps Bishop Egan of Ross, no names are widely remembered among the people. In England, in the same way, until the beatification of the martyrs, there was no widespread knowledge of their story. More's and Fisher's names, perhaps Campion's, were widely known. The rest were remembered locally only. We may hope that steps will now be taken to add to our popular Catholic literature the inspiring records of the martyrs, whose blood was so freely shed to preserve the Faith of the Irish people, as well as to glorify God in other ways.

Dr. Reisner's Jesuits

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

THE pastor of Grace Methodist Episcopal Church, New York, is the Reverend Christian F. Reisner. In some of his recent activities, Dr. Reisner brings to mind a familiar paragraph from Newman's famous lecture, "Tradition, the Sustaining Power of Protestantism," in which is pictured an old-fashioned Protestant who has been asked to prove an oft-repeated charge against the Catholic Church.

> . . . He never knew there was any doubt at all about it; he is surprised, for he thought we granted it [italics inserted]. When he was young he heard it said again and again; to his certain knowledge it has been uniformly said the last forty, fifty, sixty years and on one ever denied it; it is so in all the books he ever looked into; what is the world coming to? What is true if this is not? So, Catholics are to be whitewashed! What next?

Newman's Protestant was far from being a bad man. He was, rather, a good man; at least, he would not consent to have iniquity whitewashed. But he was ignorant. I have no reason to believe that Dr. Reisner is anything but a well-meaning clergyman. Hence when he states in public that "the Jesuits defended all kinds of false statements, if the Church was advanced thereby," I may question his good taste, but incline to excuse him on the score of ignorance. Since reading a letter addressed to a Catholic layman, Mr. Frank Haverty, by the Reverend Doctor, I further incline to hold his ignorance to be of the deep, dark, ineluctable and invincible variety which, according to the pitying theologians, does away with moral responsibility.

It all began after this fashion. On February 26, 1917, the New York Times reported a meeting held in Dr. Reisner's church on the previous evening. Dr. Reisner, so ran the account, "told his congregation that there may be circumstances under which it is right to lie." In proof of this somewhat unconventional statement, he quoted the practice of Colonel Roosevelt and of "European diplomacy," after which he proceeded to remark that "the Jesuits defended all kinds of false statements if the Church was advanced thereby." Under date of February 26, Mr. Frank Haverty asked Dr. Reisner for his "authority for this charge," and requested "volume, page and chapter from any approved Catholic theological work, Jesuit or not, that maintains that a good end justifies a bad means." Mr. Haverty is a good waiter. One needs to be, when one sets out to bring the writers of anti-Catholic statements to book. In fact, Mr. Haverty is still waiting for his answer. But on March 10 Dr. Reisner wrote: "I am surprised that you insist on so prompt an answer, and conclude because you did not get it none will be forthcoming. I am compelled to work sixteen hours a day, and have not been able until this moment to look up my authority in order to give you the book and page number, etc."

This was promising, but disappointment followed. After the usual camouflage, "The Catholic Church is doing limitless good," aided, no doubt, by the skilful lying of the Jesuits, and "some of my best friends belong to that organization," which touches the point only to the extent of making us suspect that the Doctor is a bit careless in choosing his friends, we read:

> In the midst of many statements, the reference to the Jesuits was made, and I thought it generally admitted that in the early days when neither the Protestants or the Catholics had the high standard of morals which we now enjoy [e. g., Dr. Reisner's teaching that "there may be circumstances under which it is right to lie"] that this organization did argue that the "end justified the means." (Italics inserted.)

Thus is the ground shifted in several respects. Dr. Reisner's first statement was a general proposition, "the Jesuits defended all kinds of false statements." Coupled with the mention of Colonel Roosevelt, one was fairly justified in believing that Dr. Reisner referred to present-day Jesuits, as well as to their forbears. Withdrawing the charge against the modern Jesuits, some of whom maintain a fair reputation for general respectability within a few blocks of Dr. Reisner's church, the worthy clergyman now fixes the vile charge on the Jesuits of those "early days when neither the Protestants nor the Catholics" had our present high standard of morals.

Indeed, he is rather surprised that anyone should question the matter. "He thought we granted it," says Newman's Protestant of 1850. "I thought it generally admitted," writes Dr. Reisner in 1917. Some historical sense, not to speak of a sense of justice, would have counseled greater precision in Dr. Reisner's second indictment; still, something is gained by his indirect admission that twentieth-century Jesuits do not teach lying. Unfortunately, however, in his very defense, Dr. Reisner widens the charge against those shadowy Jesuits of an uncertain period. Not only might this gentry lie to advance the cause of the Church, but they might steal, when this was more convenient, or corrupt States, or sow discord, or plan murder, or do any foul act abhorred of God and man. For their "organization," with incredible fatuity, "did argue that the end justified the means."

The further workings of Dr. Reisner's mind are of considerable interest to the psychologist. "I mean to answer everyone who has written me concerning the matter as you did," he proceeds, "and then under no circumstances will I be drawn into a controversy, for I believe that the Catholics and the Protestants are both trying to make the world better and to build religion which alone insures righteousness and helpfulness." Apparently he has not the faintest concept of the fact that he has publicly charged a great religious body with having professed principles utterly subversive of decency and morality. And who are these Papists that he should condescend to break a lance with them? Nor does he recognize the incongruity of invoking "righteousness and helpfulness," as long as he is under the obligation, recognized by all men of honor, either of proving his dastardly charge or of retracting it as publicly as he made it.

I have not had the time to look up many authorities and I must therefore refer you to the following only: "Fourteen Years a Jesuit," Count von Hoensbroech. Trans. by Alice Zimmerman Vol. II, pg 320 ff. "The End Justifies the Means," "History of the Christian Church," Sheldon, Pub. T. Y. Crowell & Co., Vol. III, pg 414-423, 489-500, also consider the question of probabilism as described and authenticated on pages 416, 419, 495 and 497 of the latter book. I have before me a translation of some of these references which while they do not exactly use the phrase, nevertheless imply that such casuistry was employed.

Mr. Haverty had asked "volume, page and chapter from any approved Catholic theological work, Jesuit or not." After twelve days of sixteen working hours, Dr. Reisner cites two books, and considers the case closed. Neither was "an approved Catholic theological work." One was written by a Protestant clergyman, professor in a Protestant seminary; the other by an apostate priest who is certainly not a Catholic, nor even, as I read his confession, a Christian. It is as if in response to a request for two Catholic authorities on the Papacy, Dr. Reisner had recommended Martin Luther and Voltaire; or to a student in search of old-line, rock-bound champions of the Democratic Party had suggested Charles E. Hughes and Elihu Root.

Plainly, however, it was the best that Dr. Reisner could do. But the reference to von Hoensbroech is particularly unhappy. On page 419 of the second volume of his farrago, "Fourteen Years a Jesuit," von Hoensbroech champions lying, and on page 421, boasts that he was guilty of forgery. "Certainly I did it with a necessary lie, by telling the Jesuit Caduff that I was now able to buy books with that sum. Without this lie I should not have got the money" (op. cit. II, p. 419). Von Hoensbroech, as he confesses, was arranging to use money that did not belong to him, "certain that I could repay it afterwards" (p. 419), a convenient method that has landed many an adventurer in jail. ". . . . in order to arouse no suspicion, I signed the telegram with the name of the Jesuit Superior Fischer. . . . The crime of forging the telegram I gladly admit, and rejoice, even at this day, that I boldly tore through a little wire thread (the consideration of sending such a telegram with a false signature), else this little thread might easily have grown into an iron fetter" (op. cit. II, p. 421). In other words, Dr. Reisner asks me to believe, on the testimony of an intending thief, a self-confessed liar and forger, that the Society of Jesus once taught that evil might be done for a good end!

Furthermore, on page 320, the very page cited by Dr. Reisner, von Hoensbroech laments his failure to prove, either before the County Court of Trèves or before the High Court of Appeals at Cologne, on March 30, 1906, his charge that the Society taught that the end justifies the means. As Dr. Reisner may not know, over seventy years ago Father Roh, S.J., offered 1,000 florins to anyone who could prove that the Society had ever taught this detestable doctrine. The offer was repeated in 1890 by Kaplan Richter. Neither offer has ever been claimed. In 1903, Franz Dasbach made the offer 2,000 florins, and the notoriety-seeking von Hoensbroech came forward. But by his own showing, the case was dismissed "on the ground that the passages brought forward from the Jesuit authors do not contain the sentence 'The end sanctifies the means' either formally or materially" (op. cit. II, p. 320). Von Hoensbroech explains the disaster on "the well-founded supposition that in essential points it [the Cologne judgment] was composed with the assistance of Jesuits" (p. 321). Von Hoensbroech then proceeds to quote from three Jesuit theologians, Becanus, Castropalao and Voit. Not one of these men holds the doctrine imputed to him; but I submit that even if all did, three out of possibly a hundred writers cannot represent the doctrine of the Society, any more than Benedict Arnold can be instanced as a fair example of the spirit prevailing among the officers of the Continental army.

After all, it would seem that not the Jesuits, but von Hoensbroech, on his own confession, and Dr. Reisner, according to the uncontradicted report of the New York Times, teach the lawfulness of lying!

Sheldon, I am happy to say, is not a man of the von Hoensbroech type. His efforts to prove that the Jesuits teach that the end justifies the means will be discussed in another paper, and also, space permitting, the mental gyrations of a major-general, a Georgia dominie, and a New York newspaper, on the same subject.

The Return of the King

MICHAEL WILLIAMS

EIGHTY years ago the King was dethroned, despoiled, and with his faithful ministers sent into exile. The royal palace fell into ruins; its looted treasures were scattered far and wide, save for a few precious objects which were hidden away and guarded by those who even then knew that the King would come again. A few loyal subjects lingered on near the palace; but one by one they died, or went like their Master into exile. Their houses and their lands, cattle and sheep and horses were seized by their enemies. Melancholy owls brooded and hooted in the shattered towers. Among the fallen walls the grass grew gently, as if trying to cover their nakedness and heal their wounds with green compassion. And underneath the ruins, lost and forgotten, lay the unmarked graves of those who had built the palace for their King, and there had served Him.

Wherefore I account it as a great and wonderful thing, as one of the chief adventures of an adventurous life, that only a few days ago I was privileged to be one of the throng which in the partially restored royal palace welcomed the King on His return. Throned upon gold and silver carved into the fairest of forms by ancient art, surrounded by reverent ministers clothed in purple and fine linen, borne amid lights and the fragrant smoke of frankincense, the King came back, and was lifted up above our heads bowed in loving homage and drew us all toward Him. All my days have I sought, and sometimes have I found, the trails of high romance, but never until this glad, golden day did I seem to come so near unto the King of all true romance, the King in all His beauty, and never have I known as then I knew that there is no power that can keep Him exiled from His own.

It was in the old Franciscan Mission of San Carlos de Borromeo, in Carmel-by-the-Sea, in California. Here for the first time in eighty years Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament was given, on Sunday afternoon, July 29, 1917, by the Reverend Raymond M. Mestres, the parish priest of Monterey. I think the date should be recorded, and held in memory. We live in a time of great events. Kingdoms and empires are changing and dissolving; the aspect of the world alters daily, nay, from hour to hour, like a dream. The drums and tramplings of unnumbered conquests thunder continuously; the air is thick with blows and cries; the earth is drenched in blood; and millions upon millions of the sorely stricken peoples cry, "How long, Oh, how long!" Would that it might be said of them that they cry out, "How long, O Lord, how long!" But that time is not yet. But when it comes the end will be near.

Yet even in such a time as this, surely the happening in Carmel's mission church was memorable, and wonderful and consoling. Founded in 1771 by the founder of California's civilization, Father Junipero Serra, that mighty hunter of souls, and during his life the headquarters of the vast missionary work of Spain in California, the mission at Carmelo was one of the first to feel the destructive effects of the iniquitous secularization. It was one of the first to fall into complete ruin and abandonment; for the reason that at Carmelo there was no civil town, no presidio of troops, nothing but a happy and peaceful and prospering settlement of Christian Indians, rescued from savagery and Satan by consecrated men who loved them as they loved themselves, for the sake of Christ. So when after Serra's death the blow fell, Carmelo quickly and utterly decayed and died. For more than fifty years it was desolate; the frequent sea-fog became its shroud, and not a veil of the sanctuary; its adobe walls were carted off to be made into roads; its baptismal fount, its tabernacle, its books and other sacred objects were seized as tourists' souvenirs, or made into garden ornaments. The King was gone. His enemies rejoiced. They thought that God was dead. Which was what they thought when He was carried to His tomb from Calvary.

But His friends were faithful. Somewhere, if not in Carmelo, they kept up His work; they remembered Him; they knew He would come back. His devoted ministers, the parish priests of Monterey, the two Spanish-born priests, Reverend Fathers Casanova and Mestres, both of them lovers of His ruined palace at Carmelo labored on, in the face of hostility, in the face of what is worse than hostility, indifference. And once again a roof kept the weather from the sanctuary where Serra had ministered to the King. Once again the mighty Sacrifice that is the supreme event of human affairs, the Holy Mass, was offered up in Carmelo; infrequently at first, it is true, but now every week at least. And on this blessed Sunday afternoon of which I speak the King came in His beauty, in royal processional, in golden garments, amid the incense and the lights, and the music of adoration, to bless His people once again, as in the olden days.

The monstrance in which He was uplifted to draw our hearts to Him was one saved from the spoilers. It had been given to Father Serra by Viceroy Bucareli, of Mexico, as the inscription sets forth. The cope that Father Mestres, the celebrant, wore, had also belonged to Father Serra. And the old church was packed to the doors. The Catholics, the servants of the King, had of course gathered from near and far; yet, even so, probably the greater number of that throng were not yet of the royal household, of the true allegiance. Wistful seekers, many of them; soul-hungry and soul-thirsty, like so many sad millions today. And surely the King, returning out of eighty years of exile, poured forth His grace abundantly.

Even so, it seems to me, is the return of the King to the world, far from Carmelo the fair. There is a symbol, a figure, to be discerned in most things, I believe. Surely, He cannot much longer be kept in exile. For eighty years, it is true, He was prevented from giving His Benediction in one of His palaces; but what are eighty years in His sight? And now He has returned. How happy were we that day! Heaven save me from pride as I remember that my little son carried the incense vessel and knelt with the consecrated ministers before the Throne—a page in the court of the King of Kings. As for me, I offer up these few poor words. Come, oh King, come to all our souls; come back to the torn and bleeding hearts of the desolate children of men. We drove Thee into exile, and denied Thy Kingship, but now, Oh, surely, now we will turn to Thee again!

The World of Sight and Other Senses

DANIEL A. LORD, S.J.

WE do not need the poets to tell us that the world is beautiful. Rather, the spirit which moves poets to symbolize human emotions in flowers and waterfalls, and the impulse which reproduces in marble and on canvas the loveliness of nature are merely the highest expression of an appreciation latent in the dullest hearts. Burns and Shelley, Claude and Turner were only the high priests who paid to nature the tribute which all men feel is its due.

And when tellers of fairy tales try to conjure up an enchanted paradise in which sleeps the bewitched and bewitching princess, they can do so only in words whose meaning is first known from sights and sounds and tastes and perfumes that reach our senses. The very wonders of the Apocalypse are the glorified splendors which the tangible world offers to our unceasing delight.

No one is silly enough to contest that we have not all these same sensations of beautiful objects and enchanting sounds and delicate scents. Without them, why patronize art galleries and symphony concerts and flower-shows? No more does anyone deny that we see toads and hear factory whistles and scent tanneries. But since the dawn of philosophy, men have fought over the causes of these sensations, and they are fighting over them to-day.

In broadest outline, the contestants fall into two classes: Those who, in accordance with common-sense, claim that there are real, solid objects outside of us corresponding to our sensations; and the Idealists who, in the face of experience, maintain that sensation is the product of the soul alone, because nothing exists outside of the soul which is thinking. Spirits, it is true, could act upon spirits; in fact every Catholic holds that they do so act. But not even the Idealist claims that spirit acting upon my spirit produces the sensations which we associate with the material universe. A spirit cannot do so, since it contains neither dimension nor colors nor sound nor taste nor any of the properties of matter. According to the Idealists it is my spirit which is so ordered by nature that, in the presence of other spirits, it produces for itself the sensations of color, sound, taste, hardness and softness, and the like.

By way of experiment in this spiritual view of matter, I thrust my finger into my shaving water which has been unexpectedly heated beyond boiling point. There is really no shaving water at all; my spirit, by its peculiar and uncontrollable tendency, produces in some way the sensation of a hot fluid object. Looking at my finger I really do not see it blistered; my spirit subjectively produces the impression of a very red and very throbbing digit. Like a hurt boy, I thrust my finger into my mouth, and the peculiar hot, boiled taste I experience is not the result of my finger acting on my palate; my spirit is alone responsible for the flat, disappointing sensation.

Put briefly, in the view of the Idealist, souls or spirits alone exist; matter, such as shaving water and burnt fingers, though they appear to be the object of sense, are just a degree less real than fairy godmothers and Februaries with thirty-one days. Our souls are mighty workshops which by their nature are so constructed as to produce constantly and uniformly the experiences we call sensations. Like spiders, we spin out of our own substance the world in which we live.

Recognizing the tremendous difficulties of this system, certain Idealists while denying the existence of any material, extended objects, hold that God acts directly on the soul producing thus the modifications which we call sensations.

If ever there was a dark-room, anti-common-sense philosophy, it is this denial of the whole sensible world. As a theory it is simply futile to explain as simple a fact as a falling brick or a scrambled egg, much less Urban's scenery or the Grand Canyon.

Our Idealist decides to visit the Chicago Art Institute to see Breton's "The Song of the Lark." He might, if the soul is the cause of all sensation, save himself the trouble of shaving his wholly spiritual face, and, reclining in his Morris chair, make his spirit produce the masterpiece. But, as a matter of fact, he is aware that a picture as it is really produced by his imagination in the quiet of his room differs from the original more completely than a twelfth carbon copy differs from the upper typewritten sheet, and at least as much as the original picture differs from a living peasant girl and a singing lark.

So he shaves, though shaving is an operation difficult to explain in spirits, and then takes a South Side "L" train—which is most annoyingly and unspiritually noisy to-day—to the Art Institute.

Now how does his soul as it was in his own room differ from his soul in the presence of the picture? If the picture itself is spiritual, it can help not one whit toward the production of the sensations which mark its presence. If his own soul is the cause of that delightful experience which he calls viewing a picture, why could not his soul produce the experience in any place except where the picture seems to be? Why must the enthusiastic student working near him in the gallery journey from San Francisco to see a picture which in all essentials his own soul produces? Why will "generations still unborn" experience this particular picture only where the picture hangs and in no place else? If there is no striking mass of colors and lines called "The Song of the Lark," if M. Breton simply fancied he dabbled in paint, if the Chicago Art Gallery bought something which really has no existence outside of the thinking mind, then certainly men have been playing a gigantic and decidedly exasperating game of make-believe.

We say that the beauty of children is often in the eyes of the parents; the Idealists go it a bit stronger and assert that children really have no faces at all.

A wedding couple travels long miles of rail to spend a few weeks in the Adirondacks where they fish for spiritual fish which they weigh in spiritual scales; climb diaphanous mountains in very tough—(I could pun on the "sole")—boots, and return home still dropping intangible rice from non-existing suitcases.

Before the tremendous act of creation achieved in the minds of this love-oblivious pair, God's act of creation becomes relatively the act of a careless child. According to the Idealists, not one tremendous being, but two very imperfect beings and with them all who were present in the Adirondacks produced the wonders of sight and sound that made their honeymoon a dream of joy. More than that; this same creation has been going on since the beginning of time. My mind produces the Rockies; it fills the heavens with stars; it stands with Shakespeare as the author of Hamlet; it is as much the composer of Lohengrin as was Wagner. If this be true, my whole internal consciousness is a continuous lie; for I never for a moment believe anything of the sort, nor can all the arguments from those of the Neoplatonist down through Fichte and Hegel to Mrs. Eddy ever convince me that it is true.

Columbus stands on the shores of America; and since, according to the Idealist, there is no reality but the thinking Ego or I, he not only discovers America, he manufactures it. One would like to know whether according to this theory the cells of the human body existed before the microscope discovered them, or the circulation of the blood, or the wonderful process of human generation, or the minute disease germs. If the reader of this article is convinced that it really exists outside of his mind and that I wrote it and not he, then Idealism would hardly be a working system of philosophy for him.

The theory which attributes to God directly the production of sensations without any reality to correspond to them does not in the least save the system. On the contrary it makes God the greatest deceiver, the most ridiculous scoffer conceivable. According to this theory, God impels us always to believe that we live in a material world, though it does not exist; and he forces us to act according to that belief. We can imagine the Greek Zeus in a fit of Olympic mirth causing some poor mortal to pursue gold which has no reality, to fly terror-stricken from a bull which his own spirit produces, to water non-existing flower gardens, and to sink peacefully into the imaginary shade of unreal trees. But to hold such a thing regarding the Christian God, as these Idealists do, is simply to make Him a senseless, brutal humorist who uses His creatures for His mirth.

The theory that there is no reality outside of the thinker is so impracticable that a celebrated German philosopher said of it that any man who tried to live according to it would shortly feel something in his brain snap. No amount of argument will convince the most confirmed Idealist that an erupting volcano can be mentally transfigured into a shower-bath. No man would be fool enough to boast to his friends that his mind produced "Intolerance" or composed "Traviata." The best an Idealist can do is use an intangible pen to write books which others will produce as they read them, or from professors' chairs teach bodiless classes in words which are the product of the hearers' spirits. On the same principle, possibly bewildered reader, the bursting shell does not bring about a crumbling fortress; the crumbling fortress produces the bursting shell.

As a youth I remember stumbling over a trick problem in algebra which proved conclusively that after all four equals five. Now four never could equal five, I reasoned; yet there was the proof clear against me. After fruitless effort I carried the problem to a professor of mathematics. He glanced at it casually, and then laid his finger on a certain equation. "There's the flaw," he said; "at that point you begin to multiply zeros. A person can prove anything if he multiplies zeros." And all the arguments of the Idealists are simply a multiplication of zeros.

"Dora," Then and Now

A. L. Binns

THE first time I met "Dora" was when I had been out some days from, well, it was somewhere between an American port on the Atlantic seaboard and a British port. Dora is susceptible about names, and prefers that they should be hinted at rather than spoken outright. But, anyway, Dora caused a notice to be circulated round the ship, to the effect that no one would be allowed to take gold coin through the British ports. And, furthermore, that an excise officer would appropriate all the gold coin there might be among us, and give us in exchange sundry pieces of paper, that crackled with a pleasing, opulent sound, and testified that they were legal tender for the payment of any amount.

There was hardly any gold worth mentioning, but Dora made us all give up what little we had, and we received the pieces of paper in exchange. Then, when we were actually in the British port, Dora came forward with another suggestion. She made us sit around until we were called, one by one, before the Aliens Officer, and the Aliens Officer, with impartiality to the British and the non-British alike, looked hard at us; he compared the wart on the left ear with the wart on the uncomplimentary passport photograph; asked what size boots we generally wore, and what sort of play the "Giants were putting up." After that we thought we had done with Dora: but we hadn't.

She let off the women and the old men to catch their trains, or to be embraced by affectionate, if impatient, relatives on the dock. But the young men; the chubby and callow ones; the not so chubby nor so callow, and the men of forty-one, who ought to have known better than to have owned to such an awkward age; these Dora could picture in her mind's eye as very appropriately carrying a rifle, and with free board and lodging, clothes and pocket money provided by a grateful country. So, she incontinently marched them off behind a soldier man, and the soldier man forthwith introduced them in the presence of the military officers, and what the military officers said was something about there being a war on. After that, Dora left us alone—for a time.

The next time I met Dora was in London. It is horrid to say so inelegant a thing about a lady, but Dora simply "butted in." It was in a restaurant. The handmaiden approached, and after deftly stowing away a lead pencil somewhere in her back hair, she unbent sufficiently to show some interest in the proceedings.

"Steak and kidney pudding, yes," she said, by way of repetition, "potatoes and cabbage, yes; roll and butter, yes; apple pie and ice cream—oh, well, you can't have all that."

"I can't have all what?"

"Why, you can't have the apple pie and the ice cream. Have a stick of chocolate, or a piece of cake, or a bun."

"But I don't want a stick of chocolate, nor a piece of cake, nor a bun!"

"Well, I'm sorry, but you can't have the other."

"Why can't I have it?"

"It costs too much. You see you are not allowed to spend more than one shilling and threepence on your lunch, and all that comes to quite two shillings."

"And why mustn't I spend more than one shilling and threepence on my lunch?"

"It's the regulation; it's—it's Dora." . . .

It was Dora. That same Dora who interferes with our lunches, who forbids us to spend more than sixpence on our tea, and says that such a sum entitles us to two ounces of bread or cake, and no more. Dora, who makes us eat war bread, and cuts us down on the sugar.

The next encounter with Dora took place outside a hotel near the Strand, where they hang out a large card, on which the American and British flags are entwined, and thirsty Allies and friendly neutrals are informed that American drinks, including cocktails, may be obtained within. It was on the side of the street opposite to the hotel, close to the backyard of Eagle Hut, where the American Y. M. C. A. has its quarters, where the Stars and Stripes were fluttering in the breeze that was blowing up from the river, that I came across a friend of earlier days. He was training for the Protestant ministry then; now his raiment indicates that he is actively engaged in carrying a gospel into Germany on the point of a bayonet. It was early forenoon, and the placard on the opposite side of the street was alluring. So I invited him to cross over and try the American drinks, including cocktails.

"Oh, we can't do that," he said, quite simply.

"And why can't we?"

"For the simple reason that the 'pubs' are allowed to be open only between twelve and half-past two, and from six to half-past nine." "And," he continued, "even if they were open, you couldn't buy me a drink. Don't you know that treating isn't allowed now? That you would be fined or imprisoned, and so should I, and the barkeeper too for serving us?"

"Who told you all that?" was the feeble rejoinder.

"Nobody told me all that," he said. "It's the regulations. Don't you understand? It's Dora."

After that there was no more to be said, and we wandered off to the nearest American soda fountain.

But Dora follows you everywhere. You may be sitting by the happy fireside, meditating on the advisability of changing your lodgings before the coming of the next full moon and the air-raid season, when a thundering knock is heard at the front door. When the door is opened a pugnacious policeman is discovered in the entry, who protests in a tone of virtuous indignation: "Shade that light in there, and pull the blind down or I'll pull you in!" And the advice is meekly followed, because of Dora. Or you buy a railway ticket, and find that fifty per cent has been added to the price printed on the ticket. It is Dora.

At the railway stations there are notices printed in English, French and Flemish, warning soldiers and sailors and civilians not to discuss military affairs before strangers. That's Dora! She puts out more than half the street lamps and darkens the streets at night. And when you stub your nose against a brick wall in the dark or become intimately acquainted with the gutter, you waste no time or words on profane swearing, you just say. "Dora!"

She has her own ideas on art and decoration: they are atrocious. And she spends whole days going up and down the town with a paste bucket and a bill-sticker's brush. Under the window in Whitehall through which King Charles I passed to his execution, she has plastered up sheaves of posters, exhorting the British and the stranger within their gates to eat less bread. On the sacred and virginal walls of government buildings she invites stokers to join the navy, extolling the munificence of the pay and the esthetic values of the free kit. Around the plinths of Cleopatra's Needle and the two Sphinx, or is it Sphinxes?, she yells at every passer-by that 100 cartridges may be purchased for fifteen shillings and sixpence; the inference being that you will invest this sum in war certificates.

She has, however, done one very excellent thing. She has found at last a use for the many statues of Victorian celebrities that adorn London. These worthies still stand erect as in the days of peace, smirking and supercilious, in the approved Victorian manner, with their awkward Prince Alberts and their side whiskers like Anglican bishops. And on the pedestal below is a multitude of posters urging the purchase of national war bonds. Poor Victorians, that they should have come down so low as the advertising business! For Dora has no reverence for tradition, nor respect for respectability; and they were the sum of Victorian virtue.

But she has her good points. As you sit grumbling at the Government and uncomfortable in the cellar, or repine querulously beneath the protection of the stairs, while the German aeroplanes are buzzing a mile or so up in the air, and the countless guns of London's air defenses are thundering through the night and crumpling up the raiders with shrapnel, it is Dora you have to thank for your life as you emerge from these cheerless retreats when the "all clear" signal goes. And if you should happen to be hit by a flying bullet or a piece of shell, there is an ambulance not far away, with doctors and nurses in attendance. And it is Dora who puts them there.

She is inexplicable, incomprehensible. At one moment she saves your life from the terror by night; at the next her hand explores the uttermost reaches of your pocket. Her years are as the years of a tender child; yet is she the mother of millions. Kings and capitalists hearken unto her; yet will she condescend to stand between the working man and his beer. For she is called "Dora," and her name is the "Defense of the Realm Act."

Dr. Walsh and Darwinism

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In AMERICA of Oct. 20, Dr. James J. Walsh, in an article entitled "Teaching and Proselytism" uses this expression: "When Darwinism and the descent of man from the monkey, which has now been entirely abandoned and never had a foothold in serious science, were in vogue," etc. Is not this rather loose language to use in criticising a man (Huxley) who was always so precise in the use of English and in the statement of facts? The expression, "the descent of man from the monkey," had its place chiefly among the humorists, writers for religious periodicals and supplements for Sunday newspapers, and it is still in vogue. It never had a place in "serious science."

That the body of man has been developed through evolutionary processes from lower creatures, not the monkey, has had a place in serious science, and still holds that place in the teaching of the majority of biologic scientists at present. Many of them, for example, G. Stanley Hall, the greatest teacher of teachers in this country for some years back, hold that the human mind is also the product of evolutionary development.

The term "Darwinism" means natural selection or the survival and perpetuation of those living things best adapted to the conditions of life in which they exist; it assumes that no two living things are exactly alike, and that continuous variations in a particular direction may so change the organism that in time it may appear entirely unlike its original ancestors. This conception of development has had a place in "serious science," and has not "been entirely abandoned."

In recent years the original conception of Darwin has been, in a measure, displaced by "the more recent form of Darwinism termed mutation by DeVries" (Osborn), but discovered by Mendel. According to this more recent conception, the changes from the original form are sudden and complete and the new forms always breed true. The new forms are often feeble, and they may survive or not in competition with the old forms or other competing living things, and here comes into play the old law of natural selection. The majority of biologists at this time probably hold this conception, but there are those who still cling to the old theory of Lamarck, that use or exercise modifies structures in the line of greater efficiency, as did the late Professor Cope. And there are those who, like Professor Osborn, have theories of their own.

A reviewer of Professor Osborn's recent book says: "We know that plants and animals and man 'evolve'; we know to some extent how they evolve; we do not know why they evolve." I think this is an accurate statement of thought on this subject among the serious biologic scientists of the present time.

"We do not know why they evolve!" While the serious scientists are patiently and laboriously working on the problem, as they are, why cannot we forego the pleasure of sneering at them and say it is God's way of development and He directs the energy?

D. W. HARRINGTON, M. D.

Milwaukee.

[To avoid misunderstanding it seems necessary to remark that, in the present state of the evidence, it is temerarious to believe that man's body was evolved from a lower form, and no Catholic may believe that the human mind is a product of evolutionary development.—ED. AMERICA.]

Mr. Hoover's Meatless Day

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A suggestion has been made, and may be carried into effect, that Tuesday be declared a meatless day in all hotels and restaurants throughout the country. Why Tuesday instead of Friday? Catholics are already deprived of meat on the latter day, and should another day of abstinence fall in the same week, many people will suffer real hardship. Moreover, many non-Catholics regularly forego meat on Friday, and I have been informed that many army officers have also requested that this same day be meatless, in their camps. If this were drawn to the attention of the active and prudent Mr. Hoover, perhaps he would see to it that Friday instead of Tuesday be named the day of abstinence.

Catholics and White Slavery

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A few weeks ago, through the courtesy of the editor, I protested in these columns against the toleration and indifference of so-called Catholics towards the traffic in innocent girls, and urged that, since our pulpits and dollars can be lent to such causes as the conservation of food, the Knights of Columbus, Red Cross, etc., they might still better be devoted to the far more crying need of the suppression of that vice.

Whereupon, the Rev. Paul L. Blakely rises up in great agitation, declaring, among other fallacies, that "talk is cheap and ineffective," which he demonstrates in three columns of verbiage, and refutes my argument by affirming, as all Catholics must, the efficacy of prayer; admits that this vile traffic has existed since the earliest ages, and that theologians (more shame to them) have known all about it; denies the "conspiracy of silence" exposed by earnest and Christian workers who speak with undoubted authority, and then declares that the results of investigations have only been obtainable within the last ten years. Like many people who have no right on their side, he resorts to the lowest form of argument, if argument it can be called at all, personal abuse, calling me, albeit in Latin, an ass.

I do not object, however, to being called an ass by the reverend writer since the ass has shown himself, at times, to be anything but an ass, and bears on his back the emblem of Christ for the services rendered to Him and His Mother. May I just remind Father Blakely, however, that on one occasion an ass was chosen by the Almighty to confound a bigger ass, and suggest that, no doubt, history is again repeating itself, as is its wont?

In order to prove that Catholics are not indifferent to the traffic in children, for most of the victims range from twelve to sixteen years of age, Father Blakely points to the churches.

the confessionals, and the Magdalen asylums, with true clerical irrelevance. No Catholic, as I said above, denies the efficacy of prayer, but we all know, or ought to know, that "Faith without works is dead," and that unless good works go hand in hand with prayer, then our prayers are merely hypocrisy. According to Father Blakely's illogic, we are to let all offenders against society and morality go scot free, pursue their nefarious work unimpeded, while we sit back and pray for them. What chaos would result!

As to the confessionals, they are not frequented by professional procurers of women, and, though they could be made very useful if priests would insist there on some practical work being done to hinder the evil doer and protect the innocent, as long as the clergy hold Father Blakely's views they will not influence their penitents very much to ardent action.

As to Magdalen asylums: as monuments to a double standard of morality they are to be deplored, and have been deplored by a large-minded member of the Society to which Father Blakely belongs, in an eloquent sermon at the Cathedral some time ago, in which he rightly declared that they should be for men not for women. And what a misnomer, since Mary Magdalen donned no garb of penance, but returned a welcome member to the bosom of her family, where she was our Lord's honored hostess. How, may I ask my reverend critic, do these purely female penitentiaries prevent human monsters from outraging little girls?

I feel sure, in spite of the reverend gentleman's heated effusion, nay, rather because of it, that all true Catholics will agree on the advisability of rousing, through our press, our pulpits, and our schools, that invulnerable weapon, public opinion, against the greatest evil in the world. Let us join with our more energetic non-Catholic brethren in placing every obstacle in the way of the offender, and though we cannot convert him by legislation, we can, at any rate, do much towards protecting the innocent and making his nefarious work practically impossible. In England, after years of struggle, flogging was introduced as the penalty for white slavery, with the result that the foreign procurer fled the country. Why should agitation not be started here for the enforcement of a similar penalty, and the same result would probably be achieved, though, personally, I would prefer to see the death penalty also added. Let the clergy teach respect for women and a single standard of morality from their pulpits, confessionals, and schools, and let parents and teachers forewarn and forearm the children under their care, that the heartrending cry, "Why did no one ever tell me?" may not resound so often from Catholic lips. When some practical and energetic work has been done in these directions, then Father Blakely can better take up the cudgels in defense of Catholic action. Then he will be better equipped to embark upon an argument to which, at present, he has shown himself to be so unequal.

New York. C. CONNOLLY.

[Of course, I never said anything so foolish, as "we are to let all offenders go scot free, pursue their nefarious work unimpeded, while we sit back and pray for them." On the contrary, I stated clearly that "the rod must be laid mightily from time to time across the back of flaunting iniquity." To say that legislation cannot do all, has never been held equivalent to saying that it can do nothing. And it is a direct misquotation to write, "Father Blakely . . . declares that the results of investigations have only been obtainable within the last ten years." "Complete information on its current features," I wrote, "has always been accessible." Nor have I any quarrel with societies aiming to lessen the social evil, provided they are "in conformity with the mind of the Church." These societies, I said, "should and generally do, receive the hearty cooperation of Catholics." If they are not in conformity with the mind of the Church, it ought to be fairly plain that they cannot "receive the hearty cooperation of Catholics," or any other kind of formal cooperation.

But it is pure deception to hold that the social evil can be cured, or that there can be in any real sense a "reconstruction" of the soul that has gone astray, without supernatural religion as the beginning, middle and end, of the process. That was the point of my criticism, a point which C. Connolly has persistently evaded. In the fight against any moral evil, an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure and a ton of punishment. To train our boys and girls in truly Catholic homes, and in our parochial schools, to the very highest ideals of purity, made attainable by prayer and the Sacraments, is preventive work, infinitely more important and effective in the battle against evil, than the best efforts of able legislative committees and social hygiene societies. That is the work which we Catholics must do, and do well, because we alone are able to do it. To bring the girl who has gone astray to a sense of sin, without which there can be no repentance—and hence no "reconstruction"—is the only way, as far as Catholic theology knows, of drawing her from the old life, and of setting her feet once more in the paths of peace and purity. This is the work which goes on day by day in the Houses of the Good Shepherd, homes C. Connolly considers deplorable as "monuments to a double standard of morality" and as "purely female penitentiaries."

"Let the clergy teach respect for women and a single standard of morality, from their pulpits, confessionals and schools," advises this exemplary Catholic. Have they ever done otherwise? "A Catholic our critic may be, but not a Catholic in touch with Catholic tradition and Catholic practise," I wrote, and C. Connolly's letter confirms that judgment as well as my opinion that he is an equus asinus. I may add that both apply with almost equal force to the mythical Jesuit, who from the pulpit of St. Patrick's Cathedral, deplored the Houses of the Good Shepherd, institutions conducted by a religious congregation approved by the Church, as "monuments to a double standard of morality." P. L. B.]

Strange Catholics Indeed.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Like Mr. McGrath (AMERICA, September 29) I have wondered why if it be Catholic, France has turned its Government over to Socialists who boast of an earnest attempt to destroy the Church.

Mr. Woodlock (AMERICA, October 27) makes a valuable contribution to the discussion in reproducing the apology of the Bishop of Nice which summed up tends to show that the French are better Socialists than Catholics in that "without being at the bottom of their hearts irreligious, they have struck hands with the open enemies of religion, in aid of political institutions and scientific or philosophic theories to which . . . Catholics were opposed." That they reform when facing danger of death is not peculiar to Frenchmen.

In comparing French and German Catholics the good Bishop and his worthy translator lose sight of the fact that German Catholics are a minority under an autocratic Government while French Catholics are a majority in a Democratic Government, where there is no such thing as "minority rule." The inquiry might be extended to other so-called "Catholic countries" as Portugal, Mexico, Italy, and little Uruguay which has adopted a Constitution which provides for the confiscation of the property of the Church.

What kind of religious education have these Catholics received? What is their attitude towards the Church, an attitude which allows them to strike "hands with the open enemies of religion"?

The Pope and Peace

WRITING in the pages of a New York review, a Methodist clergyman, the Rev. Elmer T. Clark, attempts to outline the attitude of the Holy Father towards the nations now engaged in war. Dr. Clark's views on the scope and limits of Papal authority, and on the Temporal Power, are not particularly illuminating; but he writes in a kindly spirit, far removed from the bitterness which, in the efforts of the Holy Father for peace, professed to see only the selfish ambitions of a potentate, lustful of power and heedless of justice. To all acquainted either with the spirit that throughout the centuries has guided the Roman Pontiffs in their office as representatives of the Prince of Peace, or with the all-embracing charity of the present occupant of the Throne of the Fisherman, the petty spite that in some quarters met the Peace Note of Benedict XV, was little short of revolting. While it can hardly be said that Dr. Clark is in complete harmony with the Holy Father, nevertheless he recognizes that "the Pope has been able to exert an influence for great good; . . . and as far as he has been able to go, he has really earned the gratitude of mankind."

Confronted as we are, and as are the citizens of all the belligerent nations, with our own needs and interests, we may not always clearly see the larger motives which must ultimately dominate. Of the justice of our cause we are certain; the means by which that justice is to be made manifest are in the hands of the Government, to which, as Americans and as Catholics, we pledge our complete devotion. Our Faith is the securest guarantee of our loyalty. But the Holy Father is the Father of all; as a father he must counsel, and if need be, as a father he must rebuke. Nor can he be removed from this position by the accusations of his enemies who allege his very neutrality as proof of his bias.

One cannot escape the conviction, writes Dr. Clark, that these enemies have been unfair to the Pope. They have been actuated too largely by a desire to have him on their side. . . . Those who accuse the Pope . . . of desiring the defeat of the Allies are doing him a great injustice . . . his enemies are so biased that neutrality appears to them as a bias in the other direction, so far are they removed from its position.

Whatever may emanate from Benedict XV, Vicar of Christ, will be filled with the spirit of Christ's charity. No intrigue will prompt it, no self-seeking urge it. Of that, the world, Catholic and non-Catholic, is assured.

Bishop Beaven and Holy Cross

TIME runs quickly and touches some men lightly with a fairy wand, as if to remind them that God has thrown around them a mantle of protection in order to preserve them happy and whole-souled for the accomplishment of a great task. So it has been with Bishop Beaven of Springfield, Mass. Twenty-five years past this October 18, he went away from the altar of St. Michael's Cathedral, vested with the fulness of the priesthood, a Bishop of the Church. On that day he grasped the handle of the plow, long held firm in his priestly hands, firmer, and has since driven the blade deep into many an acre before untilled. By their fruits his labors can be judged. No man within the limits of the diocese of Springfield need die "unshriven, unhouseled and unanealed." There are priests in abundance to attend to every need and duty. The sigh of the aged, the moan of the sick, the cry of the orphan and foundling are softened by gentle care in unexcelled institutions, and 30,000 children learn to know and love God in innumerable parish schools. The diocese is a veritable city of God, and through it moves a gentle man distinguished from others, not by pomp of power or show of authority, but by sweetness of word and cheeriness of laugh, the Bishop to whom so much is due.

It is no wonder that even Rome, the city of a thousand and one ecclesiastical perplexities, stopped a moment to honor Bishop Beaven. By special Brief the Holy Father appointed him Assistant at the Pontifical Throne, telling him, amongst other things, that the Mexican Bishops had filled the ears of the Holy City with accounts of his superb charity to their unfortunate countrymen in the hour of their greatest distress. The Pope moreover sent Bishop Beaven a special message of congratulation, and the illustrious Archbishop Ceretti, Assistant Secretary of State, also paid his tribute of praise and felicitation, while from Switzerland came a letter from the General of the Jesuits, thanking His Lordship of Springfield for his great benefactions to Holy Cross, Worcester, Mass.

These gifts are the reason why that citadel of learning, set proudly on St. James Hill, participated in a special manner in the jubilee celebration. Bishop Beaven is its alumnus, friend, benefactor. And the college in honoring him honored itself and added to its greatness by its loyal tribute to a man whose benefactions place him among its founders.

Into Beaven Hall, that tops the hill north of Linden Avenue, the Bishop has built his reverence for Holy Cross, his zeal for higher education, his love for Christ, and Holy Cross is grateful and showed its gratitude as best it could by its splendid part in the jubilee celebration. This is as it should be, and none will rejoice more over it than Holy Cross men who, scattered far and wide throughout the world, are manfully upholding the college traditions. And in the hearts of those who are not of the household of Holy Cross but yet gave to it the best years of their lives, was heard an echo of the college joy, as they stood, one morning not long since, at the altar and held aloft the Lamb of God in prayer that His blessing might descend on Bishop Beaven.

Time is still pursuing its winged flight toward eternity, but it will yet be merciful to this good and great man and leave his face unseamed and his heart young and warm and joyful, so that many, many years hence, when the angels come to lift him aloft to the Father in Heaven, where the light of God's face will be on his brow and the music of golden harps in his heart, he will still be young with the youth that scorns care and sorrow, and knows only the joyousness of the Saints.

Why Anarchists Are

SOME months ago an industrial city in Illinois witnessed a riot that for ferocity and sheer savagery has probably never been equaled. It is now fairly clear that the underlying cause of that frightfulness is to be found in the iniquitous conditions, for which, of course, no one is responsible, prevailing in the "labor market." The phrase has an ominous sound. It connotes a slave trade, and marts of human flesh. The reality is not far from the connotation, for an investigation, ordered by the last Congress, has reported conditions well nigh unbelievable. Rarely has the attitude of certain American "captains of industry" been stated with such accuracy as in this paragraph of testimony printed in the Chicago Tribune for October 23:

> John W. Paton, general manager of the Morris & Co. packing plants, said his plants had a wage scale.
> "Yes," said Congressman Cooper, "you have a scale and Swift has a scale, and Armour has a scale, and they are all the same. You think that is right, and in your judgment the laboring man has no right to agree as to a minimum wage."
> "Well," replied Mr. Paton, "this is a free country, and every man has a right to sell his labor at any price he sees fit."

The root of our industrial troubles, which given time and proper attention will certainly issue in revolution, is indicated by the general manager with cynical clearness. Every man has the right, founded not on charity or condescension, but on strict justice, to be protected in his demand for a living wage in return for his honest labor. He has a right to bargain freely, on equal terms, without pressure or intimidation, for the price he is to receive for his work. If oppression, moral or physical, enters in; if he is thus obliged to choose between a pittance and starvation, because he can obtain nothing better, he has made no "contract," but has become, in the words of Leo XIII, a victim of fraud and injustice.

Anything less than a living wage means discontented workers, and a lowering of economic efficiency which finds its last stage in national bankruptcy. But it means far more than this. The bitterness engendered of wage-slavery ultimately means a radical reaction against that authority in Church and State which, mistakenly, is held responsible for the oppression. That bitterness is the reason why anarchists are. Meanwhile Catholic employers of labor will do well to remember that to defraud the laborer of his wages is a crime that cries to heaven for vengeance. That cry most assuredly is heard, and not infrequently the retributive scourge of an angry God is felt even in this world.

The Simple Life

A PRIEST died in Milwaukee the other day, Father Leo Lyons, S.J. On the day of his funeral, probably even his religious brethren marveled at the crowd which thronged the great Church. Nuns and Brothers, working men and members of the learned professions, college students, and particularly many children whose dark eyes and olive cheeks betokened a foreign parentage, gathered about his rude coffin. In the sanctuary sat the Archbishop, and in his presence and that of many priests, the Rector of Marquette University offered the Holy Sacrifice. It was a tribute from many hearts that would have done honor to a dignitary of the State, to a Prince of the Church. Father Lyons was neither. He was only a humble priest, one who had put aside all that to which his strong character and undoubted talents might have raised him, to devote himself to the simple life. A man without guile, offending none but winning all by his genuine, unaffected kindness, an especial lover of the little ones of the flock, so fearfully exposed in our large cities, he had led a life which deserved to the full, the spontaneous outpouring of affection that marked its untimely close.

Men like Father Lyons bring home to us, who entangle ourselves with many strange and unnecessary cares, the fundamental fact that life, in the designs of Almighty God, is simple. It does not greatly matter whether we are rich or poor, learned or ignorant, of importance in the eyes of the world, or despised by the few who know us. The only thing worth working for is our daily approach to Christ, along the line of simple duties. Success, or what measured by human standards, seems success, is not essential, but only a sincere good-will. Few mortals can bear worldly greatness; for the vast majority, the one road to God is that which His Son sanctified, the road of the Holy Cross. And there is encouragement in the recollection of this lowly, sacrificing man. Thanks be to God, there are many like him; unassuming, undistinguished, but centers of active benevolence. We find them in the cloister and in the world. We recognize that same spirit in the nun who watches before the Most Holy, free from all human ties, and in the patient mother, who after the weary day, stills the cries of the little one on her breast; in boys and girls at school, bending over their books; in the monk whose life is work and prayer; in the day-laborer, who amid bitter trials strives to bring up his children in the fear of God; in the priest who carries the Name of the Crucified Christ to nations that sit in darkness; in the loyal Catholic layman, whose life is the Church's most telling answer to the attacks of her defamers; in the sick, the poor, the afflicted, whose cheerful acceptance of suffering rises before the throne of God as the prayer of the suffering Christ on Calvary, to plead for the sins of a world grown weary in iniquity. Out of many hearts, in truth, for our encouragement is revealed the beauty of the simple life, the life of humble duties, made great by the love of God and man, which is its soul.

The Gifted Rich Man

"IF a rich man can manage to stand on two legs for a reasonable time, it is called self-control. If he has only one leg, it is called (with some truth) self-sacrifice." That is a characteristic remark made by Mr. Gilbert K. Chesterton in his recent volume "Utopia of Usurers." Filled with a noble rage at the degradation with which art and letters are threatened by those who devote high talents to making "haloes for employers," he scornfully observes that nowadays artists work "not only to please the rich but also to increase their riches." As a case in point he instances Sir John Millais's well-known "Bubbles" which was painted to confer everlasting renown on a certain kind of soap. In illustration of the present-day debasement of literature, he asserts that gifted writers are "employed to praise a big business man personally, as men used to praise a king," and to describe "a capitalist's brain of steel and heart of gold" in a fashion formerly used only when romantic historical characters were the authors' theme.

Mr. Chesterton of course is showing the way that English capitalists are toadied to by men of genius. But conditions on this side the Atlantic are quite similar except that American "efficiency" has reduced the worship of the rich to a more perfect system owing to our press agents' "unrivaled enterprise" and our "leading papers'" wide circulation. When aged members of the "oleaginous oligarchy," for example, play a game of golf, the smiles that wreath their faces, if a good shot is made, are described with great literary skill. When a Midas-like banker makes a successful catch of fish on the Florida coast, how soon the news is chronicled, with many a picturesque detail, in the New York press. What rare wit, too, invariably sparkles in a rich man's jests. How gracefully he always wears his coat, how fair his daughters are, how queenly is the bearing of his wife, what an eloquent appeal for the widows of trainmen his gifted son can make, how prettily his little children are pictured in the Sunday supplement, and finally what original and striking views on every question of the day, from prohibition to the existence of hell, all the members of the rich man's family are always ready to give. Thus do press-agents and our leading papers keep us supplied with full information regarding the astonishing success with which their rich employers "stand on two legs."

The Open Fire

THE last quarter century has seen the gradual extinction of a once flourishing profession. Though lacking an Elia to place him among the immortals, the grate-pointer has now taken his place with Charles Lamb's delightful chimney-sweep. In all its voluminous lists of occupations, the Census Department knows nothing of him; and how many of the present generation have so much as heard his name? Yet time was when he ranked with the peripatetic scissors-grinder, the Ethiopian carpet-sweeper, with Stevenson's lamp-lighter, as a person of consideration in the child's world. True, he lacked the mighty brawn, the flail-like blow of the care-free carpet-sweeper, whose club, as an artist's brush, made dead colors live again; nor could he, like the scissors-grinder, call forth a stream of rippling, musical flame from dull steel, or with the lamp-lighter, league himself with the stars to fight the spirit of darkness. Nor were his visits frequent. He came just before the sumac burned red, to make all ready for the anticipated lighting of the fire, in which, when the wind sang in the chimney, childish eyes would feast on golden pageants, withheld from prosaic age. Humble though he was, his was the hand that built the stage for all the fairies, and mountains, and glowing dells, and giants, and princesses, and whatsoever marvels bring gladness to the heart of a child.

There are no open fires to-day, but at best only base imitations contrived for noxious gases, and vibrations from stubby dynamos. Open fires mean homes, for only in homes is there room for them, and for children who, in the memory of older men, gather around them. Our urban population grows ominously large, and in "flats," towering apartments, and boarding-houses, city-dwellers find only a semblance of what an earlier generation understood by "home." No longer do the flickering shadows leap and dance upon the wall. The glowing coals have fallen into ash, and the grate is cold; as cold as life without faith and love, and the soul that has forgotten God.

Literature

AGNES AND EGERTON CASTLE

THIS excellent pair of collaborators present to our eyes a very attractive picture. From their home on an almost Italianate hillside of sunny Surrey, they let their imaginations endow the simplicity of their garden with the riches of the world. Into this sentimental garden of romance have come the problems of the outside world, the pressing needs of a nation at war. But, for all the quiet of their life of charm, there is a glamour of unreality about the place, a light from far-off lands, the glimmer of drawn swords in the moonlight and the flare of red velvet doublets in bright sunshine. Their mission has been to rouse the world. "If youth but knew, if age could care"; this might be the motto of Agnes and Egerton Castle. And in their novels of whatever type, they have tried to rouse youth to the splendid adventure of life and to the necessity for playing hard and fighting clean, to charm age into caring for the things worth while. "Your young men shall dream dreams, and your old men shall see visions." These novels are the adventurous dreams and visions of Agnes and Egerton Castle.

We must never forget that the latter was one of the best swordsmen of England, and that his first book was on "Schools and Masters of Fence," for the Castles have written of a time when side-arms were freely used by gentlemen on the field of honor, although to be sure Jennico and Wroth, expert swordsmen as Mr. Castle himself, meet defeat in their most important duels. But Wroth shows his fondness for the steel by wounding a handful of men who have been over-polite to the lady he loves. The opening story of "My Merry Rockhurst" (1907) is characteristic. Rockhurst, exiled with King Charles at Bruges, out of funds and out of food, goes foraging among the burghers, who will give no more credit, and comes back with an excellent supper in a market-basket. He has worked the miracle, he says, by a laugh, a lie, a fight and a kiss. The fight came first, with an amorous Spaniard; the kiss last, from a kindly burgher's wife; the lie was later expounded to the burgher himself, and the laugh was on the lips of Rockhurst and the King as they sat down to the unaccustomed meal.

There is romance in these titles: "The Pride of Jennico" (1898) and the healthy humiliation of Captain Basil; the strength and the weakness of a wild but good-hearted lord in "Wroth" (1907); the mad marriage of Lord Malden in "Wind's Will" and the conquest of love; a fantastic variation of the Enoch Arden story in "The Rose of the World" (1905); brave deeds and dark plots, swashbuckling and flirting, hard riding and fierce loving, picturesque unreality and comedy, farce and tragedy. In their latest book, "Wolf-Lure" (Appleton), the appeal is essentially dramatic: we have therein the contrast of characters in the same days depicted in "Wind's Will," those following the Revolution and the Napoleonic era. Most charming of all is the character of an aristocratic young girl who has to combat, not only the ideas of liberty, then wildly raging about, but also the materialism of a reckless young fellow who typifies unrestrained individual liberty. Naturally love and romance, justice and the idealism of the old régime conquer in the end.

However, perhaps the most characteristic portrait of Agnes and Egerton Castle is to be found in their book, "Our Sentimental Garden" (1914), nicely got up in nice type with nice illustrations as a nice Christmas gift for nice people. It is a collection of quaint phrases put together with the evenness with which the hours follow one another on a summer's day, telling of charming things which happened both in their Surrey garden and out of it. There is Loki, the Pekingese pup, heir of all the dignity of the Manchus, there are the hyacinths, the forget-me-nots, the tulips, the strictly English clipped yew hedge. And then there is the pleasant spirit of the place which we envy the Castle's for enjoying until we realize that they have written this book to make it ours. Yet there came upon the face of Europe a war, the war of the nations, and the sentimental garden had to be described all over again as "A Little House in Wartime" (1916). The servants go off to join the fighters, the women engage in Red Cross meetings and "war work," the "blue-coat boys," who are soldiers in hospital, lean against the yew hedge; the Belgian refugees come with tales of tragedy and woe. The happiness of old is still present; but it is supplemented by a sober seriousness and a grander view of people, and things, and conditions. The war has transformed the home.

"Oh, how happy we might be, if only——"

And so we begin to catch some idea that the viewpoint and the life of Agnes and Egerton Castle are not all light and romantic, that there is deep feeling and earnest thought behind it all, that they ponder over the problems of the world as all thinking people should. For it so happens that their conceptions are not limited. In fact, their adventurous books and their serious books remind us of their own conception as represented in "The Star Dreamer." In the times of George III, a period of powder and lace, of patches and sashes, they tell of an old castle tower where an aged alchemist and distiller of herbs labors deep under ground, while his young nephew is continually looking at the heavens from the battlements above. We find this thorough seriousness in two of their novels of modern life. In "The Haunted Heart" (1915) there is a great love which by a rare mistake is transformed into a great hate. The story begins with a broken marriage bond. It requires a man with the interest of a friend and the understanding of a priest to reunite the impetuous but shaken hunter of lions and the loving but deceived and broken-hearted wife. Even he could not have accomplished the reunion had not there been the powerful force of a true love running as a strong undercurrent beneath all the shows, hypocrisies and fooleries. And in "The Hope of the House" (1915) there is a similar strong sincerity brought out among some Welsh people when in the face of the present war a boy becomes a man, a girl becomes a woman, a refugee learns to be more than merely grateful. There is little romance to it; it is more nearly a problem novel.

Thus we begin to see clearly where we saw before but darkly. Love is not mere romance, romance no longer solely adventure, adventure not only a ride, a fight, and a kiss. They are all, in modern life or in the so-called historical novel, simply phases of the great purpose of life, the quest of truth and the accomplishment of justice, poetic or otherwise. In their novel, "If Youth but Knew," they have represented how, one sunset hour up in the mountains, an old wandering musician with a deeply tragic past meets a young man strangely blind to the glory of his years. "He undertakes to teach this young man to be young; to relish the fragrance of adventure, to hear the music of young love, to know, in short, the beauty of this world before its colors begin to fade in the eyes of age. And the young man under this influence leaves the high road of everyday life and becomes drawn into romance."

This is the mission of these Catholic novelists, Agnes and Egerton Castle: to bring truth and beauty into a simple garden, to raise the hearts of the world, to bring things of eternal worth home to the business and bosoms of men, to institute, if you please, a new Quest of the Grail as a great Sacrament. Were we to follow our ordinary occupations in this spirit the world would be improved; life itself would become adventure; life itself would become romance. Yet that should be, perhaps, a pity, for there then would be no more need of our reading their splendid books and their stirring tales. FRANCIS PAUL.

REVIEWS

Ballads of Peace and War. By MICHAEL EARLS, S.J. Worcester, Mass.: Harrigan Press, Inc. Cloth, Illustrated, $1; Paper, $0.50.

The opening notes in this attractively printed little volume of poetry are those of war. "His Light" tells in well-chosen words how the call to arms parted two lovers. It ends:

Gray mist in her eyes
And the night coming down:
He feels a prayer
From a far town.

He goes the sea-ways,
The land lights are dim,
She and an altar light
Keep watch for him.

There is a fine lyric movement both in "The Young Adventurers" and "Old Hudson Rovers," and the martial imagery of "The Bonnie Prince of Spring" and "War in the North" is admirably sustained. Father Earls is felicitous, as a rule, when he sings of flowers and trees. He beholds with a Catholic poet's discerning eye "A Winter Minster," which many will doubtless consider the best poem in the volume. We read, for example, how

The dutiful monastic oak
In his gray-friar cloak
Keeps penitential ways
And solemn visions of praise;
For beads upon the cincture wine
Red berries, warm with color, shine,
And to their constant rosary
The bedesmen firs incline.

Some of the author's verses for children would appeal to them no less, perhaps, if the lines were a little more musical. "My Father's Tunes" is the best of the poems in dialect, and the following stanzas on "The Happy Time" show another aspect of this poet's muse:

Two gloomy scenes may be,
Or count you three:
A budding hope all crushed at morn,
A bridal day in clouds of rain,
And night that keeps a mother's pain
For tidings of a child forlorn.

Of happy times count more,
Admit these four:
A flower of promise rich with day
Two loves espoused in sunny air,
A son with victories that wear
A halo on his mother's way:
And friends whose hearts ring like a chime
Across the world at Christmas time.

Very Rev. Charles Hyacinth McKenna, O.P., P.G., Missionary and Apostle of the Holy Name Society. By VERY REV. V. F. O'DANIEL, O.P., S.T.M. New York: The Holy Name Bureau, 871 Lexington Avenue. $2.00.

One of the notable accomplishments during the present generation for the preservation and spread of the Faith in our country has been the wide and solid development of that admirable lay-confraternity, the Holy Name Society. Much of this is due to the zeal and unceasing energy of the lamented Dominican missionary whose lifework is sympathetically told in this volume by a fellow friar who enjoyed the privilege of long and intimate association with him. It was Father McKenna, who, in 1896, secured the dispensation from the restrictions of the Clementine Constitution that has since permitted the establishment of the Holy Name and Rosary confraternities in more than one parish of a diocese. He is justly called the "Apostle of the Holy Name Society." He was strongly adverse to seeing it or the Rosary confraternity turned from their strictly religious object to begging or benevolent purposes. To divert them from their special religious aim, he held, lowered their further high spiritual plane and lessened their efficacy. Father McKenna had also a burning zeal for fostering vocations to the priesthood. He was instrumental in giving to the ministry more than 200 worthy and useful priests during the forty years he devoted to this work. This zeal perhaps was stimulated by the remembrance of the obstacles he had to overcome before he attained the spiritual goal of his own ambition. In the boyhood passed in his native Derry he knew hardship and privation. In 1851, when he came to the United States, he was sixteen years old, and he spent most of the eight following years till he became a Dominican novice in hard toil as a laborer and stone cutter. But this experience was only part of the ripening process of his dominant traits of Christian simplicity and sweetness, ordained by Divine Providence for the splendid apostolic harvest of his later years. In writing of Father McKenna's success as a preacher of parish missions, his biographer seems to lay such special stress on those given during the period 1866-1870 that an incautious reader might imagine that these parish missions were an innovation. Mission history, of course, shows that this period followed the extraordinary results of the mission tours, begun in 1851 by the Redemptorist Fathers, Hecker, Baker and their associates, later and better known perhaps in their similar efforts as members of the new Paulist Community. There were then also the Jesuit missionaries Damen, Smarius, Weninger and their companions whose pulpit triumphs old folk still love to tell about, and those simple, winning men Fathers Anthony, Albinus, Stanislaus, Gaudentius, and others of the first Italian Passionists. All were generous rivals in constant effort to promote the glory of God and the salvation of souls. It might be noted also that the name of the third Bishop of Newark was not "Wiggers" (pp. 298-299), and that Mgr. Burke will have a genuine surprise in reading that Father McKenna said he "had the pleasure of giving a mission for colored people in his church in Baxter Street" (p. 113). T. F. M.

These Many Years. Recollections of a New Yorker. By BRANDER MATTHEWS. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.00.

In the opening chapter of this entertaining autobiography by the Professor of Dramatic Literature at Columbia, he remarks that "What the gentle reader demands is that the autobiographer shall so talk about himself as to make his interest in his personal theme more or less contagious." The author has on the whole succeeded in doing this. Mr. Matthews was born in New Orleans in 1852, and is of Massachusetts-Virginia parentage. His father was a wealthy merchant who intended that his only son should have nothing to do but spend money. The panic of 1873, however, left the Matthews in very moderate circumstances, so the author having enjoyed in his youth the advantages of being a rich man's son, in later life had to fend for himself, which, as he acknowledges, was an excellent thing for him. When five years old Mr. Matthews had an audience with Pope Pius IX which he remembers quite distinctly, and after a course at various private schools, entered Columbia in 1868 when the sum-total of the undergraduates was only 120. In referring to the late Father Henry Van Rensselaer, who belonged to his class, Mr. Matthews remarks that that well-known priest was at one time a Paulist Father. But we have no record of "Father Van" ever belonging to that Congregation.

After graduating from the "Dwight" Law School, Mr. Matthews, who has always been very fond of the theater, began to try his hand at play-writing and from then till now he has been closely identified with the doings of stage-folk and the literature of the drama. He was for years among the New York Nation's book reviewers, was one of the few Americans whose contributions were welcomed by the Editor of the Saturday Review in its halcyon days, and he is the author of numerous books of essays bearing on literature and the drama.

"These Many Years" is full of interesting anecdotes and reminiscences about the notable men and women the author has met and the historic scenes he has witnessed. There is the diverting story, for instance, of the English clergyman who was "inclined to believe that that man Lincoln must have been the most remarkable nigger that ever lived," and of Andrew Lang's unsigned review of the "Encyclopedia Britannica," in which he severely criticized one of his own contributions because it lacked certain facts that had subsequently come to his knowledge. Mr. Matthews' chapter, entitled "Among the Players," contains some particularly interesting pages which describe the finest moments he associates with the names of the great actors he has seen, and remarks in passing that he has attended "almost everything that was worth seeing in the theaters of New York," between 1865 and 1915. A Journal from Our Legations in Belgium. By HUGH GIBSON, Secretary of the American Legation in Brussels. Illustrated from photographs. Garden City, N. Y.: Doubleday, Page & Co. $2.50.

"I see some forty years from now that people will be saying: 'I don't want to let Old Man Gibson get hold of me and tell me all about the war of 1914!'" genially remarks the author of this highly interesting book. But if his reminiscences will then be at all like this diary, Mr. Gibson will never lack eager listeners. This book, moreover, will always be of great historical value, because being a neutral diplomat constantly in close communication with both Belgians and Germans, he gives an accurate first-hand account of what happened during the early months of the war. Mr. Gibson was allowed to pass several times between Brussels and Antwerp after the German occupation of the capital, had frequent interviews with King Albert and his Ministers, as with the generals of the invading army, saw Antwerp bombarded and evacuated, visited Louvain while it was burning and passed through Malines, Dinant, etc., shortly before and again not long after the Germans had wreaked vengeance on them. The author writes with great restraint about the pitiful sights he witnessed, and relieves the somber character of his narrative by little personal touches that make the journal fascinating reading. It is clear from this book that without such devoted and efficient Americans as Mr. Whitlock, Mr. Gibson and Mr. Hoover, the suffering caused by the German invasion would have been much greater than it was. The book is finely illustrated. W. D.

Canada the Spellbinder. By LILIAN WHITING. With Many Illustrations in Color and Monotone. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $2.50.

This book shows Canada to be all we should expect from the title. Placed alongside a nation such as ours with a world-wide reputation for its natural beauty, unlimited resources, astounding internal development and progress in commerce, science and art, the natural beauty and development of Canada are apt to be given comparatively scant recognition. Miss Whiting's book by its vivid description of Canada's mountains, lakes, rivers, parks and resorts, by its brief enumeration of Canada's potentialities and development in agriculture, mining, commerce and education, will go far to lift the mist of false impression which has veiled the eyes of those who have never seen our "neighbor of the north," or have at most enjoyed merely a summer glimpse of the St. Lawrence River, the Thousand Islands and the lower fringe of Canada. A brief biographical chapter in the early part of the book, which sketches rapidly the life and accomplishments of the successive individuals who by untiring efforts helped to make Canada what it is today, has the immediate advantage of awakening the interest of the reader in the descriptive chapters which follow. Those, however, who are familiar with the early days of Canada may complain that many worthies are left without their just measure of honor and recognition. The interspersing of appropriate quotations from poetry and prose authors, the brief narration of local incidents, the many references to the heroic efforts of Canada in the present war, the writer's power of vivid narration and description are some of the effective means used successfully to sustain the interest of the reader. Miss Whiting's system of paragraph unity, however, fails at times to pass the test of precise criticism, and many will disagree with her philosophical tenets. F. E. L.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The current Catholic Mind is a domestic happiness number. It begins with Father Fisher's paper on "The Evil of Drunkenness," in which he shows what moral and economic havoc that vice causes in the home, and he then suggests ways of conquering the weakness. Next comes Father Dwight's description of "The Reconciliationists," another new Order, more practical in its character than the Niobites, for the members devote themselves to promoting the permanent continuation of honeymoons. The third paper is Father Stritch's searching investigation of "What Menaces the Family," and the number ends with Archbishop Glennon's satisfying explanation of "Why Catholic Schools Exist." The perusal of the November 8 Catholic Mind should help solve many a domestic problem.

These were the six best-selling novels of September: "The Red Planet," Locke; "Christine," Cholmondeley; "Martie the Unconquered," Norris; "Beyond," Galsworthy; "The Soul of a Bishop," Wells, and "The Long Lane's Turning," Rives. The only ones hitherto unreviewed in AMERICA are the fourth and sixth. "Beyond" is a pernicious sex-novel that will do nothing but harm, and "The Long Way's Turning" is a melodramatic temperance story written on conventional lines.——"Running Free" (Scribner's, $1.35), which is the title of James B. Connolly's latest volume of sea stories, deals for the most part with the adventures of Jack ashore. In "The Bull Fight" the author gives this infallible recipe for making oneself understood while in a Latin-American port: "Wave both hands, stick an O onto every other word and yell like a bo'son's mate in the morning watch." "A Bale of Blankets," which brings out well the everyday heroism of a naval officer's life, is perhaps the best of the ten stories in the book. This is the eleventh volume of tales Mr. Connolly has written.

The October Catholic Historical Review is a particularly interesting number. Dr. Herbert F. Wright tells about the controversy between Grotius and DeLaet regarding the origin of the American Indians. Gaillard Hunt calls attention to the striking resemblance the opening paragraphs of the Virginia Declaration of Rights have to passages in Cardinal Bellarmine's works and shows how Mason was indebted to him for the matter in the preamble to that document, and how Jefferson began the Declaration of Independence with similar propositions. Dr. Julius Klein then reviews the part played by "The Church in Spanish American History," and William Stetson Merrill, A.B., comments upon all the books by Catholic authors which were published in the American Colonies prior to 1784. "V. F. O'D." reproduces the letter of instruction Archbishop Hughes, on going as American envoy to France during the Civil War, received from Secretary of State Seward, and among the book reviews is an excellent examination of Dr. Ford's "The Scotch-Irish in America."

The main effect of books such as Upton Sinclair's "King Coal" (Macmillan, $1.50) is to make a perfectly correct thesis rather doubtful in the eyes of many. When one is free to invent his own facts, arguments are at hand to prove whatever the author wishes. Mr. Sinclair professes to write a novel; he can hardly complain if it is accepted as fiction. The best part of the book is the lengthy citation from a decision of the Supreme Court of Colorado, an act which is rightly regarded as the first step to the restoration of republican government in that corporation-ridden State.——There is little to commend and much to condemn in "The Dwelling Place of Light" (Macmillan, $1.60), by Winston Churchill. The book is not without a certain insight into the industrial unrest of the country, but the only remedy, in the author's view, is a parlor I. W. W. doctrine. To one who does not believe that to those who love God all things work together unto ultimate good, life must be unmixed bitterness, and Mr. Churchill has long been unable to recognize anything like Divine Providence. One thing only is more hopeless than an amateur sociologist, and that is an amateur theologian. Careless of his gifts as a teller of tales, of late years Mr. Churchill has ambitioned both roles.

The "Baubles" (Dodd, Mead, $1.25), which Carolyn Wells jingles at her muse and Oliver Herford illustrates, are made up of some very clever, and some rather flat, little satires on social and literary foibles. "To Omar" is an excellent parody on "Father O'Flynn," "The Overworked Elocutionist" skilfully brings in every old "piece" that the little red schoolhouse once heard so often. The way the different poets who belong to "The Order of the Literati" would describe a cubist picture is consummate parody, and the author's stanzas on "How to Tell the Wild Animals" give unmistakable information, but unhappily it comes too late to be of the greatest value. For instance, we are told:

Or if some time when roaming round,
A noble wild beast greets you,
With black stripes on a yellow ground,
Just notice if he eats you.
This simple rule may help you learn
The Bengal tiger to discern.

If strolling forth, a beast you view,
Whose hide with spots is peppered;
As soon as he has lept on you,
You'll know it is the leopard.
'Twill do no good to roar with pain,
He'll only lep and lep again.

After twenty-five years, Jane Barlow's "Irish Idylls" (Dodd, Mead, $2.00), that old group of charming Irish stories, returns decked out in a new coat and new trimmings, these latter being the plentiful pictures made by Clifton Johnson; and, whether due to the matter, made up of characters and incidents, or to the form, the exquisite skill of the author, the book renews the literary pleasure which it created a quarter of a century ago. Reading again these intimate pictures and dramas out of the quaint lives of the Connemara folk, the thrilling sentence out of Vergil again leaps to the lips, as if sufficient commentary upon the impression which these stories give: "Sunt lacrimae rerum." Tears, true enough, yet not of sadness; rather of loving sympathy. For the formula of these lives is not made up of mere temporalities, it runs to farther horizons; without bread at times, they still have a food which can keep the heart from the dark thoughts of anarchy, the cloud upon other parts of the world; and without wide learning in letters, they have a philosophy which is healthier than the atmosphere about many universities. Jane Barlow brought intimate knowledge and deep sympathy to her work, and a craftsmanship, akin to Jane Austen's and Maria Edgeworth's, marks this classic from her pen.

Is not the making of anthologies being overdone? There has been hardly enough good poetry written about the present conflict to justify the publication of George Herbert Clarke's "A Treasury of War Poetry" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.25). Most of the "imperishable" selections in his book have already been quoted in AMERICA, but the following sonnet, entitled "The Volunteer," by Herbert Asquith, perhaps deserves the same distinction:

Here lies a clerk who half his life had spent
Toiling at ledgers in a city gray,
Thinking that so his days would drift away
With no lance broken in life's tournament:
Yet ever 'twixt the books and his bright eyes
The gleaming eagles of the legions came,
And horsemen, charging under phantom skies,
Went thundering past beneath the oriflamme.
And now those waiting dreams are satisfied;
From twilight to the halls of dawn he went;
His lance is broken; but he lies content
With that high hour, in which he lived and died.
And falling thus he wants no recompense,
Who found his battle in the last resort;
Nor needs he any hearse to bear him hence,
Who goes to join the men of Agincourt.

Patriots who are eager to help our soldiers win the war can put their money to no better use, perhaps, than providing for the distribution throughout the American army of the excellent booklet entitled "The Honor Legion," which Francis P. Schiavone has written, Cardinal Farley has approved, the New York Social Hygiene Society of 105 West Fortieth Street, New York, has published, and the Chaplains' Aid Association of 580 Fifth Avenue, New York, is ready to spread far and wide. The author proves conclusively that absolute continence is the only effective safeguard against venereal diseases that make a man worthless as a soldier and a menace to his comrades and relatives. Our young warriors are then told why their country, their fellow-soldiers, their mothers and their wives or sweethearts, expect them to keep continent, and finally they are taught what spiritual helps they have at their disposal, if fortunately they are Catholics, which will keep them staunch members of "The Honor Legion." Along with the foregoing pamphlet might be distributed to Catholic soldiers such excellent little prayer books as "On Active Service," by F. Bertrand Pike, O. P., or "A Simple Prayer Book for Soldiers," both of which are published by the Catholic Truth Society, Bergen Street, Brooklyn. There are other similar prayer books for soldiers which have already been noticed in AMERICA and which can be had at the Chaplains' Aid Association.

Busy women who aim to keep their minds lifted up to heavenly desires amid their work will like the following "Housewife's Prayer," one of the poems in Miss Blanche M. Kelly's "The Valley of Vision" (Encyclopedia Press, $0.75).

Lady, who with tender ward
Didst keep the house of Christ the Lord,
Who didst set forth the bread and wine
Before the Living Wheat and Vine,
Reverently didst make the bed
Whereon was laid the holy Head
That such a cruel pillow prest
For our behoof, on Calvary's crest;
Be beside me while I go
About my labors to and fro.
Speed the wheel and speed the loom,
Guide the needle and the broom.
Make my bread rise sweet and light,
Make my cheese come foamy white,
Yellow may my butter be
As cowslips blowing on the lea.
Homely though my tasks, and small,
Be beside me at them all.
Then when I shall stand to face
Jesu in the judgment place.
To me thy gracious help afford.
Who art the Handmaid of the Lord.

EDUCATION

Education and Loyalty

AS boys in a Catholic college, we lived and breathed a Catholic atmosphere. On all subjects of Catholic belief and Catholic interests, professors and students alike studied, thought and talked in unity. We felt that we were united with the Church; her friends were our friends; her opponents, our enemies. Nor were we in any sense a lethargic or indifferent group, for we had resolved to make the battle of the Church in the cause of righteousness, our own. Hence, whenever a Catholic, or a Catholic principle, came into prominence, we shared in the triumph, and whenever the Church, or her principles, was insulted, we felt it as a personal affront. Day by day we were carefully trained, not only in the fundamentals of Catholic belief, but in Catholic apologetics. In a word, the ideal kept before us was an uncompromising allegiance to the Church and all her interests.

Some Catholic Societies

AT the end of the course, we left college with Catholic minds, Catholic hearts, and Catholic ideas of life. In our simplicity most of us, possibly all of us, expected to find in our future surroundings men who lived, thought, and occasion demanding, fought according to Catholic ideals. Unfortunately our hopes, mine at least, were destined for the impact of a rude jolt. It was not long before we found ourselves at the marge of a "river of doubt"; not long before our philosophy, together with our ideals, was thrown, to change the figure, into a "Babel of confusion."

At the outset, I sought membership in several societies which, I thought, were wholly and exclusively interested in the welfare of the Church. It was a discouraging and disheartening experience to find that most of the members were interested not so much in measures as in men, not so much in principles as in politics. At the election of officers, the meeting was "a full house"; when the time came to consider how some attack on the Church might be met, only a few would be present. At a boxing-match or at a dance, a tremendous "turn out" was assured; at an interesting and instructive lecture, a corporal's guard was on hand. Too often in the elections, a hot campaign would be waged, not in behalf of the best men, but of the most "popular" men, the "good mixers"; not for the best equipped, but for the best known men, and this in spite of their obvious inability to defend the Catholic cause. In the ordinary meetings it was common to listen to animated discussions on useless, trivial, purely local matters, and to meet with apathy in regard to the great modern subjects of vital importance in Church and State.

In Public Life

IN public life, the same state of affairs was noticeable. On one occasion, a man of unusual ability, and an exemplary Catholic, was defeated in his race for a State office. Many of us felt the defeat keenly. True, we had not voted for him simply because he was a Catholic, but because we had felt him to be easily the best man for the place, and hence, to many the result was bitter. On consultation with "our brothers in the Faith," we were astonished to learn that perhaps the majority had voted against this Catholic gentleman. It may be well to mention that the successful candidate has carried into public life, the un-Catholic principles that marked him as a private citizen. Then came the horrors of Mexico, involving not merely persecution of Bishops, priests and nuns, which was bad enough, but a diabolical campaign against the very idea of God and of religion. Our anger was intense; we swore vengeance on the enemies of Christ. Strange to say, however, many of our Catholic friends had not even heard of the persecutions in Mexico. How could they, since they rarely if ever read a Catholic magazine? Worse, others who knew the facts, or some of them, did their best in public and in private to "whitewash" the men who were not merely striving to destroy the Catholic Church, but with it civilization itself.

"Prominent" Catholics

STILL, our old ideals, brought with us from college, were not entirely overthrown. Perhaps, we thought, our young enthusiasm is at fault; our perspective is only a mirage. Others, older than we, know better. We lived in hope, and lived long enough to see in a certain great city, a campaign which not only slandered the Church and her institutions, but insulted the nuns, priests and Brothers, connected with these institutions. At last, we thought, a chance to go to the firing line! We rolled up our figurative sleeves, we outlined our plans in letters to the newspapers, to public officials, to societies; we marched forth prepared to do and die! But something went wrong; we found that we were the advance guard; but there was no rear-guard. Before we had marched far, we saw that the campaign was not going to be popular. Perhaps the majority of our Catholic people had either never heard of this attack on the Church, or, knowing of it, were by no means minded to advance to the defense of the Church. They were too old to be confessors, too young to be martyrs. To say anything, to do anything, in defense of the Church, would be to "play politics." A few thoughtful ones among the laity named seven "prominent Catholics," a term that is fast becoming a synonym for "indifferent Catholics," who, if they wished, could put an end to the attack on the Church in twenty-four hours. But they did not so "wish." That would have meant some little trouble, some loss of popularity with individuals whose good will was not in reality worth cultivating. Worse, it might have meant the loss of some financial chance. Hence, those who desired to say anything, do anything, in behalf of the Church, were either "peanut politicians" or common agitators.

Alas, and again alas for our early inspirations, our youthful aspirations, our bright young enthusiasm! They had begun to fade, and they faded yet more when in private conversation we found so many "coreligionists" who forever delighted in petty criticisms of Bishop, priests, the diocese, the religious Orders, the Church; so many who though "educated" and "cultured," in the common acceptation of these terms, possessed neither Catholic intelligence nor Catholic loyalty.

"Cultured" Catholics

FOR some time I have been thinking on the problem why we young Catholic graduates should differ so much from these coreligionists of ours. I think I have found the answer. The difference is due to our Catholic education. That education alone gives birth to Catholic loyalty.

Catholic loyalty means a constant, zealous feeling with, and thinking with the Church and with all that the Church represents. It is a blood-relationship with the Church, the channel which runs directly to the Catholic heart. It works for Christ, with Christ, in Christ. It works for His Church and for her principles. It labors to win heaven to earth and earth for heaven. It knows that the real soul of progress is the progress of the human soul to God. All this, it seems to me, is the natural fruit of a truly Catholic education. A non-Catholic education may make a "bright" Catholic, but it does not usually make a loyal Catholic, because it engenders, if it does not directly inculcate, coldness and indifference towards the things which Catholics regard as sacred. Among our most "cultured" Catholics are some who boast their allegiance to non-Catholic schools. Experience will show, I think, that these precisely are the men who can never be depended upon to defend the Church. The reason is plain. They are Catholics, but in no sense are they loyal Catholics. Their educational experiences have made loyalty almost an impossibility.

If we Catholics hope to accomplish anything worth while, if we wish to keep Catholics true to Catholic principles, even when in public office, if we wish a zealous, united laity, instead of a laity indifferent or divided, and a Catholic body which instead of wasting time in petty quarrels, pushes forward in strong constructive work, we must omit no means of arousing and preserving a sense of loyalty to all things Catholic among our young people. That loyalty, it seems to me, is the first fruit of a true Catholic education.

ECONOMICS

The Respectability of Socialism

INDIVIDUALS and organizations that have been enemies of Socialism because they believed it to be the greatest religious, economic and political evil, are now beginning to "see something good" in it, according to their notion of what Socialism is. We are told, day after day, of the adoption of the methods imagined to be in accord with the aims of Socialism. Recently a Catholic organ that has subjected Socialism to many fervid attacks, went so far as to state its recognition of the good features of Socialism, and to aver their general acceptance by the nations at war, and ventured the quasi-prophecy that it might be the coming ascendant political party. But, of course it would be necessary to delete from its platform of principles the statement that religious organizations were but the reflex of the coexisting economic world!

CONFISCATION BY SOCIETY

IT seems to be the common belief that some bits of Socialism have been put in practice, and to the advantage of the States that have supposedly adopted them. Germany, for example, limits profits; England takes what war profits she dares, but leaves enough to encourage the greatest production, and the United States has followed the British idea. If any governmental taxation be considered confiscation, and it is so regarded by some, then it is true that there has been a great advance in Socialism, not towards Socialism. For Socialism, in the economic view, is simply confiscation by society of the present socially valuable wealth, which wealth, Socialists hold, belongs rightfully to the workers.

It would no doubt be agreed that any confiscation of wealth by the State, followed by its use in productive enterprises, is Socialistic. Many Socialists will contend that the slaves were confiscated from their owners, and say that the morality of the act was not questioned by Church or State. But as the Government did not appropriate them, their freeing was not Socialistic, nor was it such an act as is generally understood by the term "confiscation," except as an argument to support the righteousness of taking without due compensation. For it is held by adherents of Socialism that when the taking was justified, the matter of appropriation by the taker does not affect the nature of the act. Likewise, liquor is often confiscated by governmental authorities, but it is generally, if not invariably, supposed to be destroyed. However, such confiscation is not of the nature that comes to mind when we consider Socialism.

TAXATION AND SOCIALISM

CAN even excessive taxation bring about Socialism? Not if the workers pay the tax; not if the amount of the tax is made a charge in the cost of production; not if the owner is left in possession and control of his property; not if he is left any profit—not if any of these subjunctives is a fact. Of course, if the State buys and operates an industry, or makes use of it under proper compensation, that is not Socialism, nor Socialistic.

Do the workers pay the tax? They do, if it does not come out of the capital. If, no matter how high the rate of taxation, private capital increases in quantity and in value, in bulk and in price, it is clear that capital is not charged with the cost of government. If the greater the rate of taxation, the faster the increase in capital, it must be the workers who pay the tax.

According to authentic press reports, "in the opinion of Government officials," capital in private ownership has increased in Great Britain from $80,000,000,000 to $100,000,000,000 since the war began. Thus we have it that during a period of the highest rate of taxation, capital has increased faster than ever before. The reason is that no part of capital is available for consumption, even in war, and at the same time industries must be extended; the greater the expenditure, the greater the tax, the greater the quantity of capital; and the value of capital must tend to increase faster than its quantity, because the construction and utilization of capital represents a drain on natural resources. That is, it lessens by so much the quantity of natural wealth, thereby requiring excessive labor and excessive price for the production of new capital. But all capital tends to approximate its replacement value. Thus all preexisting capital tends to have value greater than it would, if new capital did not increase in cost. It would therefore seem that the value of the wealth of a nation is no basis for the floating of loans within the country, since the only wealth available for consumption is the annual product; and the greater the increase in capital (not the efficiency of capital), the less goods available for consumption. Capital represents goods saved, goods not consumed.

Can there be any other deduction than that the workers pay the tax? If they do pay it, excessive taxation cannot bring about Socialism, but most emphatically tends to enhance private capital.

PRICE-FIXING

BUT is it not Socialistic to regulate the price at which the farmer must sell his wheat? Yes; if he is forced to sell at a price that does not allow him a profit. It is claimed, however, that the price of $2.20 a bushel represents a profit to the farmer of 100 per cent. The farmer's complaint is that others are permitted to make more. Such regulation of prices is not Socialism. Socialism, as all Socialists know, means the abolition of profit, by means of the social ownership of the means of production and distribution. But such capital cannot be bought by the State, for the State owns nothing with which to purchase it. True, the State could issue bonds to pay for capital, but the real owners of the industry would be the owners of the bonds. Government bonds would bear a lower rate of interest, but the investment would be secure though the industry were a failure.

Perhaps the capitalist is attempting, with seeming success, to flatter the Socialist into a state of self-satisfaction, that he may "put something over" on him, and on the rest of society. The big capitalist would like nothing better than to have the Government take over his ownership in the railroads of the country; his interests would then be resolved into bonds that are better than money, to remain put or to be transferred to other industries as he saw fit. But that is not Socialism.

THE FIRST STEP?

BUT Russia is experimenting with Socialism! If the owners will not be paid for properties that are used by the Government, that is true. Certainly all property has not been so taken, and it remains to be seen whether they can take any if they do not take all. It is reported that the owners of commodities refuse to accept even the money of the Government for their goods.

Where, then, has the first step towards Socialism been taken? Not where it is represented to be in the present newspaper propaganda. The Socialist organ, the Call, in its issue of October 1, 1917, indicates the growing respectability of Socialism in these words: "It is now the exception, not the rule, to find a single exchange that does not editorialize on Socialism. Today (Monday), for example, there is not a single one of the great

New York dailies that does not contain a reference to it, mostly editorial reference. And the day before (Sunday) most of them gave, not columns, but pages, to the subject." Maybe even the Call is deceived, and thinks it is possible to attempt the first step towards Socialism and yet avoid a revolution compared to which the present war is but a skirmish.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Catholic Conferences for Local Workers

A SERIES of conferences for Catholic social workers was recently inaugurated at the Convent of the Cenacle, New York. The movement will probably spread to the other cities and be productive of much good. The purpose of these meetings is thus announced: (1) To promote God's glory in the field of social service, and personal spiritual welfare, (2) to discuss social problems of the day from the Catholic viewpoint, (3) to show forth visibly the spirit of charity among ourselves, among our fellow Catholics, and among all forces working for the betterment of mankind. Each Conference will be preceded by a "Reception" and followed by a "Round Table Discussion." For the present year four Conferences have been arranged, the first of which, under the direction of the Rev. Joseph A. Mulry, S.J., President of Fordham University, took place on October 28. At the next meeting, January 27, 1918, the Right Reverend Patrick J. Hayes, D.D., Auxiliary Bishop of New York, will give the Conference, and the Rev. Paul L. Blakely, S.J., Associate Editor of AMERICA, will preside at the "Round Table." At succeeding meetings on April 28 and June 9, the leaders will be the Rev. Dr. Wiliam J. Kerby, professor of Sociology at the Catholic University, and the Rev. Thomas J. Lynch, General Supervisor of Correction Work for Catholics, New York.

The Lure of the Uniform

IT is no exaggeration, but a serious and timely warning, when the Christian Herald calls the attention of parents and of the public in general to the danger of losing sight of the welfare of our girls. Any stain upon the potential motherhood of this land will make of this war a sad defeat for our nation, no matter what brilliant victories we may win upon the fields of battle.

> "The lure of the uniform" has spread its net for the unwary feet of our untaught girls, and they are being swept from their moorings by the hundreds, aye, by the thousands; and the mother's boys, who should also be protected from these dangers, are being hurled into the vortex.
> The camps of the guards are everywhere; the soldier in his artistic uniform is on every street. In traveling several hundred miles recently, scores of these camps came under my observation. Scarcely one was passed where groups of girls of high-school age were not seen standing about at a greater or less distance, inviting attention or chatting on familiar terms with the men. Parents were, for the most part, apathetic or ignorant of the danger. Only a few serious-minded, experienced men and women were terrorized as they realized the inevitable aftermath.

That aftermath is already manifesting itself in the most hideous forms. Parents who are negligent in this matter may well take to heart the sober warning: "Remember that both the boy and girl are at the danger age, the years of stress and storm, with undeveloped judgment; that the girl is swayed by the glamor of that which bids fair to prove the 'yellow peril' to many, the lure of the uniform and the romance of war service is in her eyes." The boy, no less than the girl is to be protected by those in authority, lest he cross the Rubicon of a woman's purity and of his own honor. Catholic soldier boys must not permit the bars of a sacred respect for woman's virtue to be lowered ever so slightly nor permit themselves the least liberties in this regard. It means the beginning of the ruin of their own self-respect, no less than their loss of reverence for womankind.

The Pronunciation of "Cantonment"

THREE men in conversation will probably give three different pronunciations of the word "cantonment." The word is a good example of the vagaries of English pronunciation. President Wilson, according to the Chicago Tribune, and Mr. Baker, the Secretary of War, say "can-t'n-m'nt," accenting the first syllable; but the other War Department officials are wedded to "can-tone-ment," with the accent on the second, "because they got started that way, and can't stop, although they know it is not the preferred pronunciation." The professor of English at Princeton holds out vigorously for "can-tonnment," accenting the second syllable, and giving it the "short o" sound as in "bond."

> The President and Secretary Baker are supported by the Century, Webster's, Worcester's, and Fernald's 1917 revision of the comprehensive Standard dictionary, while Sir James A. H. Murray's new English dictionary, and the Imperial and Stormouth's dictionary side with Dr. Hunt.

As for "can-tone-ment," no dictionary is so poor as to do it reverence. Popular usage may ultimately justify this pronunciation, for, according to the Tribune, fully one-half of the government officials at Washington employ it, and the custom will probably spread.

Bishop Schrembs on Vocations

IN his introduction to the official year book of the Toledo diocese, Bishop Schrembs deals in particular with the important question of priestly and religious vocations. There has been a total increase of 173 religious in the diocese of Toledo during the past six years, and a corresponding increase in the number of seminarians and priests. This has made possible the opening of sixteen new parishes and twenty new parochial schools. Referring to the religious sisterhoods, he rightly says that without them this growth had been impossible. "Whatever our own earnest zeal, without our Sisters there would be few Catholic schools and fewer institutions of charity for the care of every form of human sorrow and suffering." Notwithstanding the considerable increase in the working forces of the diocese, he finds that there is still greater need of priests, and especially of Sisters. After solemnly calling upon families, parishes and priests, to pray for vocations, he continues:

> But besides prayer we must do our own personal share to stir up and foster vocations. Let us not hesitate to extend the invitation to the priesthood or the religious state to our young people. Is it not a fact that almost all who are now priests or Sisters, look back with grateful recollection to some holy and zealous confessor, or kind and solicitous pastor, or yet some noble devoted teacher in school, or a good, pious and disinterested mother or father, who first directed their youthful enthusiasm to the higher and the better way?
> How sad to think that there are to be found even among seemingly good and faithful souls those who actually discourage priestly and religious vocations, or who insist on very extraordinary and long drawn out tests of vocation. Still more sad to say, there are some who take upon themselves the terrible responsibility of turning souls away from ther vocation, thus blighting lives that might have been filled with holiest enthusiasm and rendered productive of wonderful fruits. Then there are those who wilfully shut their ears to the divine call, because of some human affection or engrossing ambition. By sheer worldliness they crush out the powerful movement of divine grace in their hearts and still forever the sweet small voice that called from within— "Come, follow me."

He then adds the intensely sad and powerful words of the great Cardinal Newman, describing those who die without fulfilling their mission, who were called to worship Christ but plunge instead into the giddy, unbelieving world, and ending with that mighty plaint: "Alas for those who have had gifts and talents, and have not used, or misused or abused them! The world goes on from age to age, but the Holy Angels and Blessed Saints are always crying, alas, alas, and wo, wo, over the loss of vocations, and the disappointment of hopes, and the scorning of God's love, and the ruin of souls."

Mobilizing the Students' Mission Crusade

AN elegant and comprehensive bulletin has been issued by the student bureau of the Catholic Students' Mission Crusade. It is devoted entirely to the discussion of the important practical questions connected with this movement. The mobilization of a student army for the great world-mission crusade is the purpose in view. All can take active part in this campaign of winning the world for Christ. Here are the propositions made by the bureau to the students of every Catholic college, seminary, convent, academy and university, and to all Catholic students in secular institutions of higher learning:

> (1) That they take immediate steps for the organization, in their respective institution or department thereof, of a mission society, with membership open to all the students of the institution or department. (2) That all these societies, without relinquishing their special aims, be confederated under one mighty crusade having as object the propagation of the Faith at home and abroad, and the ultimate enthronement of the Sacred Heart of Jesus over the hearts of all men. (3) That this crusade be launched under the auspices of the Sacred Heart of Jesus and adopt for its watchword and battle-cry: "The Sacred Heart for the world, and the world for the Sacred Heart." (4) The Bureau furthermore proposes that, as soon as practicable, student-delegates from all institutions of higher learning for the male sex, and especially from all mission societies in such institutions, convene to discuss ways and means of establishing the mission crusade upon a solid footing, and to outline a general plan for cooperation in missionary activity among our colleges and seminaries. To this convention every mission society should send, if possible, at least two delegates, and every institution, at least one delegate for every hundred of its students

Readers of AMERICA are sufficiently acquainted with the nature of this movement, its purpose and timeliness. Golden opportunities, such as the Church never before enjoyed, are offered at the present moment in the mission field. Protestant students and schools, as well as Protestant churches and organizations, are eagerly preparing for the conquest of the great eastern countries and of other pagan lands. Catholic teachers and students may not lag behind where they should stand first in the field. Today's inactivity would be sadly regretted on the morrow.

The Man of Peace and God's Jongleurs

"LET peace be in thy strength, and abundance in thy towers. For the sake of my brethren and of my neighbors I spoke peace to thee: peace upon Israel." This was the blessing invoked upon the battlements of Assisi by its great Saint whom "A Dominican" appropriately describes in the Missionary as "the man of peace." He had set out with an Umbrian knight to join the Papal forces at Apulia, when, at the Master's call, "he cast off the warrior's shield and sword, and enrolled himself among the followers of the Lord." His great effort hereafter was to bring to the world the peace of God. To end the civic factions and the constant quarrels of the feudal barons he sought with all his strength to promote "that blessed institution which, by degrees, brought peace: the Treuga Dei." Due to him was the treaty of concord drawn up by the citizens of Assisi among themselves.

Toward the end of his life, Francis sent the poet and singer, Brother Pacificus, with others of the brethren, to make peace between the bishop and the municipality of Assisi. The prelate and magistrates listened to the appeal of Francis as sung by his children, and peace was effected. Straightway Francis set about to establish peace in the hearts of his friars; they in turn were to prepare the hearts of others for the blessed coming of charity and concord. Then the plan arose in the mind of Francis to send his brethren to tour the world on a mission of peace. When they had preached and sung, they were to say to the people: "We are God's jongleurs; and for having sung to you, we ask reward: and our reward will be that you abide in sincere penitence." The Tertiaries, those heroic men and women who sought the privilege of being clothed at death in the wedding garment of Lady Poverty, were especially commanded to give up the carrying of weapons and live a life of peace.

These, says the writer, are a few of the thousand acts of Francis which proclaim him a man of peace.

Religious Orders in England

THERE are at present about 1,200 Catholic religious houses in Great Britain, including England, Scotland and Wales. About 300 of these, according to the Catholic Monthly Letter, are conducted by societies of religious men and about 900 by the various sisterhoods. The former range in importance "from stately abbeys, with many acres of territory, to humble missions served in some cases by a single Benedictine or Franciscan priest." Members of congregations keeping the Benedictine rule, we are told, are scattered in nearly a hundred places. Their stateliest house is probably the abbey and school at Downside, with eighty-four monks attached to the monastery and 1,300 resident pupils. The monks at Erdington are members of the Beuron congregation, "who found a welcome and security in England when driven forth from Germany by the Falk laws." Other important houses are those of the Cistercians, the Austin Canons and the Carthusians. The Sussex Charterhouse of the latter was built to accommodate a far larger number of monks than was immediately available, in anticipation of the anti-clerical laws, driving Carthusians to England from the Continent.

> The two chief families of friars, the Franciscans, in their several divisions, and the Dominicans, are represented by more than thirty houses. The Dominicans have seven priories, and there are twenty-four Franciscan convents or missions served by Franciscans. There are upwards of fifty houses of Jesuits in England, of which the largest is the college at Stonyhurst, in Lancashire. This college has long been famous, among other things, for its observatory, and from time to time its astronomers have been entrusted with special work by the Government. There are many Catholic parishes served by the Society, especially in important industrial centers.

A considerable literature has emanated from the religious houses, and monks and friars lecture upon the great questions of the day. At Oxford, in connection with the university, there are establishments of Benedictines, Franciscans and Jesuits. "In these and other ways the religious orders keep abreast of the conditions of the time."

> In many cases Catholic conventual institutions are subsidized by the Government, or by local authorities, in connection with special works which they undertake, such as Poor Law and Reformatory schools, etc., where national interests are served and at the same time a Catholic atmosphere is maintained. Religious brotherhoods who teach in elementary schools are paid by the State for their services as schoolmasters.

In this point, in particular, England has a lesson of liberty and toleration to teach to the United States. So, too, a great many elementary schools are taught by Sisters, "who receive equal treatment with lay-teachers at the hand of the Government in respect of salaries and other educational provisions."

Chronicle

The War.—During the week the French made headway on the Ailette, while the British delivered several blows in Flanders. In the thrust they finally gained the village of Passchendaele and the crest of the ridge which looks down upon Roulers, only six miles away. All the high ground which the Germans now hold is a short spur running north of Passchendaele. This they are making every effort to retain, as possession of it by the British would cut off Houlthulst Wood and force a retirement. The latest British activity was on a front of one and a half miles; they penetrated the German lines to a depth of half a mile, considerably widened the salient about Passchendaele and Goeberg and obtained a firm grip on their recently acquired positions north of the Ridge.

Bulletin, Nov. 5, p.m.
Nov. 12, a.m.

The Italian situation has been a continuation of the retreat recorded last week. By November 6, with heavy attacks launched on the Italian lines in the Giudicaria zone on the Trentino front to support them and to threaten the flanks of Cadorna's armies, the Austro-German troops forced the Tagliamento River at Pinzano, obliged their opponents to give up all their zones of defense from the Bella Valley to the Colbricon, north of the Sugana Valley, on a front of more than ninety-three miles. The whole Italian line thus menaced withdrew in fairly good order to the banks of the Livenza. But the Austro-German armies again drove the Italian forces across the stream and there was heavy fighting between the Vittorio hills and the Monticano River to the west of the Livenza. By November 10 they were in strong positions along the Piave River from the foothills of the Alps to the Adriatic, and had taken Asiago on the Trentino front, twenty miles west of the river, thus seriously threatening the Italian flanks on the Piave line. On November 11 they captured Belluno, on the upper Piave, and the Vidor bridge-head on the east bank. A conference of British, French and Italian representatives at Italian Headquarters on November 8 resulted in the creation of an inter-Allied Military Committee. General Cadorna, who has been in supreme command of the Italian Army since the beginning of the war, has received a place on the new committee. General Foch, Chief of Staff of the French War Ministry, and General Sir Henry Hughes Wilson of the British General Staff will serve on the committee with General Cadorna. New heads of the Italian forces were also named. General Diaz has been appointed first in command, with General Badoglio second and General Giardino third.

While one British column is steadily advancing northwest of Bagdad another column which is moving along the Mediterranean coast, assisted by French and British warships, has gained nearly twenty miles since the capture of Gaza. According to General Allenby's latest reports, the British line runs in a southeasterly direction from two miles north of Hamameh, which is two miles from the coast and four miles northeast of Askalon, to two miles north of Arak-el-Menshiyeh, on the Central Railway. Askalon has been occupied by British infantry and artillery. The column is now five miles below the latitude of Jerusalem, which, however, is forty-five miles inland.

Our Navy Department has been advised by Admiral Sims that the American patrol boat, the Alcedo, a converted yacht, was torpedoed and sunk by a German submarine in the war zone. One officer and twenty men are missing. The ship sank in four minutes after being struck.

Dr. Heffelrich has tendered his resignation as Vice-Chancellor. The Cabinet, containing Count von Hertling as Chancellor, Friedrich von Payer as Vice-Chancellor, and Herr von Friedberg as Vice-President of the Prussian Mintry, means virtually a coalition Liberal Government. The Clerical, National-Liberty and Progressive parties are represented in the Cabinet. The Socialists accept the appointment of von Payer as evidence that Count von Hertling is willing to work with the present group of the Reichstag majority parties, but they are reserving to themselves complete liberty of action. The Conservatives are the only important Reichstag faction not represented in the new Government. The Liberals are preparing to combat their opponents in their efforts to obstruct the enactment of the Prussian

The New German Cabinet

Electoral Reform bill, and it is expected that the Clericals, National-Liberals, the Poles and the Progressive Socialists will give them an ample majority in the lower chamber of the Prussian Diet.

The Fate of Poland

Press dispatches from Copenhagen state that the proposed settlement of the Polish question, according to the Lokal-Anzeiger, will be submitted to the Ways and Means Committee of the Reichstag on November 18 or 19, and to the delegations from the Austrian or Hungarian parliaments in Vienna on December 3. Other press dispatches from Vienna via Amsterdam say that in reply to several Slav, Ruthenian and Czech interpellations protesting against newspaper reports of the Austro-German decision regarding the future of Poland—which country was to be erected into an independent kingdom, with liberty of conscience proclaimed in its constitution but with the Catholic religion recognized as the State religion on all official occasions—Premier von Seydler said in the lower house of the Austrian parliament that as long as the discussions with Germany had not resulted in a full agreement it was still impossible to say how the Polish question was to be solved. If in the future the Kingdom of Poland should seek a rapprochement with the dual monarchy, he said, the whole question would be settled in a legislative manner and the Austrian parliament would have an opportunity to define its attitude. The Premier declared that the Polish question could not be an obstacle to peace, and that all nationalities would have an opportunity to put forth their just claims regarding political orientation. He added that the Government would take care that whatever the solution, Austria would not emerge weakened from the change, but strengthened.

China.—News came from Pekin on November 5 that Viscount Ishii, head of the Japanese Mission to this country, and Secretary of State Lansing had signed an agreement on November 2 by which the United States recognizes Japan's special interest in China and reaffirms for both countries an equal opportunity for commerce and trade with China. The agreement also guarantees in these words the independence of China:

Guarantee of Independence

> Moreover, they (the Governments of the United States and Japan) declare that they are opposed to the acquisition by any Government of any special rights or privileges that would affect the independence or territorial integrity of China or that would deny to the subjects or citizens of any country the full enjoyment of equal opportunity in the commerce and industry of China.

Secretary Lansing also announced that another important result of the Japanese Mission was Viscount Ishii's assurance that his Government "desired to do its part in the suppression of Prussian militarism and was eager to co-operate in every practical way to that end." It is understood that one of these ways will be co-operation in the Pacific by the Japanese and American navies.

Ireland.—The Irish papers bear with them an atmosphere of agitation and alarm. In a speech recently delivered in the House of Commons Mr. Redmond, after declaring that should the Convention "break down in hopelessness and despair by reason of any policy pursued outside itself it would be far better for Ireland and the Empire had it never met," considered the Government's policy in Ireland. He accused the Executive of encouraging and then defying Sinn Fein and protested against "a lot of silly proclamations issued under the Defense of the Realm Act." The Government, he said, should strive its utmost "to tranquilize the country, but instead, it was increasing the difficulties of all parties at the Convention." In reply the Chief Secretary, Mr. Duke, repudiated this charge and affirmed that "200,000 Irishmen were being recruited, enemies of the Empire and of the Allies, for the purpose of creating a new rebellion in Ireland."

Sinn Fein and Revolution

> Week by week for a period running into months there had been organization and drilling in every parish and village in Ireland, and, to a considerable extent, in the large towns, of the new Irish Volunteers. The organization was professedly a rebel force. They were told by their leaders that they had a considerable store of arms, and that they would have more before the day came. More from where? They could not buy them in Ireland. It could only be that the helping hand which was to bring them arms was Germany and the reason for the deportation of some of the men was that the helping hand of Germany was being stretched out again, and the Government knew it.

The Chief Secretary spoke at some length in justification of his administration. He seized arms because no one would guarantee that they would not be used against the Government; he forbade hurley sticks to be distributed because they had already proved dangerous weapons in the hands of infuriated people, and finally he disowned responsibility for the harsh treatment of the Irish prisoners. In connection with the present widespread agitation, Cardinal Logue has sent this wire to the English Review: "Do not approve of revolutionary action. Have no control over Sinn Feiners. Success of Convention only remedy. If it fails—chaos." The Irish Weekly Independent prints this news with some reserve, the Irish Catholic, on the contrary, makes it the subject of an approving editorial. The latter paper is also alarmed about the conditions stressed by Duke. It says:

> To us it seems that unless they (Duke's charges) are entirely baseless, a very clear duty is imposed on the clergy and parents of Ireland to do whatsoever they still can to save our boys from the grip of the hangman. Any new revolt will be suppressed relentlessly, and with the full approval of all who want to see their native land preserved from passing into the hands of groups of political adventurers and hotheads who would imperil without scruple the lives and fortunes of our people, if they can thereby carry out their plans and those of the occult wire-pullers of whom they are the cat's paws.

The more recent papers give much space to the arrest of Liam Mellowes and Dr. McCartan, and wonder what it portends.

Mexico.—A recent speech delivered in the Mexican House of Representatives by Carranza's henchman, Cabrera, shows in its true light the wretched condition of the country. The following passages are significant:

Cabrera and the Country

We have destroyed the banks, because they were opposed to the revolution. But are we going to say to them now, "We are vanquished; provide us with your bank notes?" No, we will not do so.

We have destroyed the railroads, because it was necessary to do so in order to combat the military enemy. We must now prepare them, so that through them the current of national prosperity may again circulate. The heavens this year have determined to destroy us with famine; the crops have been lost. We shall not raise twenty-five per cent of what our fields offered.

In other words, Mexico by the confession of the chief revolutionists is a country of ruin and famine. Cabrera then petitioned for a suspension of guarantees so that all "antagonistic to revolutionary tendencies," especially "the intellectual, the wealthy and the wise," may be punished, presumably by court-matrial. The speaker enumerated the people who must be dealt with; apparently ninety-nine per cent of the population is on the list. He is thirsty for the blood of the Federals, the Villistas, the Zapatistas, the cientifico plutocrats, the agrarian plutocrats, foreign plutocrats, especially American and English, who pay for the publication of articles and books that belittle the Carranza régime, and last and most guilty of all, the clergy, especially the higher clergy who left the country to plot again Carranza. And finally came this great confession: the step taken "to reestablish constitutional government was premature, and to correct this error the suspension of individual guarantees must be decreed," a few hundred more men must be murdered and more property must be stolen before Mexico can be made safe for democracy.

Rome.—The motive underlying the misinterpretations of the Pope's peace proposals is daily growing clearer, as Protestant and Socialistic journals and reviews in Germany, France, England, Italy and the United States unite in protesting with sadness and bitterness that one of the effects of the war will be an increase of the power of the Papacy. To avert so dire a calamity, they are bending every effort to discredit the Pope and his endeavors to bring the world back to peace. In spite of this the note has had a tremendous effect. In the words of the Supreme Pontiff, spoken recently, "It has not produced immediate results, but it has sown seed which cannot but bear fruit." Reaction against the injustice with which the message of the Holy Father was first received, is now noticeable in many lands, tinctured, however, with prejudice and absurdity.

The Pope's Peace Proposals

The Atlantic Monthly for November, for instance, reviews the whole question of Pope Benedict's letter and shows that the Papacy has not been pro-German either from the beginning of the war, as has been alleged, or in its recent note, and in particular that the statement to the effect that such an attitude was the result of a bribe offered by Germany to restore the temporal power is without foundation. According to the writer, the Pope is far too astute a statesman to dream of the possibility of the dismemberment of Italy by Germany, a thing which would be the necessary preliminary to the reacquisition by the Vatican of the narrow strip of Italian soil to which the Popes have never relinquished their claim. He is, however, of the opinion, that the Pope does ambition a larger temporal power, consisting of "a general suzerainty over the world," which would make him by persuasion at present, but later by authority, "the final arbiter between kings." This contention he bases on such ridiculous grounds as the use by the Pope of the expressions "common Father of all" and "Supreme Spiritual charge." He believes that this assumption has been to a degree accepted by the belligerents in that they have not replied to it. He concludes, therefore, that the policy of the Papacy is "pro-Roman." In any case, he declares that "it may be maintained that Pope Benedict's appeal for peace is not pro-German; even that it is, in a definite and profound sense, anti-German." The justification of this statement he deduces from an analysis of the Pope's definite proposals.

The suggestion of a "simultaneous and reciprocal diminution of armament" has met with flat refusals from Germany for the past twenty years, whenever it was proposed. The Pope could not but be aware of this. If Germany accedes to the proposal it will be against her wishes; if she refuses to consider it, she will be put in a bad light before the world. The suggestion that Belgium and France be evacuated, with the logical, though unexpressed, implication that Courland, Livonia, Volhynia and Bodalia should also be evacuated, joined with the endeavor to enlist sympathy for Poland, imply the "surrender of Pan-German dreams" or the acknowledgment by Germany that "her policy of conquest is the real bar to peace." In addition, the Pope proposes the arbitration of the question of Alsace-Lorraine, a matter that Germany repeatedly declared to be not arbitrable. Moreover, the Pope's peace proposals, in the opinion of the writer, are "distinctly and very strongly pro-Austrian."

Pope Benedict has, in fact, marked a line of cleavage, which may at any moment become a line of fracture, not so much between Austria and Germany as between South Germany, including Austria, and North Germany, dominated by Prussia. For, while cutting the claws of Germany—a not unfair way of describing the disarmament of the supremely militarist State—the Pope's proposals work no detriment at all to Bavaria, Würtemburg, Silesia, and other Roman Catholic sections of South Germany.

The arbitration of the Balkan situation is contrasted with the evacuation of Belgium, and in the opinion of the writer gives Austria the hope of a diminished Serbia, to which Bulgaria would not object. The solution of the Polish question, he believes, does not exclude the possibility of Russian Poland being united to Austrian Poland, with the Austrian Emperor as its King, a settlement which would checkmate aggressive Hungary and give the German element a preponderance over the Slav element in the Reichsrat at Vienna. Such additions to her territory would amply compensate Austria for the loss of portions of the Trentino and the section about Goritz. Finally he sees in the efforts of the Holy Father an attempt to align Roman Catholic South Germany on the side of Austria. Bavaria, he says, and Catholic South Germany do not love Prussia, and they are growing restive at being forced to wage a destructive war for the benefit of Prussian ambitions. Sadowa is as bitterly remembered as Sedan. Disarmament would rob Prussia of her mastery and pave the way for the revival of the anti-Prussian League.

Russia.—Last week a new revolutionary movement overthrew Kerensky's Government and put the Bolsheviki, or extreme radical Socialists, in control of Petrograd. The first signs of the impending coup d'état appeared last Wednesday in the news that negotiations between the General Staff of the Petrograd district and the Military Committee of the Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates regarding the strengthening of the Staff by inclusion of Democratic members had been broken off. Premier Kerensky then denounced before the Preliminary Parliament the Bolsheviki attempt to seize power, provoke civil war and play into the hands of Germany. Dispatches from Petrograd, dated November 5, also brought the news that Leon Trotsky, President of the Delegates' Central Executive Committee, had bidden the city garrison execute no orders except those approved by the Delegates' Military Committee, and the garrison of 40,000 troops seems to have been won over then to the Bolsheviki. On November 8 intelligence came that the radical Socialists had secured control of the capital, seized the telegraph offices and some of the banks, and had forced the Government troops holding the Winter Palace to surrender after a bombardment from the cruiser Aurora and from the Fortress of SS. Peter and Paul. The "Military Revolutionary Committee" then issued the following proclamation:

Bolsheviki Seize the Government

We have deposed the Government of Kerensky which rose against the revolution and the people. The change which resulted in the deposition of the Provisional Government was accomplished without bloodshed. The Petrograd Council of Soldiers' and Workmen's Delegates solemnly welcomes the accomplished change, and proclaims the authority of the Military Revolutionary Committee until the creation of a Government by the Soldiers' and Workmen's Delegates. Announcing this to the army at the front, the Revolutionary Committee calls upon the revolutionary soldiers to watch closely the conduct of the men in command. Officers who do not join the accomplished revolution immediately and openly must be arrested at once as enemies.

The Petrograd Council of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates considers this to be the program of the new authority: (1) The offer of an immediate democratic peace. (2) The immediate handing over of large proprietorial lands to the peasants. (3) The transmission of all authority to the Council of Soldiers' and Workmen's Delegates. (4) The honest convocation of a Constitutional Assembly.

The national revolutionary army must not permit uncertain military detachments to leave the front for Petrograd. . . . Soldiers: For peace, for bread, for land, and for the power of the people.

The New Government's Program

The General Congress of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates of all Russia assembled in Petrograd on November 7 with 560 delegates in attendance and elected fourteen Bolsheviki officers, including Nicolai Lenine and Leon Trotsky, and issued the following proclamation to "all Provisional Councils of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates":

All power lies in the Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates. Government commissaries are relieved of their functions. Presidents of the Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates are to communicate direct with the Revolutionary Government. All members of agricultural committees who have been arrested are to be set at liberty immediately and the commissioners who arrested them are in turn to be arrested. The death penalty reestablished at the front by Premier Kerensky is abolished, and complete freedom for political propaganda has been established at the front. All revolutionary soldiers and officers who have been arrested for complicity in so-called political crimes are to be set at liberty immediately. Former Ministers Konovaloff, Kishkin, Terestchenko, Malyanovitch, Nikitin and others have been arrested by the Revolutionary Committee. Mr. Kerensky has taken to flight, and all military bodies have been empowered to take all possible measures to arrest Kerensky and bring him back to Petrograd. All complicity with Kerensky will be dealt with as high treason.

Most of Kerensky's Cabinet are reported to be held in solitary confinement in the Fortress of SS. Peter and Paul. By November 9 the Bolsheviki movement appeared to have reached Moscow, as the Revolutionary Committee supported by the garrison of that city had seized the government offices there. The Bolsheviki appealed to the Russian army to stand firm until a democratic peace has been won and announced "an armistice of three months during which there shall be elected representatives of all the nations, not diplomats, who are to settle the question of peace." All private, State and ecclesiastical lands, it is announced, are to be handed over to Peasants' Committees. Dispatches dated Petrograd, November 9, announced that an absolutely Bolsheviki Cabinet had been formed with Lenine as Premier and Trotsky as Foreign Minister, which is meant to remain in office till the Constituent Assembly convenes.

Advices received on Monday, November 11, report that an organization called the All Russian Committee for Saving the Country and the Revolution, announced that the collapse of the Bolsheviki movement was near. Regiments loyal to Kerensky, who is said to be in command of 200,000 men, were reported to be marching on Petrograd and to have taken Bolsheviki strongholds on the way.

Hoover in Ancient Mexico

EBER COLE BYAM

IN the midst of meatless and wheatless days, with all the world a-Hooverizing, and governments seeking means to curb food speculators, it is both interesting and instructive to consider the efforts of the Spanish Viceroy in Mexico to accomplish a similar purpose nearly 350 years ago. Martin Enriquez was his name and during his rule, from 1568 to 1580, many important events occurred, but the one of particular consequence was the establishment of a public warehouse for grain in the City of Mexico.

Speculators had been buying food and holding it for a rise in price, and the middlemen had multiplied the charges to an intolerable degree. Therefore, the Viceroy built a public warehouse and made such rules and regulations as would protect the people from extortion.

In endorsing the Viceroy's actions and in writing his regulations into the law of the land, the Spanish King, Philip II, in 1583, plainly declared that the purpose of this institution was to prevent speculation in grain and excessive prices of that commodity.

The keeper of the warehouse was named each year by the city, and to prevent him making anything "on the side," he was prohibited from buying or selling grain or flour for himself or anybody else, either directly or indirectly. To make sure that he was always alert he was required to live in the warehouse, and to insure the faithful discharge of his duties he was obliged to put up a bond of $4,000, a tidy sum in those days.

This warehouse served not only as a place of storage but also as a market, and it was required that all the grain and flour sold in the city be brought there for sale. The purchase or sale of any grain or flour outside the warehouse was strictly prohibited.

Railroads were still nearly 300 years away in the distant future, and so all the grain had to be brought into the city on mule back or in ox carts, a system of transportation both slow and expensive. This, however, afforded the grain speculators an opportunity to go out upon the highways leading into the city and there overtake the creeping, dusty caravans of carts or mules, and purchase the flour or grain for sale to the people of the city, at a good profit. But, with the establishment of the warehouse, such purchases were strictly forbidden.

To prevent further irregularities, all those bringing grain or flour into the city were required to go at once to the warehouse and there unload, and, in addition, they were obliged to furnish a sworn statement about the way the goods came into their possession. Those raising the grain could send it to the city by their own mules or carts, or they could employ professional carriers to do this for them.

To avoid petty extortion, either by the officials or by the laborers about the warehouse, the charges for storage were fixed at a reasonable rate by the authorities and the charges for handling by the stevedores were likewise determined. Even the charges the sworn statements required were fixed. The charges allowed the stevedores for handling the sacks of grain reveal not only the possible earning capacity of the men, but provide as well a factor to contrast wages and prices in the sixteenth and twentieth centuries.

The mules and carts were unloaded in the courtyard of the warehouse and the sacks carried but a short distance to the storage bins. These sacks held two bushels and the stevedore was allowed a cuartillo, equivalent to three and one-eighth cents, or twenty-five cacaos. The cacaos were the grains or beans from which chocolate is made. These chocolate beans served the pre-Columbian Indians as a medium of exchange, and the Indians insisted upon their use for a long time after the Conquest. As Indians were usually employed as stevedores in the warehouses, the equivalent rate of payment in these beans was determined for their benefit. The rate of payment was about one and one-half cents per bushel, so it may be readily seen that it was possible for a stevedore to earn a fair wage in a day, especially when it is recalled that in those times a dollar a day was a very desirable wage. The relative value of cacao and cuartillos figures out at the rate of eight beans for one cent, a rate that still persisted in the State of Chiapas as late as 1896, where the Indians continued the use of this curious money.

To prevent the hoarding of grain it was required that at the end of twenty days it had to be sold at the price prevailing on the day it was offered for sale. Therefore the only hoarding possible was by the farmers themselves, but they were always eager to convert their harvests into cash as soon as possible and consequently at a reasonable profit.

Prices for grain and flour were fixed in the morning at the opening of the market and no excess above that price was permitted during that day. This measure made it impossible for an apparent or momentary scarcity to be made the pretext for a sudden and unreasonable rise in price. Such an apparent scarcity might be caused by the temporary cessation of the arrival of pack trains, due to a variety of causes other than an actual scarcity of grain at the source.

A great many people in the city bought grain in small quantities in the market, and ground it in their homes to make their bread. In order that such folk might be protected against large buyers, the latter were not allowed to make their purchases until after the cathedral bells had sounded for High Mass. These large buyers were the bakers, and, to make sure that they did not hoard grain, they were obliged to declare on oath the amount of grain used by them daily, and they were not permitted to purchase more than enough to last them for one, or, at most, two days.

Some of the bakers raised their own grain, and to prevent them taking advantage of this to the detriment of the public, they were obliged to make sworn statements about the amount harvested by them and the amount used by them daily. While their own grain lasted they were not permitted to buy or sell grain in the market. Naturally they were allowed to sell their surplus. For the settlement of disputes in connection with this enterprise two judges and a scrivener were appointed.

These warehouses and grain markets were established in all the cities and towns of any consequence throughout Mexico during the colonial régime. The regulations governing them were left to the judgment of the local authorities, and consequently varied with the needs and conditions prevailing in each locality.

As Church and State were united in Mexico during the colonial period any mention of the latter would be incomplete without some reference to the former. The principal single source of Church income was the tithes paid in kind, and this was invariably utilized as a balance to prevent as far as possible an unreasonable increase in the price of grain. This was effected by throwing on the market a part of the stock of grain obtained as tithes. This usually had the effect of bringing the price down to normal point. In cases of real scarcity the Church authorities employed the poor on public works and doled out grain with excellent judgment. Church funds were also advanced to planters in the hot country along the coast, where two and three crops may be gathered in a year, and then the planters were paid high prices for their product. In addition, the Bishops always drew heavy contributions from the wealthy people, the Spaniards being particularly liberal in this respect. The civil Government did not hesitate to place an embargo on grain in districts where there was plenty, to help out those where it was scarce. Scarcity of grain was caused usually by drought and frost, for the greater part of the Mexican population has always lived in the highlands, at elevations of 6,000 feet or more, where certain districts suffer from severe frosts or from lack of rain.

The foregoing is a fair sample of the "oppression" suffered by the Mexican people during the Spanish rule. With the achievement of "independence," the grain warehouses gradually fell into disuse as the people regained their "liberty" to buy and sell without restraint. The beneficiaries of Spanish philanthropy and ecclesiastical benevolence showed their gratitude by massacre, exile and confiscation, and, more recently, by prohibiting any clergyman from engaging in any philanthropic enterprise.

The success of Iturbide in 1821 seemed to show that the time for Mexican independence had arrived, but the subsequent events as clearly indicate that the triumph of the Mexican "Liberals" was a deliberate selection of evil in place of good and an equally deliberate killing of the poor goose that laid the golden egg.

The Red Herring of Probabilism

Paul L. Blakely, S.J.

RETURNING to his assertion, "The Jesuits defended all kinds of false statements if the Church was advanced thereby," the Rev. Christian F. Reisner submits the witness of an apostate Jesuit and of a Methodist clergyman. The testimony of the apostate, Von Hoensbroech, who boasts his skill as a liar and a forger, has been examined. It has also been noted that the very page cited by Dr. Reisner contains the admission that, given ample opportunity, Von Hoensbroech failed to prove before the High Court of Appeals, his calumny that the Society of Jesus holds the doctrine that the end justifies the means. Dr. Reisner's second reference is to the third volume of Sheldon's "History of the Christian Church," pages 414-423, 489-500. "Also," counsels the reverend doctor, "consider the question of probabilism as described and authenticated" in these pages.

It is with reluctance that I pause to examine this ancient and familiar red herring which has as intimate a connection with the accusation in hand, i. e., "The Jesuits defended all manner of false statements if the Church was advanced thereby," as the batting-average of Mr. Tyrus Cobb for 1917. Probabilism, as Dr. Reisner does not seem to know, is as harmless, to use Chesterton's words on casuistry, as botany, and considerably more useful in the ordinary conduct of life. It is one phase, and only one, of casuistry, and "anybody is a casuist," remarks the modernistic St. Cyres, "who reflects about his duties and tries to bring them in line with some intelligible moral standard." As the Rev. Ethelred

Taunton, no lover of the Society of Jesus, has written, it is simply "the principle of equity applied to law."

> [Probabilism] is based on an accurate conception of law. Law to bind, must be clear and definite . . . A probable opinion is one founded on reason, and held on serious grounds that the law does not apply to certain specified cases, and that the law-giver did not therefore intend to bind. It is the principle of equity applied to law. In moral matters, a probable opinion, that is one held on no trivial grounds, but by unprejudiced and serious thinkers, has no place where the voice of conscience is clear and distinct and formed. ("Encyclopedia Britannica," XV, 341.)

Similarly, as a writer in the "New International Encyclopedia" well says:

> The probabilist proceeds on the principle that, as the law is not certain, he is free; for no one is bound by a doubtful obligation. This liberty, however, is restricted if for some major obligation, he is bound to take every reasonable means to achieve a certain object. . . . But apart from these antecedent obligations of justice, charity and religion, probabilism leaves a man free when he has good reasons for judging that he is doing right. (Vol. IV, p. 655, new edition.)

Of course, the principle that doubtful laws do not bind cannot be taken absolutely, that is, without reference to the "major obligation," "the antecedent obligations" referred to in the preceding paragraph. "Thus in a case of practical doubt as to the existence of a law, I am bound to make due inquiry, and I am not at liberty to act until I can, directly or reflexly, form a certain conscience on the question." (Slater, "Questions of Moral Theology," p. 317). In other words, my liberty does not begin until I have "good reasons for judging that I am doing right," which is only saying that I may never act against my conscience. As Mausbach writes ("Catholic Moral Teaching," p. 190) all Catholic theologians agree in holding "that wherever moral certainty exists, wherever there is a true recognition of duty, there is but one kind of freedom, that of obedience." I am far from asserting that no probabilist has ever erred in weighing the evidence in the often exceedingly difficult question of the dubium juris or the dubium facti, the doubt as to the existence of the law, or the doubt as to whether a specified action is comprehended under the law. I only submit that a probabilist is not necessarily a rascal, and that probabilism is not a system devised for the protection and promotion of evil.

Whether or not one approaches the field as a probabilist, casuistry, a "noble science" as Newman calls it, like every science offers propositions upon which, since they are open to speculation, it is vain to expect unanimity. But does difference of opinion necessarily imply dishonesty in the dissenting parties? Take the single question of lying. Not only upon the definition of a lie does it seem that men of the purest minds and acknowledged learning may differ, but also on whether a given action squares with the definition. Jeremy Taylor was no mean divine, Paley was a man of great ability; yet who today would unreservedly defend Taylor's theory that "to tell a lie for charity, to save a man's life," is "commendable," or champion what seems Paley's notion that a lie is morally wrong only when it disturbs "social happiness"? But our reluctance does not justify the bald assertion that these men taught lying, much less defended it; nor can it fix that stigma upon the Church in which they were distinguished officers. Surely it is more just, as well as more in keeping with common-sense, to believe that from principles apprehended as correct, these men drew false conclusions, which, however, neither vitiated their private character, nor cast a slur upon the religious body to which they gave fealty.

Is probabilism, with its adherents, to be judged by another canon, so that by the very word Dr. Reisner may conjure up a whole body of men defending "all kinds of false statements if the Church was advanced thereby"? To say that probabilism justifies lying or any violation of conscience is to betray a complete ignorance of what probabilism is. When Dr. Sheldon, quoted with approval by Dr. Reisner, attacks this system he moves to slay a monster that exists nowhere but in his imagination. To him it is not "equity applied to law," a sober conclusion resting upon solid reasons weighed in conscience, but "a cheap and easy method of avoiding inward heart-searchings, of relaxing the stern sense of duty, of following inclination rather than the subtle monitions of conscience" (III, p. 417). "Subtle monitions of conscience" is a phrase that may be misinterpreted. Surely no Christian is bound on peril of his salvation to practise heroic virtue in all things, or even, in given instances, to prefer the greater to the lesser good. But need it be said in this twentieth century that no Catholic theologian has ever taught the lawfulness of acting against conscience? In repudiating any such system, the Catholic may not rest satisfied with Dr. Sheldon's condemnation. He must go much farther, and hold that it is not "mischievous" merely, but damnable; that the man who accepts it as his rule will assuredly, unless saved by invincible ignorance, find his place in hell. For the abominable teaching that conscience may be systematically disregarded is not a mere growth of debased Christianity, but a monster born of insensibility to the law clearly written by the Creator in man's very nature.

The point at issue, however, is not probabilism, but Dr. Reisner's charge that "The Jesuits defended all manner of false statements if the Church was advanced thereby." Probabilism affords no proof whatever of this heinous accusation, nor does Dr. Reisner's second "argument." After referring to "the scope given in the Romish system to sacramental magic" (p. 416), phrases which at once, and luminously, place beyond doubt the author's acquaintance with Catholic theology and his marvelous freedom from bias, Dr. Sheldon caricatures probabilism to the end of page 419, at which point another record is put on the machine. "The doctrine of mental reservation" . . . writes Dr. Sheldon, "may not have been formally sanctioned by the Order." I take this to mean that, after a careful examination of authentic sources, as befits an historian, Dr. Sheldon is unable to say whether or not the Society ever taught "the doctrine of mental reservation." Now I am under no obligation to define "mental reservation" or any other term that Dr. Sheldon may employ. I would only observe in the present instance that Dr. Sheldon who does not know whether or not the Jesuits ever formally sanctioned "mental reservation" makes a sorry witness in proof of Dr. Reisner's plain and unvarnished "The Jesuits defended all manner of false statements if the Church was advanced thereby." Witnesses are usually summoned because of their knowledge, not because of their ignorance. Dr. Sheldon has no conclusion to offer. The proof he offers is, therefore, conclusive, at least to Dr. Reisner. Henceforth it must be admitted, and even be defended by honorable men, like Dr. Reisner, that "The Jesuits defended all manner of false statements if the Church was advanced thereby." Happily, as Dr. Reisner has assured us, this condemnation does not fall upon the New Orleans, or St. Louis, or New York Jesuits, simple, guileless men who carry umbrellas on rainy days to protect good honest visages and garbings curiously reminiscent, at times, of Baxter Street. It refers exclusively to those unholy Jesuits of the Goetterdaemmerung period, one might say, when in Dr. Reisner's felicitous phrase, a model of historical precision, "neither the Protestants nor the Catholics had the high standard of morals which we now enjoy." Our morals may be better, but our logic seems to have suffered; at least, in the incumbent of Grace Methodist Episcopal Church, New York.

But undaunted and more courageous than any Stanley, Dr. Reisner returns to the charge by citing Dr. Sheldon to fix definitely upon the Jesuits the doctrine that the end justifies the means. Unfortunately, Dr. Sheldon brings to the attack a reed which Father Herbert Thurston bruised and broke some years ago; to wit, one W. C. Cartright who forgot to examine his references. This phase of the matter may be reserved for another occasion, together with the diverting history of how a Georgia dominie, a major-general, and a New York newspaper moved against a remarkably stupid yet strangely feared Society founded by the Saint of Loyola.

Our Futuristic Senses

DANIEL A. LORD, S.J.

IN the heat of the futurist craze a certain French sculptor, whose death is one of the war's minor tragedies, offered to an astonished world some mussy looking groups in marble. He called them statues, so he unquestionably intended them to be such; but they would have cost Phidias or Angelo sleepless nights. Masses of stone, misshapen, unsymmetrical, yet labeled conventionally "Stags" or "Caritas," they appeared a cross between a half-carved Eskimo totem and a snowman after a sudden thaw.

Then a kindly interpreter, who, by the way, writes futuristic poetry, explained it all. They are not really statues; they are musical compositions in stone. They make their appeal not to the eye but to the ear. Yon heavy mass of marble is a symphony; that dainty triangular bit of porphyry is a waltz; while this nervous bunch of ungainly angles and sharp corners is a fox-trot orchestrated for banjo, saxophone and traps.

Now as marble when not crashing down a mountain or off a pedestal is obviously incapable of sound, these musical statues presuppose only one thing: a properly trained eye that can be made to hear. After that, futurism has nothing further to offer.

About the same time a volume of one of our modern books of knowledge found its way to my armchair. Under "senses" was a diagram in which a number of parallel lines had been placed so as to seem slanting toward one another, and under the diagram was the brilliant query: "Do our senses deceive us?" There was more than a passing similarity between that diagram and the musical statues.

If our last essay in armchair philosophy arrived at anything, it was the confirmation of our common-sense view that there is a real world of tangible, extended objects outside of ourselves. It is, of course, obvious that we cannot perform the Marsyan feat of getting outside of our own skins to reach this world; instead, we must rely on our senses—our eyes, our ears, our tongue and palate, our noses, and the sensory surface of our skins—to bring us and that world into contact. If, to the question proposed by the editor of the "Book of Knowledge," we must with certain philosophers answer that our senses do deceive us, it would really be better were no such thing as the world to exist. It is better to know nothing about a thing, than to know something that is not true. And if our senses really deceive us, we know something about this beautiful world of color and scent and taste; but that something is absolutely wrong.

Personally I have seen about a dozen ways of proving that the squares of the two sides of a triangle are equal to the square of its hypotenuse; but I have never seen any proof that two and two equal four. I know that the two pencils before me added to my fountain pen and paper cutter make a total of four objects on my desk; yet if someone declined to believe it, I am sure I should not know how to prove it to him. And I am quite ready to admit the difficulty of proving the perfectly obvious proposition that our senses do not deceive us. The best one can hope to do is simply to explain how they cannot possibly do so.

No one who admits the tangible world about us denies that the eyes are intended to see, the ears to hear, the sensory tissues to feel, the tongue and palate to taste, and the nose to smell. That is philosophy as obvious as the philosophy of "As You Like It." "Hast any philosophy in thee, shepherd?" asked Touchstone of Corin. "No more but that I know the more one sickens the worse he is . . . that the property of rain is to wet and fire to burn . . . that a great cause of the night is the lack of sun." Corin was a right hearty philosopher even in the eyes of Touchstone, and he might have voiced in the same context the truisms about the senses which every one perforce admits.

The question is, do our eyes which were fashioned to reproduce the colors of the world, reproduce them correctly or not? Are the mistakes, which every one admits, the result of a natural bent or of some accidental modification which here and now impedes the proper operation of sight? Is it the nature of the senses to reproduce objects correctly or incorrectly? There lies the crux of the whole matter.

If the eyes are made to see, and yet by their very nature are so fashioned that they do not see what they are looking at or see it incorrectly, we have a parallel to a gun that of its nature was never intended to shoot, or to an automobile that was built to stand still. It simply gives the lie to its own nature. The nature of the senses, as all admit, is to sense objects. If, then, by their nature they were so formed that they always sensed objects incorrectly, they would simply not be senses at all. They would be senses because they were ordained to perceive the material world; they would really not perceive it because they always perceived it incorrectly. Incorrect knowledge is no knowledge at all.

Imagine that some genius fashions a machine which he calls a camera. He offers me his machine and I take it under the impression that it conforms to the nature of all cameras, which is to reproduce the object to which their sensitive plate has been exposed. The first picture I attempt is a bit of marine landscape. I develop the plate and discover that it reproduces just nothing. Having had the same experience before with other cameras, I try again, this time photographing a friend's new and ultra-modern roadster. Then, when the plate comes from its developing bath, I find that I have the reproduction of a very old and spavined horse. In wrath I rush to the inventor. "I thought you said this is a camera!" I bluster. "It is," he replies; "but it is a camera which by its nature either does not reproduce the object at which it is snapped, or else reproduces it differently from what it is." "Then," I retort, "tossing the maching deftly at his head, "call it what else you please, but do not call it a camera. A camera which is made not to reproduce objects and not to reproduce them as they are is simply no camera at all."

On the same principle, a sense that is by nature destined to reproduce objects incorrectly or not to reproduce them at all, may be a subject for an anatomist or a poet; but it is not in any particular a sense. Senses must by nature be ordained to give us correct information about material objects; otherwise they are by no means senses.

The reasons which impel philosophers to doubt this obvious fact may be reduced to two classes: They have not taken the normal sense working under normal conditions into consideration, or they use the sense for a purpose for which it was not destined or was destined only secondarily.

No one says a motor boat is imperfect because it will not travel in the air; a man does not give up faith in watches as timekeepers when he finds that his watch needs regulating. Yet with marvelous consistency men jump to the conclusion that their eyes are deceptive when, on looking at a stick thrust into a glass of water, they seem to see it bent quite out of shape; from the color-blindness of one individual, they leap to the conclusion that all eyes are essentially deceptive; they pronounce their eyes imperfect because they fail to do the work of a microscope or high-power telescope.

For any correct judgment about our eyes, we must be sure we are looking through a natural medium. Our eyes are not the eyes of mermen, and the stick in water has passed out of our normal medium which, of course, is ether and air. The color-blindness of a particular person is an accident and as such cannot affect the essential character of vision. And when we maintain that our eyes are not deceptive, our only contention is that the things they report under normal conditions they report correctly. To expect the senses to report everything no matter how minute or how remote is almost like expecting a single mirror to reflect the universe.

Each sense, if we except possibly the sense of touch, has one particular quality in bodies for which it is primarily suited. The eye perceives color; the ear, sound; the nose, odor; the tongue and palate, taste. Put a perfectly colorless body before the eyes and they perceive nothing, unless, of course, the colorless body is made to contrast sharply with a colored body; in which case the eyes perceive a sudden cessation of color where the colorless body has been placed. But like the cowboys in one of O. Henry's yarns who used their gold watches for quoits, we want our single senses to do much more than report the quality for which they were destined. Like the futuristic sculptor, we want our eyes to hear; like the editor of the "Book of Knowledge," we insist that they tell us all about the direction of lines; and we condemn them outright if they fail us in the task we have set them.

Taking the eyes for our example, we find that the eye in looking at a color perceives that that color terminates at a certain point, where a new color begins. My eye thus perceives that the white of the paper on which I write ends abruptly, and the green of my desk blotter at that point begins. In this way color becomes for me a way of determining shape. But if, from the data given by my eyes alone, I judge the shape of an object, I am certainly very likely to make an incorrect judgment. Color is the quality for which the eye is primarily destined; shape or size falls not merely under the range of sight but of touch as well. And for a safe judgment on the subject of shape or size, the testimony of two senses, not one, is usually required. When two senses have been thus applied, all that has been proved for the correctness of a single sense holds for both. Had the editor of the "Book of Knowledge" in addition to his eyes used his sense of touch on the puzzling parallel lines, he would not have deserved a place with the sculptor of musical statues.

It did not take much acute reasoning to show, in a former essay in armchair philosophy, the ridiculous and self-contradictory pose of a man who professes to doubt everything. Such a sceptic if he acts up to his creed, is bound in an intellectual strait-jacket. Yet one who believes that of their nature his senses deceive him is headed by a straight and level road for this absolute scepticism. If my senses on which I am ultimately dependent for all my knowledge of the world outside of myself are essentially unreliable, then every tangible fact I have ever experienced, from the conviction that I am grasping a fountain pen to the tremendous scientific edifice which men have built up through years of patient study at microscope and test-tube, is whisked like Aladdin's palace into the realm of unreality. Without infallible senses, we have no right to put faith in the patent facts of life.

"The Itch for Concessions"

JOHN WILTBYE

PATRISTIC literature is among the remarkably large number of subjects of which, for all practical purposes, I know nothing at all. My sole recollection of the matter is the edifying relation of how a heretic, whom we shall call Impudens, accenting him on the second syllable, once placed himself squarely in the path of a venerable prelate whose name, since I cannot recall it, is immaterial. This heretic, as I take it, was not a mere harmless garden variety of heretic, such as may be seen of a clear day in the streets of any large city, but what is technically known as a vitandus, a banned by bell, book and candle heretic, and altogether a most deplorable person with whom no good Christian might lawfully hold converse save in extremis. Very likely, too, he lived up to his name, for it is said that "placing himself in the path of the man of God, 'Do you not know me?' he exclaimed." Now the time of the day is not stated; perhaps it was in those bad matutinal hours before coffee, when even Saints are a bit uncertain; or, mayhap, the venerable Father was wrothy at this rude interruption to his bright dreams of the heavenly Jerusalem; or, but this I advance with reserve, in his eagerness Impudens may have trespassed on the holy man's toes. These are but conjectures; happily, there is nothing conjectural about the dear man's answer. "Do I know you?" says he. "Yes, I know you for the very spawn of Satan."

This, in the language of the day, is putting the ball over the fence with the bases full. I mean to say, that it is an answer in no wise dubious or amphibological. You may question its justice; you cannot possibly quibble over its meaning. But figure the shock to the refined sensibilities of Impudens, the counterpart, no doubt, of a modern parson with ten thousand a year, a silk hat, spats, and a line in the Social Register: while the Father, belike, was a crude person with a parish "beyant the tracks," who "drank his tea with a good deal of expression from his saucer." Estimate, too, the hurt and the scandal to the "prominent Catholics" of the day, lordly descendants by one or two generations, of noble sires who had sutlered for Pompey, or on dubious errands bent, had lurked in the shadows of the Subura. Many a dinner table buzzed with gossip that night; many, too, who condescended to subscribe to the AMERICA of the time, called for tablets to write the Catholic Review of the Week, deploring the rude manners of the uncouth clergy, who like the Irish, had nothing but an undying love of the Faith and an uncompromising hatred of heresy. "If the social order and peace are disturbed by such rude flings," they deplored, "how are we to take our rightful place in society and the professions? We are devout Catholics, but let it be remembered that only a few years lie between us and the old persecuting edicts. Why rake up old scores? After all, there was fault on both sides." And the editor of that day smiled wanly as he corrected the spelling and dropped the communication into an asbestos copy-box. "Prominent Catholics" have not changed a great deal since that primitive period. They are diseased, and the disease is described very accurately by the great Dominican historian Denifle, in his "Luther and Lutherdom": "They have," he writes, "the itch for concessions."

I suppose the same truth may be expressed in Ignatian language by saying that these people have never really learned to think with the Church. Critical of the Church, they are very tender of heresy. They do not like fast days (in this I too am a "prominent Catholic") or beads, or popular devotions. They pass by the humility of the Little Sisters of the Poor and the heroic Sisters of the Good Shepherd, to aid associations which, while they may directly oppose the work of the Church, are "fashionable." They see no reason why some smooth professor, ignorant for all his degree and university chair, may not attack the Church and the things dearest to Catholic hearts; that is freedom of thought and speech; besides it is done with such excellent grace; but the Catholic apologist who answers the fool according to his folly is "ill-bred." Because a Catholic magazine refuses to play fast and loose with the canons of common-sense and with the Sixth and Eighth Commandments, they consider it "narrow," "propagandist," so unlike the doddering Inlook, and the subsidized New Democracy, which, indeed, it is. Their children, if they have any, never see the inside of a Catholic school, which is "unrefined," but pass, poor creatures, from ungodly establishments designed for the entertainment of the nouveau riche to the fashionable college, in which immorality is no concern of the authorities, and indifference to all religion is held to be the "open mind" without which progress is impossible. They favor mixed marriages for social and financial reasons; they smile on divorce and tolerate polygamy. Their names are on the list of no Catholic society, but they probably make an annual donation to the Y. M. C. A., a society founded principally for the propagation of heresy, which some of them declare "to be organized and instituted through the interposition of Divine Providence," a statement true only in the sense that God can turn all evils to the advantage of the good. They patronize the clergy when they do not, by indirection, calumniate them, and fly for cover at the first onslaught against the Church. They "mind earthly things," as St. Paul says, and what they seek is "peace"; not "that peace which the world cannot give," but very decidedly, the peace which the world professes to give. "To gain substantial practical advantages," writes Denifle, in the preface to the second edition of his great work on Luther, "or to strengthen civic peace between Catholics and Protestants, or on other grounds, a certain trend (class) cannot resist the temptation at least to weaken, if not to give up, Catholic principles, and to bridge over the gap, dogmatic and historical, which must necessarily separate the Catholic Church from Lutherdom," and from every heresy.

In other words, these "prominent Catholics," men and women afflicted with the "itch for concessions," exemplify in the religious sphere, all the despicable qualities of the "pacifist" who, to protect his miserable life and his more miserable possessions, sneers at the men who are willing to give up all they have in this our just war against oppression. With them, "peace" is the first necessity, a false, despicable peace, bought even at the price of receiving in silence the lowest calumnies against the Church and her institutions. Denifle's strictures on certain German Catholics apply with equal force to certain groups in our own country. Herrmann of Marburg, writes the Dominican, may speak of Catholicism as "a degenerate Christianity," and accuse the Church of "leading millions into moral ruin"; at Berlin, Harnack may assert that the Jesuits "are continually teaching persons to wallow in the mire of filth"; and "all this," comments Denifle, "is no disturbance of religious peace." But "the Catholic scholar who in all candor and sincerity critically proves their statements and then rejects them" is a firebrand, an indiscreet, unmannerly fellow, unacquainted with the usages of polite society!

No man of common-sense will deny that there is a time for silence as well as for speech; that prudence is a great virtue, and toleration the fine flower of charity. But what toleration really means, and when it becomes cowardice and disloyalty, has rarely been more strikingly expressed than in these words of the great Dominican scholar:

> [The Catholic Church] teaches her members, in their intercourse and dealings with those of other creeds, to exercise toleration and Christian charity—not to judge, despise or condemn any person. . . . [But] to be tolerant does not mean to be a lukewarm Catholic, such a Catholic as refrains from making an open confession of Faith, lest by so doing he offend or irritate the Protestants, and therefore hesitates to say openly: "I am a Catholic, I am a child of the Catholic Church, the Church of Christ." To be tolerant does not mean to repress and suppress one's religious confession, or to recognize all creeds as equal merely because the Government may say they are so. Least of all, to be tolerant does not mean to accept in silence the defamation and misrepresentation of Catholic doctrine. Catholics do not become intolerant, disturbers of the peace, who insist upon and defend the unity of their Church. As a matter of fact, they are merely defending themselves, and indeed they are under the most sacred obligation to defend their Church against the frightful misrepresentations of Protestants; should they fail in this, they would be nothing short of cowards and traitors. ("Luther and Lutherdom," Vol. I, Part I, p. XXXVI, English translation.)

Let us have cooperation, by all means, and as much love, too, as may be possible, for God knows we need all we can get of it—but not at the expense of hazarding Catholic principles. Too long has the thoroughly un-Catholic maxim that deeds, not creed, make the Christian, vitiated our otherwise healthy atmosphere. Have you a little "prominent Catholic" in your town? Treat him with charity, as Denifle advises; pray for him, but regard his works with a cautious eye. He is a "pacifist."

Death and Cremation

CHARLES PHILLIPS

NOVEMBER brings thoughts of death. In November the Church directs our minds to the grave; and nature herself points with the lean chill finger of decay to the melancholy leaf-strewn mound. Death is all about us now. We cannot escape it! But the sun shines even in November; and though now its pencil may be cold and silvery, instead of golden and warm, across the rotting leaf, nevertheless, it writes an immortal legend of life to be renewed. Non omnis moriar.

While it is a salutary thing to reflect on the mortal end of man, it is not well that there be too much brooding over death and its melancholy incidents. The grave may become to him who hides his face despondently and too long upon it, a mountain of grief, an insurmountable barrier between himself and life. He must learn to look beyond; for there are Heavenly horizons to be seen just the other side of every Calvary. It is to these that the Church beckons us when November comes.

But the world does not hear the voice of Mother Church, and will have nothing of her holy wisdom which turns the terrible into the beautiful. Instead the foolish world would be rid of the thought of death altogether. There is a strong tendency in the world today—it was always there, I suppose—to dismiss as completely as possible the serious thought of man's brief stay on earth; a tendency to shut out quickly the memory of death, to still the inner voice that speaks when the great silence falls in our presence, enveloping for eternity the form of some beloved friend or relative. In short, the world will have nothing to do, or at least, as little as possible, with such arresting thoughts and reflections as death brings to the human mind. The world wants to put such thoughts away, such questionings of immortality as inevitably rise from the grave-mound in the cemetery. So the poor world, in its blind folly, seeks to abolish graves altogether and all such melancholy reminders of man's mortal end, by resorting to the artful science, for it has become a veritable science, of incineration, cremation, the obliteration of the human form by means of fire. "Reduce the dead to a handful of ashes and scatter them on the four winds," says the world, "or shelve them in an urn in some imposing and abandoned columbarium, where they may repose in peace, and bother nobody."

Lately there has appeared in several newspapers in various cities an often-repeated advertisement of some local crematory, the wording of which would lead one to believe that there is a concerted movement afoot to "boost" cremation all over the country. Doubtless there is some national organization of those engaged in the business; and this organization is very likely carrying on an advertising campaign. The Catholic reader, firm in the teachings of the Church concerning the burial of the dead, might scarcely notice this advertisement or at best remark it only with the eye of curiosity, were it not for the fact that it pretends to carry an indorsement of cremation by Catholics, a palpable falsehood, but without question a source of danger to many.

The spread of these advertisements is but one sign of the growing popularity of cremation in this country. The war has given its little impetus to the movement, for the news of the wholesale burning of the dead on the battlefields of Europe has dulled the public mind to the horrors of incineration, and often gives rise to the remark, "That's the only thing anyway," or some similar sentence indicative of a "snap judgment" which weighs not at all the facts and circumstances of special cases.

The Christian can regard the progress of cremation in this country as but another sign of the advancing paganism of America. For cremation is essentially pagan, and will ever be abhorrent to the Christian mind. I do not say, of course, that all the people who resort to cremation in disposing of their dead are pagans; I do not accuse them of being un-Christian; nor do I claim that all are prompted by the foolish worldly desire to toss death aside, to run away and forget it, to scatter ashes to the winds or inurn them in a safe-deposit vault whither no one goes once the first necessary visit is paid. I do not say that it is always the motive of forgetfulness nor the desire to escape and evade the soul's persistent questionings as to immortality that prompts many good people to have the bodies of their departed burned. But the fact remains that cremation is pagan, historically so, clearly so, that it revolts the Christian heart, that it is not and cannot be indorsed by Catholics; and that, sad as the grave and its buried dead may be, cremation is more than sad, it is dreadful and horrible, and it is forbidden.

Catholics are forbidden to cremate their dead because, in the first place, as stated already, cremation is pagan. It had its origin in paganism. From the earliest days of Christianity, cremation has been set up in opposition to Christian burial. In the times of pagan persecution, the enemies of the Church, remembering no doubt the burial in a grave of our Divine Master Himself, often burned the remains of the Christian martyr, in the hope of destroying faith in the resurrection of the body. From the very beginning, then, cremation became antagonistic and abhorrent to the Christian mind, and was identified with enmity to Christ. But long before that, it was despised even by the more cultivated pagans. The Persians punished with death anyone who participated in the cremation of the dead. The most cultured Romans never recognized it as fitting or seemly, regarding it rather as barbarous. The Greeks could never wholly and entirely commit themselves to it. Through all history the burning of the dead had been looked upon askance.

It is strange, too, that in modern times as in ancient, cremation is indissolubly associated with enmity to religion. It owes its revival, in fact, to the materialistic forces which began fighting the Church fifty years ago in Italy and France. Freemasonry in the Latin countries, in the course of its warfare on Holy Church, openly adopted cremation as an affront to the Christian sepulture of Catholics. And today, say what you will, let never so many good people with the best of intentions advocate it, cremation remains inextricably mixed up with the public profession of irreligion, if not indeed with anti-religion of the worst sort.

So much for that phase of the problem. Cremation is forbidden, and for all good Catholics that is enough. But there is no law of the Church the wisdom of which cannot be demonstrated to the reasonable man. There are arguments in the matter of the burial of the dead which appeal to honest minds quite apart from Church discipline. For one thing, inhumation, the burial of the dead in graves, is not necessarily, as the protagonists of cremation argue, a source of unsanitary conditions and ill health. Graves do not contaminate the air or pollute the water-streams. These facts have been proved by scientific tests and demonstrations. Moreover, unlike burial, cremation offers a shield to crime which, did the burning of bodies become of universal usage, would be very dangerous to society: for the total destruction of the body removes all possible signs of violence, every evidence of unnatural death. This is a point that must be considered.

Besides, apart from the Christian reverence for the human body as the temple of the Holy Ghost, there are the common natural feelings to be considered, which should not be violated. To the Catholic, cremation is a horrible violation of nature. There is something diabolical in the almost electrical obliteration of the human form, in its reduction to ashes by fire in a brief space of time, by the preservation of those ashes in a fancy urn, or, as may be, in the tossing of them to the heedless winds. Far better, far more seemly and decent, far more natural and in accordance with the vast and majestic movements of nature herself, is the grave, wherein the body in the gentle course of time, is resolved again into the elements. The grave is noble and reverential. Cremation is shocking and unnatural. There is something heartless about it. We are children of tradition, and not all the sorrows of the grave can equal the dark strain which the fires of cremation sear into the memory of those who are left behind. Even if the ashes, as sometimes is the case, are in the end placed in the earth, with a grave-mound over them, to bloom into the lily and the rose, the cruel shock caused by giving to the flames a beloved form remains. Cremation leaves a sinister recollection to which the heart can never reconcile itself, unless indeed it be such a heart as seeks the easeful oblivion of forgetfulness.

November brings such thoughts as these. Mother Church, by her prayers and devotions, awakens them in our minds. And even mother nature with her leaf in the sere and her sodden earth, tells us what a serene and noble thing is death which the world in its folly would fain forget and shut away from sight. Non omnis moriar.

France's Catholicism

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The question of France's Catholicism keeps bobbing up continually, and Thomas F. Woodlock's summary treatment of it in AMERICA for October 27 is but one of the numerous and variegated attempts that are constantly being made to explain the triumph of a violent and persecuting atheism in Catholic France. France is Catholic, according to the census-takers. So are Portugal and Italy and Mexico. France gives more than any other nation to the Propagation of the Faith and the Holy Childhood. France sends more missionaries to the heathen than any other land. France has a large number of brilliant men to defend the Faith by speech and pen. France contains millions of good, devoted, faithful Catholics. There is a splendid revival of religion going on, as there is in every country at war.

But after all this has been granted, our surprise is all the more painful when the ugly fact stares us stubbornly and shamelessly in the face that Catholic France is crushed under the heel of a clique which robs churches, despoils convents, drives religious women into exile at the point of the bayonet, sends priests into the trenches to deal death and destruction, and does not even stop at robbing helpless orphans of their Faith. And no man or combination of men seems able even to stem these men in their vile work. Somehow, the numerous explanations how this state of things came about and how it is perpetuated under our very eyes are not altogether convincing.

If the able and influential Catholics of France devoted less time and energy to "explaining" their servitude in pathetic language to a wondering world, and girded themselves for a more virile fight against their despotic oppressors; if there were less talk and more deeds on their part, they would, perhaps, be masters and not slaves. Would any government in America or England or Germany, Protestant countries all, dare today to treat Catholic priests, Sisters, children, as the French Government has done and goes on doing year after year, and be able to live? The answer is a grim, emphatic no. We have been surfeited with mawkish sentimentality. The slightly modernized paraphrase of St. Ignatius' words: God helps those who help themselves, is a good motto to act upon with iron determination. And it will lead to results, in France as elsewhere, that are self-explanatory and that speak louder than words.

Dr. O'Malley and Osteopathy

To the Editor of AMERICA:

As a chiropractor I most earnestly protest against the wild assumptions of Dr. O'Malley's. I am certain the good doctor is speaking, not of his knowledge, but of his prejudice. It is hardly fair for a man who is supposed to possess a scientific training not to use it even in the discussion of chiropractic. Now, the basis of science is facts, and in Dr. O'Malley's strictures, assumptions replace facts. So far as I am concerned none of the assumptions fit. I can assure Dr. O'Malley that chiropractors are not a "disgrace to Christianity," but a tremendous boon to humanity. Chiropractors do not "maltreat defenseless children," neither do they "manhandle women." Indeed there is absolutely no immodest ordeal whatsoever in submitting to a chiropractic adjustment or analysis of the spine. No local examination internal or external is necessary, the cause of the patient's trouble is located by merely palpating the spine and nothing else. Chiropractors are not "ambitious barbers" nor "bankrupt druggists," neither do they "rob the ignorant." If I may be pardoned for saying so, I gave up a business that was paying me three hundred dollars a week and more to take up chiropractic as a result of my being cured by chiropractic after many reputable physicians had failed. I also know many regularly educated physicians who have left the practice of medicine for chiropractic and who are now able to get results in cases that formerly baffled them.

Why are there over 700 students at the Palmer School of Chiropractic, with a clinic of approximately 1,500 persons per day? Why does State after State recognize chiropractic? Why is it that this new science is spreading like wildfire?

Famous people like C. G. Conn, wind instrument maker; ex-Governor W. D. Hoard of Wisconsin; Charles M. Schwab, president of Bethlehem Steel Co.; Clara Barton, mother of the Red Cross; Opie Read, the author; Elbert Hubbard; Congressmen Gray (Ind.); Hamlin (Miss.); Thomas (Ohio); Campbell (Kansas); Anderson (Ohio); Kinkead (Neb.); Griggs (Ga.); Lever (S. C.); Prince (Ill.); Ausberry (Ohio); Padgett (Tenn.); Miller Reese Hutchinson, head of Thomas A. Edison laboratories; John Temple Graves, editor New York American; John D. Rockefeller, of the Standard Oil Co., and Sir Rabindranath Tagore, the only man in literature who ever received the Nobel Prize, cannot be called ignorant, and they probably have sense enough not to be robbed. These people and thousands of others are enthusiastic for the science that made it possible for them to be restored to health. And it might be well to state that chiropractors do not claim to "cure" disease; they make it possible by rectifying the spine and taking pressure from spinal nerves for nature to restore the body to its norm. Nature does the work; we are merely her partners.

I am familiar, through conscientious and careful study, with several systems of healing, including osteopathy, electro-therapeutics, diet cures, etc., beside being originally educated for medicine. I have found no system that can compare with chiropractic. Chiropractic is the only science which reaches and removes the cause of disease and if Dr. O'Malley desires, I will gladly furnish him with conclusive proof of many hundreds of cases, where health was restored by chiropractic adjustments after they had been given up by the regular medical physicians.

Chiropractic may be a "vagary" in the mind of Dr. O'Malley, but I can assure him that there are many thousands of brainy, hard-headed people like those in the small list above, that believe and know that it is something far more; that it can do all that drug treatment will do and infinitely more. Finally the doctor's attention may be called to the fact that it is not many years ago that "ambitious barbers" and "bankrupt druggists" could be physicians. Chiropractors do not fear criticism, but it must be intelligent criticism based upon facts and not assumptions. In the interest of suffering humanity and for the good of progressive science it would be well for Dr. O'Malley to "investigate" chiropractic before publicly denouncing it.

Waterbury, Conn. FRANCESCO X. SAUCHELLI, D. C.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In fairness to osteopathy it should be stated that it now requires a four-years' course of study to make an osteopath, and that if, at the end of that time, he is still ignorant, the fault is not in his schooling, but in himself. The same may be said of any profession. The course of study is identical with that used in any first-class medical college, with the exception that the course in the prescription of drugs is usually omitted and osteopathic principles and practice substituted. For the sake of clearness, let me add that osteopathic students study all branches of medicine, including diagnosis, surgery, obstetrics, eye, ear, nose and throat, etc. The difference between the doctor of medicine and the osteopath is both in the methods of diagnosis and of treatment.

The osteopath uses all of the methods of diagnosis that are in use in medical circles, supplementing them by his own special technique, and claims that he thereby has an advantage. This claim is not meant to imply that all osteopaths are good diagnos-ticians. The ability to do good work as an osteopath or a doctor of medicine depends upon one's knowledge, experience and judgment; but the trained touch of the osteopath enables him to discover anatomical changes in the spine, which aid him substantially in his diagnosis and the correction of which forms a very important part of his treatment.

Dr. O'Malley's position is consistent with the general attitude of professional men in objecting to the introduction of new principles. Suggest to an army officer a departure from established military tactics, and he opposes it. Witness America's refusal to adopt the submarine and the aeroplane until they became indispensable in the European war. The doctors of medicine have accepted some radical changes in their methods of treating diseases; but the source of those changes must always be from within, never from without. Some of the osteopathic tenets are now being "discovered" by a doctor of medicine and are passively accepted.

The greatest field of development in the medical profession in the past century is surgery. A majority of surgical operations consist in the removal of obstructions to the human mechanism. In other words, the chief progressive strides have been along mechanical, rather than medicinal lines. There are numerous cases, not surgical, in which the body mechanism is obstructed, whether through the insufficient flow of blood or of nerve energy to an organ, which the osteopath reaches by mechanical manipulation. The proportion of these cases is so large that it has opened up a wide and constantly increasing field for osteopathy, now supporting some 7,000 practitioners.

Magazines for Camps

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A great many people fail to realize that the men of our new national army were but a few weeks ago in all walks of civil life, as clerks, bookkeepers, mechanics and laborers, and that most of them are used to the good things in life. Therefore magazines, months old and in some cases over a year old, which are being daily sent to the K. of C. recreation camps are of little use. It is a small thing for some individuals and all organizations to subscribe for one or more copies of current magazines and have them sent direct from the publishers. Good magazines of a late date are, of course, acceptable if promptly mailed to the camps by the subscribers, but if not sent for weeks, they lose their value. I have just received two packages from a man who spent more than a dollar to mail to the camp magazines which are of little or no value. The money could have been well spent in sending copies of current magazines or in purchasing a subscription.

Camp Custer, Mich. THEO. A. THOMA,
Assistant Secretary, K. of C.

An Ex-Governor and a Chaplain

To the Editor of AMERICA:

An incident of interest to all readers of AMERICA has just come to the writer's attention. It illustrates in a very practical way some real service which, in the present crisis, an individual can do for the comfort of a large number of his fellow-men.

This is, briefly, the incident. The general complaint and dissatisfaction caused by the lack of commissioned army chaplains was brought to the attention of the Honorable David I. Walsh, former Governor of Massachusetts. Moved by the pleading of hundreds of Catholic boys encamped at Westfield, Massachusetts, in two regiments, forming one army brigade, the ex-Governor exerted himself to aid them.

Having had, not as of right but through courtesy, the benefits of a Catholic priest with the brigade, during their encampment, it suddenly dawned upon the Catholic soldiers, as they were leaving nightly, in small detachments, for service elsewhere, that they were no longer to have the spiritual comforts of their religion, for their volunteer and unpaid chaplain having no commission could not accompany them; indeed he had no more standing than any other civilian, and, of course, could not follow them with any protection or rights.

These two regiments numbered over 8,000 men, of whom nearly 5,000 were Catholics. They were receiving final training at Westfield, preparatory to sailing for "Somewhere in France"; in fact, when the matter was brought to the ex-Governor's notice, a large number had already left.

These regiments, according to army regulations, had only one chaplain each, both being non-Catholics. They had been appointed and had served, when these same regiments were part of the Massachusetts National Guard. When the National Guard was enlarged in numbers, the character of its "make up" was, of course, greatly changed, but no increase or change in chaplains was made or permitted under army regulations. In fact, the army regulations allowed the appointing of only one chaplain for each regiment. In time of peace, it was one chaplain to every 1,200 men; in this war, it has become one to every 3,600 men. When the ex-Governor received the petition of these thousands of Catholic boys, through their leaders at the camp, he dropped his personal affairs, and hastened to Washington. There he enlisted the aid of Father L. O'Hern, C.S.P. He found the usual difficulties, when hasty action in a single matter is sought. He also learned that army regulations barred the appointment of another chaplain to these regiments. He returned at once to Massachusetts, and began an inquiry into what could be done. He found that when the Ninth (Catholic) Regiment left Massachusetts, a precedent was established by having a Protestant chaplain assigned with it from another regiment, though the regiment was overwhelmingly Catholic and already had a commissioned (Catholic) chaplain.

He learned that there was a vacancy in a New Hampshire regiment. To this vacancy he had a Catholic chaplain appointed. With the proper military papers, he returned to Washington, presented the application, and after considerable trouble, he succeeded in getting the desired chaplain's commission. He did more than that; in no uncertain terms he let the military officials at Washington know what it means to Catholic parents and Catholic soldiers to have the ministration of a Catholic chaplain.

Returning to Massachusetts, the ex-Governor succeeded, by citing the precedent established in the case of the Ninth Massachusetts, in having the newly appointed chaplain assigned to serve abroad with the brigade leaving Westfield for foreign service. It is a climax, true to facts, that the negotiations were completed and the transfer of chaplain finally made only one hour before the last batch of our boys in the two Westfield regiments were on their way to "Somewhere in France," and the anxious chaplain (anxious because of his devotion to his camp parishioners) received his orders over the telephone just in time to accompany the last of the brigade.

Safely, and thankfully too, we can say that no act of ex-Governor Walsh during his active career caused more real satisfaction to hundreds of brave boys; and surely no act of his was ever rewarded by more frequent prayers of still more satisfied and grateful mothers.

It is of interest to note that the man appointed was the Rev. George S. L. Connor, distinguished by his excellent work, rendered gratuitously, to the Massachusetts boys on the Mexican border. Father Connor, like the ex-Governor, is a Holy Cross graduate.

If more of our prominent Catholic men would imitate the ex-Governor's example, they could, by sacrificing a little time and money, lend their valuable strength, and at the right time make Catholic wishes respected, and help to protect the faith of our Catholic soldiers.

Religious Freedom and the Constitution.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In a recent communication to AMERICA, William Price of New Orleans writes, referring to the opinion of the Attorney-General of Oklahoma that the prohibition laws of that State forbid the use of wine even for Sacramental purposes:

> Our national Attorney-General Gregory has an extremely serious and honest countenance, to judge from current newspaper portraiture. Does he perhaps take cognizance of the flagrant subversion of the Federal guarantees granting freedom of worship?

Where does Mr. Price get the idea that there are any "Federal guarantees granting freedom of worship"? The Federal Constitution "grants" nothing to the States. The States have granted certain powers to the Federal government, but the Federal government can "grant" nothing to the States, because the Constitution plainly provides that all powers not delegated to the Federal government are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. Religious freedom is a matter that the States alone may regulate. The States have prohibited Congress from establishing a religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, but there is no Federal prohibition against the States doing that very thing. All that the Federal Constitution has to say on religion may be found in Section 3, Article VI: "No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States," and in the First Amendment: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof."

There are therefore no "Federal guarantees granting freedom of worship." The very fact that so many believe, with Mr. Price, that all our liberties have descended from the Federal Constitution, and that all our "rights" have been "granted" by that instrument, is largely responsible for the existence of such laws as Mr. Price criticizes. What we Americans should do is to stop talking about "Federal guarantees," especially those which do not exist, and concern ourselves a little more practically with our duties as citizens of the States in which we live.

Mr. Connolly and White Slavery

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The charges made against Catholics regarding the "white slavery" problem in New York, in Mr. Connolly's letter in your issue of September 22, seem, on the surface, true enough. In the larger cities the attitude of many of us is, apparently, one of apathy toward that grave problem. Is there not, however, a great deal done by Catholics, either as individuals or in parish organizations, toward lessening this evil, both by preventive and curative means? The nature of the problem often demands quiet, unobtrusive methods, if real assistance is to be rendered.

Then, too, there has been a general reluctance on the part of Catholics to band together as such in protesting against any civic conditions, and, in fact, to enter the civic limelight at all. I chanced to be brought up in an environment where Catholics were decidedly in the minority. Part of my childhood training impressed upon me the necessity of respect for the religious beliefs of my companions, and included somehow the idea that we must never let our Catholicism display itself in the presence of others, our silence being, as it were, the price exacted for the privilege of practising our religion! A bad atmosphere in which to make flourish a militant Catholic spirit? Undoubtedly. But may there not be many of this same generation who were in similar surroundings in their earlier days? There still exists the type of non-Catholic, doubtless sincere, but a quarter of a century behind time in his data on Catholic practices, aims and achievements, even in his own city, who greets every Catholic-organized movement as a sure sign of the menace of "Romish" monopoly which threatens his broad land. May not these conditions account in part for the reluctance on the part of Catholics to become identified publicly with the "white slavery" investigation?

However, let us not for these reasons refuse our aid to those in such dire need of help, within our very gates. Those who are not at heart apathetic should lend their assistance to this movement by a Catholic organization which shall publicly declare itself for the defeat of this wretched traffic, and shall work for the aid of its victims by individual Catholic cooperation with other groups. The matter of ways and means to carry out the purpose of such a movement is left to those more experienced than myself.

Philadelphia. M. E.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have no brief for the defense of Mr. Connolly, but I think Father Blakely's strictures are due to a misapprehension. He is shooting a straw man. Mr. Connolly's complaint is not against the moral training of our parochial schools, the religious formation in our convents or the usefulness of the Houses of the Good Shepherd. All this, I take it, he admits, though he might with some reason find fault with the hot-house system of a good many of our Catholic academies in charge of Sisters, so alarmingly good, but so wofully ignorant of the world today and its needs.

What he complains of, very justly too, it seems to me, is the clerical and lay apathy on the part of Catholics in the present-day widespread movements tending towards the protection of women and the social and moral betterment of the poor. Surely, Father Blakely's "tom-tom at Forty-second Street and Broadway" to the contrary notwithstanding, it is as certain that these endeavors have done much good, as it is certain that we Catholics, priests and lay, have kept aloof, where we have not been critical and condemnatory in our attitude.

Look over the lists of men and women who are self-sacrificingly giving time and money, and you will look in vain for an appreciable number of Bishops, priests or Catholic laity, who seem willing to lend even the influence of their names to movements which have done much to safeguard womanhood from the greed and passion of men, and to ameliorate the admitted debasing condition of the workingman and the poor. The children of our schools and the pupils of our convents leave the protecting care of the Sisters, almost as ignorant as babes of the conditions they have to cope with today, and laudable and self-sacrificing efforts made by the hundreds of zealous, though not Catholic, men and women to protect and safeguard these innocents and others, are met with destructive criticism and often condemnation, and seldom, if ever, by a word of encouragement, and still less by a dollar contribution.

Mr. Connolly's contention is, I take it, that if we Catholics were more public-spirited, if we would, where possible, join our fellow-citizens in movements which are for the social betterment and the protection of women, as well as for the uplift of the poor, then there would be fewer inmates in the Houses of the Good Shepherd. At the same time, such an interest would put us in a much better light before our non-Catholic fellow-countrymen. Our parochial schools are excellent, our Houses of the Good Shepherd are an unspeakable blessing. Mr. Connolly denies neither one nor the other. He maintains, and truly, that there are other social efforts from which we hold aloof, and by so doing tend to emphasize the necessity of the Good Shepherd institutions, even to multiply them.

The New York Elections

NOW that the New York polls are closed, it is to be hoped that an ingenuous coreligionist of the defeated candidate for re-election to the office of Mayor may speak on certain moral issues without turning the dying swan song of the City Hall into a no-Popery cry that would do credit to Exeter Hall or to a Georgia forest that is visited now and then by a strong-voiced revivalist intent on promoting religious prejudice in return for a condescending pat on his downy cheek by an opulent patron.

The fundamental issue was democracy against plutocracy, the workmen against vested, predatory wealth that had found a ready tool for the further extension of its plans. An outraged citizenry, scandalized by excesses as notorious as they are shameful, stood in contest against a group of scornful millionaires who have come to view souls as pawns in the game of high finance—and the citizens won. Their victory is the more remarkable because, true to form, the vast majority of the metropolitan papers played mimes to the "money-bund," which dominates them even to the echo. The manner in which they suppressed and distorted truth was no surprise to those acquainted with the details of the recent charities investigation, but that they should have done their best to hide and then to belittle the primary frauds and to cloud the issue in the case of the bogus ballots, is amazing, especially in view of their protestations that America must spend its last dollar and give its last drop of available blood to extend the blessings of democracy to the world. Is democracy to be destroyed by a venal press at home and conferred on aliens at the cost of American lives? The vote of the people and the indictments found by the Grand Jury are the answer, and the response must be consoling to those who were calumniated in the opening months of 1916.

Two of the most abhorrent features of this campaign were the vile use to which the flag was put and the manner in which the sects threw themselves into the political arena. For a candidate to wrap himself in the national emblem and prance madly from borough to borough, bellowing treason at all who disagree with him, is too base for characterization. It is significant that up to date 494,143 citizens of New York are traitors, for that number is known to have voted against the painted patriot. How pleasant to contemplate that the already deluded people of Germany will soon be told that the metropolis of the United States voted overwhelmingly against the war. This is comfort to the enemy with a vengeance!

But worse still was the response of the sects to the bait thrown before the mouths of their spokesmen. About a year since a properly prompted melodramatic actor, the defeated candidate for re-election, declared that the Church must not put its hands on the altar of the State, and that the State would not put its hands on the altar of the Church. The elections are over, and the imprint of that man's hands and feet and face are on many a communion table, but, thank goodness, no altar is stained by them. He or his satellites did everything he accused others of doing. He harangued parsons, his managers or friends besought priests, and even Sisters, to speak for him; wry-faced dames, dressed like Geisha girls ready for the dance, infested the office of at least one Catholic paper, and went to Catholic schools and houses whining for votes for him. On one Sunday thirteen ministers and two Protestant bishops canonized him, one of the former group declaring that the contest lay between "dirt and decency." Poor New York, its dirty citizens are legion, but then there is hope—the parson is alive and the water supply is copious. But though the priests were silent, colporteurs, or some such penny-mad creatures, entered Catholic churches and in the mighty name of two and one-half exiled descendants of the last King of Kerry, or some other shadowy but royal figment, filled the pews with a pamphlet apparently conceived under a blanket and written on the moon. The effect was silence all around. For even those of us who are deaf, dumb, blind, stupid and in the state of grace realized that our beloved coreligionist would like nothing better than to raise another no-Popery cry to the delight of the ungodly and his own profit. God always has His day, and the outraged Church and the calumniated priests and Sisters and the souls of the poor unfortunate lambs of the flock have been vindicated on earth. Another vindication will come hereafter.

The First Blood

THE army of the United States has been in action, it has had its baptism of fire, it has spilled its blood on the soil of France. Everywhere American hearts have thrilled at the thought, and everywhere they are cherishing the hope that the blood, so generously and so bravely shed, may spring up in perfect freedom and lasting peace for all the world. This at least is the motive that sweetens the crucible of pain. So great is the gain, that no one grudges the cost. But whether we attain this object fully or only partially, we have the reasonable assurance that we ourselves shall reap from our participation in the war an immense spiritual profit. The United States, like the nations of Europe, in losing its life, will find it; and our country and our countrymen will come out of the conflict, not only gloriously victorious, chastened and ennobled by suffering, but also—Who knows?—with a new-found faith in God.

These are the consoling thoughts, but the first fruits of war bring with them grim reflections as well. Patriotism, a thing so lightly accepted in time of peace when the advantage is almost wholly on the side of the citizen, takes on a sterner aspect when it demands, as a just return, that considerations of self and family shall be resolutely subordinated to the larger considerations of country. No one denies that our first duty now is to our native land. All of us find our individual interests paling and dwindling in the presence of the greater interests of the nation. Reason and religion both enjoin on us, now that we are at war, total sacrifice of self. For this sacrifice our Faith, from which the shadow of the Cross is never absent, schools us by its teaching and its discipline, and by its consecration of our patriotism to God as something sublime, something sacred, something akin to martyrdom. Catholics have learned the lesson, even without the urging of their pastors. Too often have they thought of Christ dying for His people, to shrink in their own day of trial, from, be it said with all reverence and with due restrictions, a somewhat similar renunciation in a somewhat similar cause.

In the Shadows

"THE sun is setting to thee," wrote John Donne, "and that forever." But "it is His hand that loves thee best hangs tremblingly over thee to close thine eyes." In far-off Florence there died some weeks ago a valiant woman, the sister of a Protestant Bishop, the late Dr. Potter of New York, who through many tribulations entered into the Church of God. The great gift thus vouchsafed her grew dearer with the years, but faith does not always hide from gentle eyes the fears that rise up in life, a hazard, at once, and a challenge to brave souls. So in the heart of this good woman was a grisly apprehension of the possibility that she might be buried alive! To her, as to others, came the thought of guarding against this terror by cremation. But she was a Catholic, and there is a ring of pathos in her will, "I die a member of the Catholic Church, but if the permission of the Church can by any possibility be obtained, I wish my body to be cremated." One feels that the spirit of sacrifice and resignation thus expressed so wrought with Him whom through Our Lord's teaching we call "Father," that the supreme test which she so much dreaded, was not asked of her. "It is His hand that loves thee best hangs tremblingly over thee to close thine eyes," the eyes of a woman who after penning her great fear, wrote to her "dearest children":

> God guide and guard you always. Honor for men, chastity for women, fidelity to duty, faith in God, strict observance of religion. May our blessed God keep you in His love and truth till death.

"The sun is setting to thee and that forever." But it is only the sun of a lesser system, blank darkness set against the brightness of the glory of Christ, to be revealed to hearts that trust and love. "Whom I myself shall see and my eyes shall behold," writes holy Job. This is the consolation left to those who remain to mourn, yet not as those who are without hope.

Help for Armenia

IT is a consolation to know that the United States had no part in those self-seeking policies which established Turkey in a position to harass and massacre with impunity the inoffensive and guiltless Armenians, and which maintained her in that position in spite of crimes that outraged the world's sense of humanity. The balance of power, involving the necessity or the expediency of tolerating outrageous attacks on innocent men, women and children, which has proved so fatal a snare, could not hope for the blessing of God. Nevertheless, although we have not been responsible, even indirectly, for the present sufferings of Armenia, we are aware of those sufferings and we have heard the President's appeal for aid in alleviating them.

Our country is now launched on a soul-wrenching endeavor to make the world safe for democracy. To that end we are spending untold treasure and preparing to sacrifice countless lives. And the glory of such an enterprise can scarcely be overestimated. Mere existence, however, comes before ideal existence. And if we are to save the Armenians from the horrors of wretched tyranny, we must first save them from death. They are starving. A great people is disappearing from the face of the earth, because it has no bread, no shelter from the elements, no means of sustaining life.

It is characteristic of our people that they should have hastened to afford relief. The Armenian and Syrian Relief Committee, 1 Madison avenue, New York City, an organization, inspired by true charity, which makes no distinction of creeds and wastes no funds in providing lucrative posts for grasping uplifters, is soliciting money with which to keep alive the spark of life in helpless, hopeless Armenia. No part of the contributions is used for the support of the organization. Publicity and administrative costs are defrayed by generous friends; and those who give out of their generosity have the assurance that the entire amount of their benefaction will be devoted to the object for which it is given. The sum of $4,000,000 has already been raised. But it was soon expended, and again little children are stretching out tiny hands begging for food. It is now proposed to raise $50,000,000. The sacrifice of a passing pleasure will go a great way towards saving a human life. AMERICA earnestly recommends this worthy charity to its readers.

Corporations and the Government

A DECISION of unusual interest was handed down by Mr. Justice McKenna in the Supreme Court of the United States on November 5. In November, 1913, an inquiry into the alleged political activities of the Louisville and Nashville Railway was authorized by the Senate. During a hearing before the Interstate Commerce Commission in May, 1917, the officers of this corporation steadfastly refused to give information in regard to certain sums of money said to have been taken from the operating and construction funds, and devoted to "political uses" in Kentucky, Tennessee and Alabama. The recent decision confirms the right of the Commission to this information. "It is not far from true," observes the Justice, "it may be entirely true as said by the Commission, that there can be nothing private or confidential in the activities and expenditures of a carrier engaged in interstate commerce."

We are not disposed to say that a carrier may not attempt to mold or enlighten public opinion, but we are quite clear that its conduct and the expenditure of its funds are open to inquiry. If it may not rest inactive and suffer injustice, it may not, on the other hand, use its funds and its power in opposition to the policies of the Government.

This rule may be rightly applied to every society and corporation. Corporations, like individuals, have an undoubted right to present, by lawful means, their side in any controversy. The difficulty lies in the fact that many corporations seem disposed to employ unlawful means; to present arguments not based so much upon reason and justice, as upon appeals to cupidity and dishonesty. President Wilson has warned us not to deceive ourselves "for a moment as to the power of the great interests that dominate our development. They are so great that it is almost a question whether the Government can dominate them or not." Nor can the moneyed Foundations be exempted from what they have not as yet felt, the most minute governmental inspection and regulation. Because of their apparently philanthropic purposes, these Foundations have largely escaped the suspicion that has attached to the more purely commercial corporations. "Go one step further," writes the President, "and it may be too late to turn back." For in that moment, "we are no longer a government . . . by conviction and the vote of the majority, but a government by the opinion and duress of small groups of dominant men." The City of New York has recently escaped, at least for a time, the peril of this undemocratic form of government. Nevertheless the danger has not been completely removed either from the metropolis or from the country at large. Even in these serious days of preparation for war, there should be no slackening of the war against the possibility of "government by the opinion and duress of small groups of dominant men."

An Insult and a Retort

IN the spirit of manliness and service to its patrons AMERICA is always open to criticism no matter how severe. Gross and continuous insult of its editors, however, is quite another thing, and will not be accepted even from people who condescended to be created on the double condition that God would always be beholden to them for their courtesy and would use the finest obtainable clay in their composition.

This determination to check the aforesaid gratuitous display of a peculiarly supercilious vulgarity has prompted the publication of the subjoined correspondence:

Hotel Touraine, Boston,
2d Nov., 1917.

To the Editors of AMERICA:
Rev'd & Dear Sirs:

I have sent my cheque today renewing subscription to AMERICA: but I desire to send also a very brief note, expressing the earnest hope that my subscription may not be understood as at all equivalent to hearty endorsement of the policy, or of no inconsiderable part of the matter published by that paper hitherto.

I take it for its helps towards getting news of Cath. events and opinion in this country at this time; and for some of the teachings—chiefly such as are to be found among contributed papers and letters. Also in hope that henceforth better than heretofore, it may serve the cause of Cath. Truth and religion, as also real honesty and candour and of genuine patriotism.

Yours very respectfully,
HUNTINGTON RICHARDS, M.D.

And the retort was:

HUNTINGTON RICHARDS, M.D.,
Hotel Touraine, Boston, Mass.

SIR: I am returning herewith your check with the request that you drop your subscription to AMERICA and desist from reading the paper. The yearly insensate insult that you see fit to transmit with your request for the renewal of your subscription is dear at any price and entirely too dear at three dollars. Moreover I should be ashamed to have Catholics know that AMERICA numbered among its patrons a man so devoid of Catholic instinct that he wrote these words to a company of devoted priests: "Also in hope that henceforth better than heretofore it (AMERICA) may serve the cause of Catholic truth and religion (sic) as also of real honesty and candor and of genuine patriotism."

For the rest, sir, I thank you for your delicate courtesy and commit myself and the associate editors to your prayers. For, after all, not to have been obliged to get rid of the scurf of heresy may possibly be detrimental to intellectual and moral appreciation of the Catholic religion. Birth into a Catholic home, training therein, and long years of preparation for the priesthood may have resulted in ignorance of Catholic truth or infidelity thereto. As for "genuine" patriotism, it is quite impossible for us to have it. Our ancestors were unfamiliar with the "steerage of the Mayflower"; as a consequence our patriotism is real, a thing of helpful deeds as contrasted with the impertinent words of those who imagine they discharge their duty to the country by accusing others of disloyalty.

I am concerned, sir, that you accept the expression of my esteem.

R. H. TIERNEY, Editor.

It is to be hoped that when Huntington Richards, M.D., of Boston, and the Editor of AMERICA meet they will smile and bow and pass on unhurt.

Literature

WASHINGTON IRVING

IN this breathless, automatic age of rapid transit and quick lunch, of fireless cookers and instantaneous breakfast foods, of Marconigrams and speedomoters, of self-winding watches, self-starting autos and self-propelling torpedoes, of first-aids and efficiency engineers, of Chautauqua universities-under-canvas and people's-colleges-on-wheels, of "canned" music and vers libre, of thumbnail science, nut-shell philosophy, five-minute sermons, vest-pocket essays, hat-band histories, biograph briefs, tabloid tales, romances in miniature and French-at-a-glance, who has time or inclination for a leisurely, albeit genial, old gentleman with his back to the future and his fine-frenzied eye rolling in reverie over a forgotten past?

For such was the figure Irving most affected. "John Old-style" was his nom de guerre in youth. Later, like some old manorial worthy, in doublet and scarlet hose, beruffed, bewigged, bepowdered, the very pattern of gentility, stepping down from a portrait in "Bracebridge Hall," he played the laudator temporis acti over the richly reminiscent pseudonym of "Geoffrey Crayon, Gent." In the rôle of grizzled antiquary and recluse, he launched that colossal hoax, "Knickerbocker's History of New York."

Before Irving's fame was established, Sydney Smith, in the Edinburgh Review, could fling the mordant taunt, "Who ever read an American book?" But when "The Sketch Book" burst upon England, the author was lifted to the immortals by acclamation. Godwin found in him everywhere "marks of a mind of the utmost elegance and refinement, a thing as you know I was not exactly prepared to look for in an American." Thackeray hailed him as "the first ambassador from the New World of Letters to the Old." Byron, true to type, wept over "The Broken Heart." Later on, Dickens wrote that he kept a full set of Irving constantly before him, dipping into him daily and deeply, and always with unending delight. In that very ark and sanctuary of romance, the storied hall at Abbotsford, the Laird himself, Sir Walter, with his wife by his side and his collies at his feet, "laughed himself sore" reading aloud tales of "elephantine facetiousness" out of Knickerbocker's New York. From the realm of efficiency and matter-of-fact, on the other hand, might be cited, as the world's classic example of pachydermatous insensibility to fun, the grave proceeding of Goeller, a German editor of Thucydides, who in his notes on the celebrated disquisition in the second book on stasis and the spirit of factious sedition in Greece, invoked as parallels, Guelf and Ghibelline in Italy, and the factions of "Long-pipes" and "Short-pipes" in New Amsterdam under Peter Stuyvesant's administration.

Like Chateaubriand in France, whom he strangely resembles, Irving was America's first reflection of the great romantic wave that swept the world when the "Age of Reason" and of the "Rights of Man" had spent itself. In reaction from the old order and the Revolution in France, from the frigid formalism of eighteenth-century England, and the restless democratic movement at home, literature was discovering that man had a heart and loved to soar on wings of fantasy in the golden age when knighthood was in flower and the world was younger and less sordid than in an era irresponsive to chivalrous inspiration and so clamorous for its rights. In the first fervor of the time abroad, interest in antiquities, in forgotten customs and ideas revived, nature was almost pantheistically adored, sentimentality triumphed over common-sense; the musty, historic atmosphere overstimulated both imagination and emotion.

Romance is the key-note to Irving's work. But he always contrived to keep himself heart-whole and fancy-free; his romanticism had none of the extravagances of the French school; his raptures were more akin to Wordsworth's "emotion recollected in tranquillity." His mind's eye loved to rove in quiet reverie; his head was like a happy, though haunted, house; ghosts and goblins, sprites and specters were the delights of his hours of musing; his literary life was one long "fond, melancholy, delicious dream." A true romantic, too, he was in temperament; always the "genial" Irving, yet given to "fits of Lethean gloom"; in the mood, he could write feverishly and furiously for days on end; then his pen would rest and rust for months.

An idler and dreamer and saunterer from his cradle, he early confessed to a "fatal propensity to belles-lettres." Bred on Robinson Crusoe and Sinbad the Sailor, devouring books of voyage and exploration, testing his pinions early with Orlando Furioso, he loved to loaf alongshore, and with longing eyes watch the "parting ships," the "slow, diminishing barks" and to dream of roaming to the ends of the earth. All his work is in a sense autobiographical; so well does it betray the man. Ichabod Crane, who with his appetite for the marvelous had the "digestive properties of an anaconda," embodies Irving's own predilections. Of those endearing ne'er-do-wells, Dolph Heyliger and Rip Van Winkle, he might have said, "There goes Irving but for the grace of God and the family funds." In his Oliver Goldsmith, he found a literary vagabond after his own heart. For the Squire and Master Simon in "Bracebridge Hall," he had but to hold the mirror up to nature in his own gracious, whimsical, mirth-dripping heart. Much had he himself "traveled in the realms of gold" before he followed the companions of Columbus over the Spanish main.

The romantic wanderlust gripped Irving early. In an era when a man who had visited Europe was pointed out as a curiosity on the streets, he sought out in England the "tombs of his fathers and the cradle of his race." From its Gothic piles, its ivy-mantled ruins, its rural mansions, its ancestral festivities and its patriarchal state, his glowing sympathies, his pathos, his humor and kindling imagination caught and preserved for us the fragrance of other days in those delightful "sketches" that must always remain among the first half-dozen masterpieces of American prose.

Into Spain, to the native heath of chivalry and romance, he led a long line of illustrious American men of letters—Longfellow, Lowell, Prescott, Motley, Howells and Hay. Like René, in the same vicinity, bewailing le dernier Abencérage, Irving sat amid the ravaged splendors of Granada and wept over the fallen fortunes of the Moor. Never was his romantic genius more congenially at home, more copiously fired and fused to inspiration than the winter he lodged in an echoing hall of the enchanted palace of the Alhambra. Amid the memorials of the Faith, of Catholic zeal and Spanish patriotism in the Saracenic campaigns, he displayed an amused and amusing tolerance, fair on the whole, though edged and pointed on occasion with a dash of the envenomed raillery of Voltaire.

In accents overstrained, perhaps, to modern taste, he touched the depths of romantic pathos in such tales as "The Wife," "The Widow and Son," "The Pride of the Village" and "The Broken Heart," or in that story of measureless remorse, "The Young Italian Gentleman." Though extremes meet, though tragedy and comedy are never far apart and laughter and tears intermingle closely in life, few writers of the romantic era displayed funds of humor so unfailing. "The Knickerbocker Legend," as it has been called, will survive as Irving's most original contribution to American letters. Long before the stories that made the Rhine romantic had been collected and given to the world, that youthful indiscretion, the "History of New York," had thrown about the Hudson all the glamor and the glory of romance. Finding no ruins at home, no age of chivalry on the Island of the Manhattoes, his romantic muse, in mock-heroic flight, proceeded to "manufacture antiquity and attach it forcibly to New York." Out of the old Dutch traditions and the legend-laden scenery of the Hudson, he concocted that rich farrago of fact, fancy and ironical farce that still remains, save for an occasional indelicacy, unrivaled as a fountain of fun.

What social reformer can recall without regret the golden reign of Governor Wouter Van Twiller? Lowell has defined democracy as government by declamation; in Manhattan, the Dutch Solons pondered, dozed and dreamed, all the while emitting prodigious puffs; smoke took the place of "hot air"; the emblem of state was a pipe of tobacco. In esthetics, great gravity of taste prevailed: beauty was synonymous with bulk; belles and brides were encased, like an onion, in multitudinous petticoats; and "The burgomasters were chosen by weight. It is a maxim observed in all honest, plain-thinking cities that an alderman should be fat, and the wisdom of this can be proved to a certainty. A lean, spare, diminutive body is generally accompanied by a petulant, restless, meddling mind, whereas your round, sleek, unwieldy periphery is accompanied by a mind like itself, tranquil, torpid and at ease. Whoever hears of fat men leading a riot or herding together in mobs?"

To the witchery of the romancer, Irving added, in highly finished form, all the artistry of a consummate rhetorician; and there lies his chief school-value, as an introduction to literature and a model for students in the craftsmanship of style. Contrasted with our meretricious standards of "head-line English," where every phrase, blazing with color, throbbing with melodrama, poignant with "punch" and "pep," must convey a neurotic jerk, a jolt, a stab or a hysterical screech, Irving may seem a trifle tame; but his is a well-bred restraint. His diction is copious; the rhythm and melody of his sentences, though sometimes excessive, afforded that modern Aristarchus, Francis, Lord Jeffries, "a delight not inferior to that which we derive from fine versification." Like Macaulay and Dr. Johnson, Irving's tricks of style and especially his resourceful methods of rhetorical amplification, while not obtrusive, are fairly transparent and hence easy for the beginner to catch and reproduce.

Upon literary aspirants at Rome, Horace enjoined the Greek exemplars for "nocturnal and diurnal" devotion; echoing the Roman laureate, Dr. Johnson gave the noble palm to Addison. But had the grim dictator lived to realize the imaginative vigor romanticism was to add to the "dull narcotic" dignity of Queen Anne prose, with the same oracular confidence he might have observed that "Whoever wishes to attain an English style, familiar but not coarse, elegant but not ostentatious, must give his days and nights to the study of"—Irving.

Anne of Brittany. The Story of a Duchess and Twice-Crowned Queen. By HELEN J. SANBORN. With Introduction by KATHARINE LEE BATES. Illustrated from Photographic Reproductions. Boston: Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Co. $2.00.

The people of Brittany are as picturesque as the country. Brittany is the land of rugged coasts and stormy headlands, the birthplace of strong and vigorous natures. The Breton can be a fighter like Du Guesclin or a dreamer like Chauteaubriand and Brizeux. Bretons are proud of all their countrymen. But you will not talk to a genuine Breton for ten minutes without hearing him pronounce with pride and love the name of the good Duchess Anne. And her they love far more because in her own right she ruled with gentle sway over the fair lands of Brittany than because she was twice Queen of France.

Miss Sanborn has for the Duchess of Brittany and the "Twice-Crowned Queen" something of the admiration of a real daughter of Armor. The figure of this genuine Catholic princess has evidently exercised a strong fascination upon this descendant of the Puritans. Death found the author almost before she had completed the task of telling her story. Miss Sanborn does full justice to Anne, to her strong character, to her dignity as a woman and to her fine qualities as a ruler in her own duchy and the realm of France, where as the wife of Charles VIII and later of Louis XII, she gave in the midst of the splendors of a court the example of the highest virtues. Anne lived in an age of great Catholic women, and she was the worthy emulator of the princesses Isabella of Castile and Catharine of England. Her piety, her simplicity, her far-seeing policies, her love of the poor, her faith, are finely drawn by the American writer, who does not forget to mention that Anne was a very good matchmaker for her ladies-in-waiting, providing in some cases, royal partners for them, but in all things looking to their spiritual needs and the good of their souls rather than to their temporal advantage. Miss Sanborn has tried everywhere to do justice to this noble lady, and has drawn a fine picture of a Catholic princess of stainless life, not perfect, it is true, but thoroughly human, with the loftiest ideals of her own position as a ruler, a woman and a Christian and striving to carry them out into her life with the sturdy, straightforwardness of her Breton blood. The book is not erudite or learned. It is something more, an interesting, sincere, and affecting biography of a noble, high-minded woman. The work makes a good holiday book.

Arboreal Man. By F. WOOD JONES, M.B., D.Sc. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $2.40.

It is marvelous how far a man can go, and how blind he can become, when once he canters forth upon his pet hobby along the pleasant road of fancy. But it is quite evident that the elementary principle of causality, that the effect cannot surpass its cause, is practically unknown, or at least entirely disregarded, by the writer of this arboreal romance. It is another attempt to ingraft the monkey upon mankind's ancestral tree, and it starts "with the assumption that we accept the principle of evolution as a fact, and that we extend the principle to embrace man." An author of a scientific treatise may adopt anything he pleases as an assumption, but if, after a few pages, he treats the assumption as if it were a fact he had established, the reader who manages to retain his powers of discernment in the growing maze of progressive assertion, is led, not to admiration and acceptance, but to astonishment and grief. Only a few paragraphs after the primary assumption, these sentences occur: "Not so long ago, there would have been no hesitation in asserting what type was, and what was not, human. Man began as man, and that was the beginning and the end of it. We have definitely passed that stage. Today we have a bewildering complexity of genera and species of missing links; but we still have a more or less definite conception of what we would term a human being." The "bewildering complexity" would be more accurately termed "very few" by most people, who have a more, rather than the less, definite conception of what we term a human being, and who are aware that the most famous of this wonderful collection are the Neandertal and the Piltdown skulls, which have been clearly demonstrated to be absolutely worthless as proof of any kind of evolution.

Before proceeding much further, the reader is supposed to accept without demur, the suddenly interjected remark that "Man comes of an arboreal stock. Arboreal uprightness preceded terrestrial uprightness." But even if this gratuitous assertion is accepted, the thought may arise: why doesn't Dr. Jones precipitate a beautiful bird into the phylogeny of man instead of the common, hideous ape?

Modern teachers of anthropology will rejoice to welcome this new element which has been added to the quadrupedal pronograde stage of mammalian existence; for if a recalcitrant scholar hesitates to accept as a fact that a quadruped immediately evolved into an animal characterized by an orthograde posture, he can be made readily to grasp the fittingness of this intermediate arboreal habit of some particular mammalian stock.

Dr. Jones is disposed to patronize Dr. Dwight's "Thoughts of a Catholic Anatomist," but he feels obliged to express his surprise at the short-sightedness of its author. "How completely man can be separated," he writes, "by a series of mental processes, from all the laws known to govern the modifications and progress of lower animals, even by a man of the highest scientific attainments, may be realized by the reading of such a work as the final effort of Thomas Dwight, the late distinguished Professor of Anatomy of Harvard." But how completely Dr. Dwight's irrefutable arguments may be neglected and ignored by a man of scientific attainments, that apparently are far from the highest, may be realized by the perusal of such a work as the latest effort of the Professor of Anatomy in the London School of Medicine for Women.

Many chapters are given to descriptions of the anatomy and some of the habits of the lower and higher animals which furnish some comparison with man; but no hint is given anywhere of the almost infinitely greater differences which distinguish man from the brute, and separate him from it by a chasm too wide to be spanned by such a flimsy structure as this rather ludicrous attempt to explain away the scriptural account of the origin of man. How to Debate. By EDWIN DUBOIS SHURTER, Professor of Public Speaking in the University of Texas. New York: Harper & Brothers, $1.35.

Debating societies are becoming more and more popular in our American schools. This is one of the most hopeful signs of better things. For as Professor Shurter well says, the practice given in debating an interesting and vital theme fosters the habit of independent, individual and logical thought, while it also stimulates accuracy of expression and produces broad-mindedness and toleration. It is likewise of the greatest practical value to the boy and the young man, since the power of quick and accurate presentation of thought which it develops enables its happy possessor to assume the leadership in whatever sphere he may later on be called to act.

In all matters concerning "the noble art of public speech" Professor Shurter may be called an expert. Those who are familiar with his former treatises will recognize in the present volume the same grasp on the vital principles of the art, the same clear presentation of its fundamentals, the methodical arrangement of the matter and the practical viewpoint everywhere apparent. The book is simply written; it deals with the substantials of the subject and drives them home with numerous and forceful examples. A careful reading of the volume, while it will teach the young man how to debate, will accomplish something of still greater value to him. It will teach him how to think.

To the chapters which discuss the "Proposition: the Matter and Form" of the debate, the "Analysis of the Question," the "Brief," the "Evidence," all treated in a telling and forcible manner, the author adds in an appendix a list of modern and interesting topics for debate on questions of politics and government, economics and sociology, education and law, history and current events, a specimen debate on preparedness, rules of parliamentary procedure and a useful bibliography. Professor Shurter's book should meet everywhere, and especially in our schools and colleges, with the approval which it thoroughly deserves. J. C. R.

The Essentials of Philosophy. By R. W. SELLARS. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.60.

The most hopeful feature of the epistemological theory of Dr. Sellars is its obscurity. His students in the University of Michigan will not understand him well enough to be as much harmed as they might be by the pragmatism of Professor Dewey of Columbia University. The chief objection to the epistemology of Dr. Sellars is the rejection of that common-sense realism, which he and the whole host of our large university professors sneer at as "naïve realism." If "truth is not a correspondence with an external reality at all," then the truth of the Divinity of Christ is independent of the reality of His Divinity; it is a mere phase in the stream of our consciousness. If "knowledge is not an agreement with reality or a correspondence with reality," then what we know about Christianity has no objective validity at all; Christianity is a trumped-up fiction of the mind. And yet Dr. Sellars is not a pragmatist, who goes in for satisfactoriness as truth, nor an idealist; he is what he calls "a non-apprehensional critical realist." He admits reality, but denies that it is apprehended by the mind. The knowing subject is "an organism immersed in, and continuous with, the physical world." That physical world, "the same reality about which we gain knowledge in physical sciences, contains consciousness." Reality has a two-fold aspect: "the outer aspect is reality as known by means of the physical sciences, while the inner aspect is consciousness as admittedly real." So my consciousness of an object is really the object itself in an inner aspect or a phase, other than that which is outer or objective. This inner aspect of reality, or consciousness of the object known, is non-apprehensional, not perceptual, not representative of the object; it is the object itself in all its reality. In this wise the knowing subject merges into the object known. Such "non-apprehensional critical realism" is nothing less than monstrous; it is monistic pluralism, idealistic realism, monism in the guise of pluralism, a mere camouflage realism. W. F. D.

The Rhythm of Prose. By W. M. PATTERSON. New York: Columbia University Press. $1.50.

This work, now appearing in the second edition, has been pronounced by the critics "brilliant," "monumental," "epoch-making"; but we must hasten to add that it is so to the scientist rather than to the artist. It is a theoretical, not a practical treatise. It provides a new analysis of prose rhythm, which in course of time may filter down into the field of practical workmanship, but, as it stands, it will be of little assistance to the writer concerned with producing ryhthmical prose rather than investigating its essence.

In theory the rhythm of prose has always been a perplexing subject for the simple reason that rhythm implies a regular recurrence of phenomena at regular time-intervals, whereas, the very essence of prose as different from verse lies in its irregularity in both these respects. Mr. Patterson attempts to unravel the perplexity by the following analysis of rhythmical experience. Let us suppose that one musically endowed undertakes to read a sentence or group of words with attention to the rhythm of the passage strictly so called. Such a reader immediately upon beginning to pronounce the sentence or at least as soon as he conceives the general run of the phrase, forms instinctively within his consciousness a series of regular subjective time-units, which may be compared to the divisions by bars in a piece of music. In simpler words, he begins to beat time, only this time is not rigidly regular, but elastic, that is, often accelerated or retarded, with a sort of swinging movement, as fitness requires. Now while this regular but elastic beating of time is going on, the movement of the passage being read is superimposed upon it. The subjective time-beat is, as it were, the base accompaniment to the treble time played by the flow of the enunciated syllables. Such a double experience is felt in all rhythmical reading. This being the case, one of two things may happen: either the beat of the syllables may coincide for the most part with the beat of the subjective accompaniment, and this gives us verse-experience; or the two may not coincide, but syncopation or "rag-time" may prevail, and in this case we have the experience of prose. At this point the author makes a digression in order to examine the rhythm of vers libre, and he concludes that, so far as it has evolved at the present time, vers libre is nothing more nor less than a haphazard mixture of verse and prose rhythm, and consequently has no distinctive esthetic value essentially different from that of prose and verse.

If the foregoing interpretation of prose-rhythm be true, it seems clear that the precise regularity which is essential to our notion of rhythm proceeds entirely from the subjective element, the conscious beating of time, and that the feeling of time or pattern in the irregular succession of syllables depends upon their interrupting or repeating, accelerating or retarding this subjective regularity, And it also follows that, if the reader is an "aggressively rhythmical" person, that is, if he can feel his subjective time-counting distinctly and can readily recognize syncopation as such, he can discover a tune or rhythm in any collocation of words at all, in any sentence however offhand and crude. When, then, can a given sentence be called objectively rhythmical? Apparently when the time-beat and the syncopation can be felt easily and without effort by the normal reader. And when does prose-rhythm attain a degree of positive excellence? When, in addition to this case, we find spontaneity or variety in the tunes, and fitness or appropriateness between them and the content of the passage.

Justice cannot be done to such a work within a short compass. The foregoing is the kernel of the new theory. Those who care for such theorizing will meet with elaborate experiments and much food for thought in the volume, and we may add that those who are unrhythmical will find in it interesting exercises to remedy this defect in their artistic perceptions.

An Introduction to Special School Work. By MARION F. BRIDIE, L.L.A. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.10.

The work of special schools, where such training is given as is suited to the limited and varied capacities of the mentally deficient, possesses much merit. No one can regard unfavorably any effort made to render the slow-witted and feebly-gifted less slow and less feeble. The volume in hand is the fruit of accumulated experience and observation and has as its laudable aim the rendering mentally deficient children "more useful, more self-respecting and happier." The suggestions are on the whole practical and quite comprehensive. Several chapters are devoted to schemes whereby reading, number work and manual training may be made more attainable to the unfortunate dullard or near-dullard. To the general reader interested in matters educational, Chapter II is decidedly the most valuable in its suggestiveness. "Good discipline is only reached by the double pathway of understanding: the thoughtful, growing understanding of the child by the teacher and almost equally an understanding of the teacher by the child, with some realization of the aims of the former." Greatest stress is put upon encouragement, the promotion of self-respect and self-confidence and faith in one's power to will and to do. Kindness, tact and patience are recommended in the correction of lying, a rather common fault of the mentally deficient, due in many cases to fear. The closing chapters treat of junior manual training, and vocational work for boys and for girls. We are reminded to hold well the two great aims in manual training of special schools: To develop and strengthen the moral character of the child and to make him self-supporting. It is regrettable that the word religion is consistently omitted throughout a work that aims at a full education, for that is the strongest bulwark of morality there is.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Louise Keene calls his "plain story of a Canadian who went" "Crumps" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.25), from the latest onomatopoeic name for high-explosive shells. In a matter-of-fact way and with an occasional dash of Americn humor, he again describes the hardships and horrors of trench warfare. The fresher parts of the book are the earlier pages which tell how the first Canadian Expeditionary Force was raised and trained.——Ian Hay's continuation of "The First Hundred Thousand," which is entitled "All In It, 'K(1)' Carries On" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.50), describes a winter campaign in the neighborhood of Ypres and tells about the Battle of the Somme. The chapter on the field telephone is one of the best, but the present book, as is often the case with sequels, is not the equal of its predecessor.

The Rev. Peter Geiermann, C.SS.R., has prepared for priests and seminarians a good book of readings entitled, "The Mediator: Jesus Christ in the Scriptures, the Model of the Priest" (Herder, $1.50). Laying emphasis on the mediatorial character of the priest, who is "another Christ," the author in thirty-five comprehensive chapters tells what the qualities are that render the priestly mediator acceptable to God and to man, what his virtues should be, how he should discharge his parochial duties, and his sacerdotal functions, and what his home life ought to be. Though the volume lacks that geniality and lightness of touch that makes Canon Keatinge's "The Priest: His Character and Work" so readable a book, "The Mediator" will be found particularly useful during retreat time and during the years at the seminary.

Christmas books for the little ones have begun to appear. Frances Jenkins Olcott has prepared "The Red Indian Fairy Book for the Children's Own Reading and for Story Tellers" (Houghton Mifflin, $2.00) and Frederick Richardson has illustrated it. There are sixty-four tales in the volume, most of them nature stories, and they are arranged according to the seasons.——Clara Roberts Barton's "Cloud Boat Stories" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.50) are about the wonderful adventures little Billy had with the Sand Man. They met in the sky a number of well-known Mother Goose characters and were fortunate enough to get pictures of them.——In "The Dot Signal Book for Boys and Girls" (Houghton Mifflin, $0.50) Clifford L. Sherman explains the mysteries of the wig-wag system by means of diagrams the children are to work out for themselves.——A new and sumptuous edition of Kingsley's "Water Babies" (Lippincott, $1.35) has appeared with eight fine illustrations in color by Maria L. Kirk. It is a pity the author's flings at the Church were not deleted.

Mrs. Alice Hegan Rice, delightful lover of children, has not lost her keen perception of the angularities of human nature, or her sympathy with nature's gentlemen and gentlewomen, or her skill in making it clear that the truest nobility often hides under the coarsest clothes. "Calvary Alley" (Century, $1.35), her latest story, is a worthy successor to the "Cabbage Patch." Mrs. Snowdon is not perhaps a Mrs. Wiggs, but Nance and Dan are very attractive little waifs. Unfortunately they have to grow up and see something of the sin and gloom of the seamy side of life. Some of the pages are rather vivid, but the general tone and purpose of the book is wholesome.——Another novel with a little girl as its central figure is "Enchanted Hearts" (Doubleday, $1.35), by Darrach Aldrich. An incurable believer in fairies, Comfort, as she is well called, assumes to herself the role of fairy-godmother, fills a grim boarding-house with an atmosphere of romance and poetry, succeeds after various blunders in transforming a doleful Cinderella into a radiant princess and gives her to the prince, whom she herself discovers, as a charming Christmas present. The book is by no means a mere child's story, although every page of it may be read, and with interest, by children.—Meredith Nicholson's tenuous Christmas story, entitled "A Reversible Santa Claus" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.00), which tells how a burglar unintentionally kidnaps a baby, strains probabilities beyond all reason.

"The Mystery of Gabriel" (Longmans, $1.40), Michael Wood's latest "mystical" Anglican novel, tells how a little foundling whom Honor Forranner, a well-to-do maiden lady brought up and educated, was a "moral germ-carrier" until "Father" Standish drove the devil out of him at last. Gabriel then becomes the founder of a "new lay order," called the "Missionaries of the Holy Ghost and Mary," and tramps through the country playing a fiddle. The author often writes so much like a real Catholic, let us hope that he will eventually become one.——"Abington Abbey" (Dodd, Mead, $1.50) is Archibald Marshall's serene and leisurely novel of English country life before the present war. A despicable parson is portrayed after the Trollopian manner and the simple, affectionate home-life of George Grafton and his three fair daughters is admirably described. When the world is reconstructed again, Mr. Marshall's faithful pictures of "Meadshire" will doubtless be of great value to students of sociology.

The following thoughtful lines, entitled "The Bugler," are one of F. W. Harvey's "Poems trom a German Prison Camp":

God dreamed a man;
Then, having firmly shut
Life like a precious metal in his fist,
Withdrew, His labor done. Thus did begin
Our various divinity and sin.
For some to ploughshares did the metal twist,
And others—dreaming empires—straightway cut
Crowns for their aching foreheads. Others beat
Long nails and heavy hammers for the feet
Of their forgotten Lord. (Who dares to boast
That he is guiltless?) Others coined it: most Did with it—simply nothing. (Here, again,
Who cries his innocence?) Yet doth remain
Metal unmarred, to each man more or less
Whereof to fashion perfect loveliness.

For me, I do but bear within my hand
(For sake of Him Our Lord, now long forsaken)
A simple bugle such as may awaken
With one high morning note a drowsing man:
That wheresoe'er within my motherland
The sound may come, 'twill echo far and wide
Like pipes of battle calling up a clan,
Trumpeting men through beauty to God's side.

"13 Rue du Bon Diable" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.35), by Arthur Sherburne Hardy, is a good detective story, written in a new and interesting manner. The murder of a wealthy uncle about to present a pearly necklace to his niece on the occasion of her birthday, involves the niece, a bank messenger, her sweetheart, and all the servants of the house in a plot that is filled with surprises and is cleverly handled.——Mr. E. F. Benson's latest production, "The Freaks of Mayfair" (Doran, $1.50), is not a novel, but a series of faintly amusing sketches about some characters he has met in society: snobs, quacks, climbers, and slanderers. The tone of mock charitableness in which each one closes is more tolerable than the vagaries of the unpleasant peoples he makes the target of his wit.——As "Marching Men" (Lane, $1.50), by Sherwood Anderson, unblushingly relates in several chapters the sinister temptations of a young man who enters alone the grinding life of a big city, the book is not fit to read.——"Northern Diamonds" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.25), by Frank Lillie Pollock, tells how a party of Toronto boys went into the heart of the solitudes of the great north woods of Canada, in search of diamonds, and found—precious "black" diamonds of a kind. A string of more or less loosely linked incidents make up the story, and the characters and the motives that move them are on a common level.

Among the literary papers in the November Catholic World are "The Play of Julius Caesar" by Emily Hickey, "Our Maurice Francis" [Egan] by Charles Phillips, "The Retreat of the American Novel" by George Nauman Shuster and "Francis Ledwidge" by Katharine Tynan, who quotes these two poems he sent her last January:

IN FRANCE

The silence of maternal hills
Is round me in my evening dreams
And round me music-making bells
And mingling waves of pastoral streams.

Whatever way I turn, I find
The paths are old unto me still,
The hills of home are in my mind,
And there I wander as I will.

HAD I A GOLDEN POUND TO SPEND

Had I a golden pound to spend
My love should mend and sew no more,
And I would buy her a little quern,
Easy to turn on the kitchen floor.

And for her windows, curtains white
With birds in flight and flowers in bloom,
To face with pride the road to town
And mellow down the sunlit room.

And with the silver change we'd prove
The truth of Love to life's own end.
With hearts the years could but embolden,
Had I a golden pound to spend.

"The Letters and Diary of Alan Seeger" (Scribner's, $1.25), the young American who, as a member of the Foreign Legion, allied himself to the cause of France, contain vivid descriptions of life in the trenches and on the field of battle. A poet of considerable ability, his prose is also trenchant and he gives striking pictures of the desolating effects of war. The author was slain at Belloy-en-Santerre.——"Carry On" (Lane), by Lieutenant Coningsby Dawson, consists of letters written from the front to his parents. The book's theme are the deeds of heroism done in trench warfare by the brave infantry men.——In "The Diary of a Nation," (Doubleday, $1.50), Mr. E. S. Martin, editorial writer of Life, has collected his contributions to the more serious pages of that weekly. It expresses his hopes and fears as the war in Europe progressed up to the time our country entered it. In future times it may be useful as a record of the tone of our press during those days of waiting.

"Missa et Absolutio pro Defunctis" (Fischer & Bro., $0.80), for three male voices (or soprano, alto and baritone with tenor ad lib.) and organ by Pietro A. Yon, should prove a welcome addition to the repertoire of Requiem Masses. It is very practical, three voices being sufficient for an effective rendering, and the tenor part never reaching beyond F. A point of great convenience is the addition to the Mass proper of settings for those chants which precede and follow it at funerals, even the ordinary responses of the Mass being inserted each in its proper place. The music is not difficult, and good use is made of Gregorian themes. There are, however, some passages which, in tonality and rhythm, strongly contrast with the surrounding Gregorian melodies. These will require a careful and judicious rendering not to detract from the general effect.——The same publishers have out in one octavo edition three pleasing and devotional motets of Joseph J. McGrath: "O Sanctissima," "Tantum Ergo," "O Salutaris," $0.40.——The Rev. Joseph Viscount Verheijen of the College of St. Theresa, Winona, Minn., has published "In Honorem Sanctae Caeciliae," an organ postludium in three movements, maestoso, andante, allegro. $1.00. The proceeds from the sale of this composition will be sent as an offering to His Holiness, Benedict XV.

"Straws from the Manger, or Thoughts on Christmastide," by Rev. James H. Cotter, LL.D., Litt.D. (Milwaukee: Diederich-Schaefer Co., $1.00), is a development in as many chapters of twenty-five simple thoughts on Christmas and the message of the Christ-Child. The essays, some but a page in length, have previously appeared in the Columbiad and the Columbian. They contain practical reflections, attractively presented, on the lessons observing souls may glean from Bethlehem's Crib, the lowly shepherds, and the Three Wise Men. Perhaps the best of the chapters are "A Christmas Box for Christ," "Christmas and Its Message," and "Mars and the Christ-Child." "New Year's Greeting," the expression of true Christian hope, will prove a balm for hearts lately severed by the call to arms.—— In "The Land of Enough" (Crowell, $0.50), a Christmas story, Charles E. Jefferson, pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle, tells a quiet story of a quiet village where lived two very disquieted children. Max Maverton and his sister Madge, still in their teens, become tired of the scheme of things, and complain that they never have enough of anything. "O, for the Land of Enough!" is Madge's continual cry, and presto! one night she finds herself transported to that fairyland where everybody has everything he or she desires, where there is no giving and no receiving, no family joy, no Christmas, the land where intercourse of whatever kind is an interminable ennui. The writer scarcely voices a common opinion when he says of heaven, "To most of us it is a dull place, to some of us it is repellent." The interpretation the author puts upon St. Paul's words is bad exegesis.

Interest is imparted to Clara E. Laughlin's historical novel, "The Heart of Her Highness" (Putnam, $1.50), by the fact that the scene of its action is Flanders, which was then, as it is now, a center of contending war parties, Ypres, Liége, Lille, and other names made familiar by the present war, occur frequently. The heroine, the Lady Mary, is the daughter of Charles the Bold, whose death at Nancy left her the rule of a disintegrating realm. How she frees herself from the hands of her enemies makes up the plot. The tale has both action and interest; and, all in all, is well told.——The scene of "Unconquered" (Putnam, $1.50), Maud Diver's latest book, is laid in Scotland at the opening of the present war, and portrays the struggle between love and duty on the part of the hero, Sir Mark Forsythe, who leaves for the war, returns a cripple and loses his affianced bride, only to discover the real woman destined for him in the person of Sheila, his childhood sweetheart, whose sterling worth his infatuation for the fickle Bel had hidden from him. As usual, the author's characters are well drawn and the plot is cleverly worked out.

Margaret Sherwood's new book, "Familiar Ways" (Little, Brown, $1.25) is a collection of light essays reprinted from the Atlantic Monthly and Scribner's Magazine. The second paper of the series, entitled "Our Venetian Lamp," suggests a moving-picture fantasy, but for the rest the book is simply an exuberance of sentiment, and very refreshing sentiment, on such pleasant themes as "The Little House," "Gardens, Real and Imaginary," "The Threshold," and "The Final Packing." We have the same engaging gentleness in these sketches, the same art-concealing art of expression, the same sweet communings with inanimate objects interwoven with reflections on life and its problems, as fascinated many readers a few months ago in the same author's "The Worn Doorstep." "We are not so far as we think from the unobtrusive life that goes on in meadow and wayside. The wood near us is one great threshold of innumerable homes that suggest a hundred points of contact with our own; through the silences, bright, brave eyes watch the intruder from beyond the guarded doorways." Such a sentence suggests at once Miss Sherwood's constant point of view and also the graceful familiarity of her style.

SOCIOLOGY

Public Funds and Private Charities

THESE are bad days for the "uplift" and the "uplifters." It may be true, as some ill-informed newspapers have suggested, that in New York the self-appointed Guardians of the Inner Shrine of Sanctity tried to force "reform" too rapidly upon a recalcitrant municipality, a task as difficult as starting from his reverie a balky Missouri mule. It may be true, and then again it may not be, for the facts in the case indicate that what the "uplifters" aimed at, was not so much a true reform as a base, Socony-like imitation. However this may be, the long campaign of calumny waged against the New York Catholic institutions of charity went under a cloud on November 6, and when the nebulæ had lifted, even the most socially-minded expert in Manhattan or the Bronx could perceive that while the Oleaginous Oligarchy had been boiled in its own oil, its kid, the Charity Trust, had been most unscripturally seethed in the milk of its dam.

The Chicago Instance

FOLLOWING hard upon this cataclysm came the news that the Supreme Court of Illinois had ruled upon an important point affecting the private institutions for dependent children in that State. On January 25 of the present year, Judge Jesse A. Baldwin granted the petition of an individual whose name, I regret to say, is Dunn, restraining the County of Cook from paying certain sums to the Chicago Industrial School for Girls, an institution for dependent Catholic children. These payments had been made for thirty years, and "under the existing law and in perfect good faith," as Archbishop Mundelein wrote on February 9, the institutions after providing plant and equipment, did their best to make the children good citizens and good Christians; "while the city on its side," in the words of the Hon. Bird S. Coler, spoken of the New York Plan, "made partial payment for services received." This amicable arrangement did not suit the chivalrous Mr. Dunn who urged that it was in violation of the State Constitution, providing that no public funds were to be used "in aid of any church or sectarian purpose, or help support or sustain any . . . institution controlled by any church." After praising the institution in question, and recording his opinion that "in a large majority of cases, work of this kind is more economically and efficiently done in institutions controlled, managed and inspired by religious and sectarian organizations than when administered by the State," Judge Baldwin allowed the petition of the expert in constitutional law. In due course, the case reached the Supreme Court of Illinois, and on October 23, Mr. Justice Cartwright, for the Court, ruled: "The decree is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to dismiss the bill at the complainant's [Dunn] cost." An analysis of this decision, so contrary to many theories urged today, will be of interest to students of social needs.

The Facts in the Case

THE facts in the case, "as determined by the pleadings, a stipulation of the parties, and the evidence heard by the Chancellor," are these. The Chicago Industrial School for Girls is an institution incorporated by act of the Legislature in 1879, and possesses "buildings, ample grounds and equipment to meet the requirements of the act." To this school, Catholic children are committed by the Juvenile Court, and in 1915 the average number in attendance was 356. For these children six secular teachers are employed, and eleven teachers "who are Sisters of Mercy and who are paid $16 a month, which goes into the common treasury of the religious order." One may here pause to picture the bulging walls of that treasury. The school has a chaplain and a chapel "where religious services according to the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church are held, which all inmates are required to attend." A few facts on the financial affairs of the institution are thus stated by the Court.

> The school has been receiving $15 per month for each girl, which is less than the cost to the State for each girl committed to the State Training School for Girls at Geneva, a similar institution maintained by the State, where the cost is $28.88 for each girl per month. The amount paid by Cook County is less than the cost of food, clothing, training, medical care and tuition furnished to the wards of the County, outside of any religious instruction or religious services, and the balance above the amount paid by the County, is made up by donations, largely given by the Archbishop.

This statement of facts concludes with the admission that the institution has been granted annually, by the State Board of Charities or its successor, a certificate that it is "competent" and has "adequate facilities to care for the children."

The Facts Reviewed

THE Court then reviews the argument of Mr. Dunn.

> The substantial basis of the brief and argument for the appellee is that payment of public funds to a school under church or sectarian control, violates the Constitution, even when it is made in payment for clothing, board, education in the arts and sciences; and in the argument at the bar, counsel contended that under the Constitution no ward of the State can be committed to any institution where there are religious services, or where religious doctrines are taught; but all institutions to which they may be committed, must be absolutely divorced from religion or religious teaching.

"This," remarks the Court, "is a clear misapprehension of the attitude of the people toward religion, expressed in the Constitution," and in proof, the third section of the Bill of Rights, and section 3, article 8, of the Constitution of Illinois, are cited. "The people," continues the Court, "not only did not declare hostility to religion, but regard its teachings and practices as a public benefit which might be equal to the payment of taxes," a wise remark on which New York's Commissioner of Accounts may meditate with profit. In harmony with the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, the Illinois Juvenile Court Act had provided that, as far as practicable, children were to be committed to persons or associations of like religious faith with the parents of said children. Furthermore, no Court had "adopted any rule antagonistic" to religion or its free exercise.

> In Nichols v. School Directors, 93 Ill. 61, the Court said: Religion and religious worship are not so placed under the ban of the Constitution that they may not be allowed to become the recipients of any incidental benefit whatsoever from the public bodies or authorities of the State.

In Willard v. Board of Education, 121 Ill. 297, the Court had said that if a Board of Education wished to procure a building for school purposes, "it had a right to rent from any person who had property suitable for school purposes." Whether the owner "was a Methodist, a Presbyterian, a Roman Catholic" was "a matter of no moment"; and in the case in dispute, the authority of the School Board "to lease the basement of a Catholic Church, and pay rent therefor," was affirmed. This ruling "is applicable to this case, where the care and education of girls as wards of the State are required and payment must be made therefor." Finally, in Reichenwald v. Catholics of Chicago, 258 Ill. 44, "the Court said that in return for the care given the body, the State does not exact the surrender of all care for the soul."

"Subsidies" and Institutions

"THE declaration of the Constitution," forbidding religious discrimination, "does not mean that religion is abolished," or that the State may act as if it did not exist. On the contrary, religion is so clear a fact that to make its exercise by any citizen or ward of the State impossible or difficult, would be in violation of the plain intent and provision of that instrument.

> What the Constitution forbids is a preference given by law to any denomination or mode of worship, or aid to any such denomination by an appropriation or payment from any public fund whatever. . . . . It would be contrary to the letter and the spirit of the Constitution to exclude from religious exercises the members of any denomination, when the State assumes their control, or to prevent the children of members from receiving the religious instruction which they would have received at home. The constitutional prohibition against furnishing aid or preference to any church or sect is to be rigidly enforced, but it is contrary to fact and reason to say that paying less than the actual cost of clothing, medical care and attention, education in useful arts and domestic science, is aiding the institution in which such things are furnished. . . . . . Upon the plainest grounds no aid is given to an industrial school where the payment is less than the actual cost. . . It costs the State $28.88 per month for each girl in a similar institution maintained by the State, and it is the State, and not the industrial school that is benefited by the payment of less than the cost. . . . Such payment does not violate any provision of the Constitution.

The italicized lines are conceived in a spirit of common-sense to which uplifters in New York, and elsewhere, are wholly impervious. Who does not remember the wild charges, made during the Strong Investigation, that the institutions were "scrambling" for children as for a financial asset, or the unjust use of the word "subsidy" in Warner's "American Charities" and in works that have followed that unreliable guide? This misapplication of terms, however, is of secondary importance. The most notable features of this decree are found in the decision that the religious character of an institution cannot disqualify it as a recipient of public money in return for services rendered, and in its definition of the duty of the State not merely to tolerate, but to protect the dependent child in its religious rights.

EDUCATION

The Psychology of the Preconscious

THIS is the age of psychology. We have had the psychology of religion, of myth and fable, of art and poetry; the psychology of salesmanship, of the child-mind, of the criminal, of the subconscious and of the unconscious; psychology minus the soul, and psychology of other interesting varieties. The latest is the psychology of the preconscious, introduced in a volume on "Hindu Mind Training," by an "Anglo-Saxon Mother," working in conjunction with S. M. Mitra, author of "Anglo-Indian Studies." The object of this book is to popularize in the West the researches of ancient Hindu thinkers in "unconscious cerebration." The book is not so interesting for its own sake as for the light it diffuses over the method of that cult of Oriental philosophy now becoming so fashionable in the West.

The cult rests on a maximum of assumption and a minimum of proof. The theory of innate ideas, of pre-existence and transmigration of souls, of evolution and involution, of universal mind-stuff, of the influence of the moon on the mind, are treated throughout the book as proved conclusions. But the basic assumption of the entire work, "Preconscious cerebration is as vital to the study of psychology as ether is to that of physics" is surely not evident to the conscious, however evident it may be to the unconscious or preconscious mind.

The Corner-stone of Service

THE only witness able to certify to the experiences of the Ego is the conscious mind. The old psychology expressly recognized that in introspection the conscious subject investigates itself, the conscious object. The psychology of the preconscious, however, deprecates this mode of procedure. "This obsession, the so-called metaphysical delusion, is the generic expression of psychical incoercibility; it consists simply in feeling oneself think, in studying oneself while thinking, in dividing oneself into an I who thinks and an I who observes. It is therefore, an extreme, pedantic, uncontrollable, and hence fruitless form of introspection, worse than fruitless, for it becomes an actual obstacle to thought." Despite this railing against the conscious form of introspection it is the only kind available, even for him who rails. Only the conscious mind can reflect upon its experiences, and as the mind is a unit, it cannot be conscious in its observing faculty, and preconscious in its being observed.

Mr. Mitra calls unconscious cerebration the "corner-stone of mental science." But just as the ascertained facts of physics, not ether, are the corner-stone of physical science, so ascertained mental phenomena, and not an assumed "preconscious," are the corner-stone of psychology. No science can claim to reach certain conclusions if it begins with a mere probability. This improbability, that the conscious mind knows anything about the preconscious, is confirmed by the fact that Mr. Mitra himself knows so little about the corner-stone of mental science as to be unable to define it.

The Point at Issue

HE recognizes, roughly speaking, "two kinds of thought, though he does not admit of any hard and fast dividing line between them—one which might be called the surface thought, and the other the thought lying in the preconscious, or in other words voluntary and involuntary thought." Surely it is to contradict experience to say that there are two kinds of thought, with no hard and fast line between them. The very point at issue is whether you have right to assume that there is thought of which you are not conscious.

But why has an "Anglo-Saxon Mother" found it necessary to usher the Western world into this Cimmerian cloud-land, shrouded in misty abstractions? The reason is thus stated. "About twenty years ago the problem of my eldest son's education first led me to take a practical interest in the training of the young. Since then I have looked carefully into various Western systems of mind training, including those of Rousseau, Herbart, Pestalozzi, Basedow, Froebel and Montessori, without finding any one of them really satisfactory." Here we stumble on another tremendous assumption. The volume professes to survey the European field of education from Aristotle until today. It assumes that between Aristotle and Locke, an interval of 2,000 years, psychology and education are represented by a blank space, blotted with darkness.

The "Dark Ages"

IF there is any truth in the history of education, it is that the two millenia between Aristotle and Locke saw the solution of some of the greatest educational problems the world has ever known. Call it what you will, an education, or a philosophy of life, or a religion that accomplished the change, the conversion of the barbarian plunderers of imperial Rome into the makers of modern Europe was accomplished by one of the greatest educational means in the world. That system flowered in the thirteenth century, and produced almost simultaneously St. Louis the king, St. Thomas the philosopher, St. Francis and Dante the poets. It was the source and inspiration of such drama and poetry as the Mystery Plays and the Minnesingers. It built the universities; set on foot such enterprises as the Crusades, encouraged chivalry and founded the gilds. Such a system of education was surely more constructive and satisfactory than Rousseau's revolution-philosophy or Kant's transcendentalism, or Madame Montessori's talk about absolute freedom for three-year-olds.

But even if education of a constructive character were an entirely post-Reformation phenomenon, Mr. Metra's volume ignores some excellent examples, again it seems, because the Catholic Church might get the credit. The achievements of the Jesuit system of education, and of St. John Baptist de la Salle and his Christian Brothers, are cases in point. Some mention of these, and of other Catholic societies, formed to promote education might be expected in a history of education.

Finally, there is another current assumption noticeable in "Hindu Mind Training." It is the assumption that there should be nothing prescriptive, categorical or toilsome in the process of education. The Hindu system has none of the storm and antagonism associated with Western methods. Its "object is to develop the mind in such a way as to use the preconscious thought, which, being without effort, does not create fatigue, and on that account is likely to achieve its end in pleasanter fashion, than a series of conscious thoughts, which would result in fatigue." Of course if the end to be achieved is to create an intellectual Nirvana, and to fill the land with lethargic preconscious lotos-eaters, it must be admitted that the less conscious thought is connected with education, the more efficient will the system be. Still, the "tiresome method of conscious thinking" will perhaps continue in favor in the Western world.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Banjo Soloist and Church Tunes

A "CHRISTIAN" congregation in Kansas recently introduced, as its latest novelty, a skilled banjo soloist, Mr. A. E. Brown, who performs at all its services. That the spirit of worship might suffer violence was never a matter of consideration, but considerable apprehension was felt in the beginning, lest the solemnity of church services might detract from the effect of the banjo playing. This is laying the emphasis in the right place. The Living Church thus quotes the local chronicler: "At first the solemnity of the church services seemed to take a good deal of its native spirit out of the banjo, but the Brown professional experience enabled him to solve the problem by syncopating the hymns and church tunes." A "punch" was now put into the slowest hymn tune, "without hurrying the tempo, merely by filling the measures with flickering notes." So by a strange wizardry "How Firm a Foundation" and "Onward Christian Soldiers" became "scintillant and attractive to youthful ears." When, before many moons, the congregation tires of this novelty, a bass-drum solo might be suggested as a rousing innovation to galvanize its "religious services" into new life.

News from the Catholic University of Japan

PROFESSOR KOBAYASHI, the professor of financial science in the Catholic University of Japan, was recently selected by the Imperial Government for its commercial agent in China. The university is receiving no slight degree of recognition and appreciation, and will greatly contribute to the prestige of the Catholic Church in Japan. It has also met the needs of the present hour by a lecture upon Luther delivered in its exhibition hall by Professor Mizuno of the university. He is a convert from Lutheranism who had studied for the Lutheran ministry for several years in the United States. So the brethren of St. Francis Xavier are today resuming in the educational field the work which the Saint began so gloriously centuries ago. The close connection between the Catholic past and the Catholic present is nowhere more strikingly brought home to us than in Japan. This holds true in particular of the Society of Jesus in that country. It is interesting therefore to note that the letter from the Catholic University of Japan which brings the above items also calls attention to the recent discovery of a Christian tomb, 300 years old, which was found in one of the temple cemeteries of Kyoto. "On the stone is carved a cross and the name of the Christian called 'Mark,' who is stated to have died on the feast of St. Onorio during the Shogunate of Hideyoshi, the Taiko Sama who appears as the tyrant persecutor in the martyrologies."

Jewish Population of the World

ONE of the most interesting facts revealed by the Jewish Year Book is the wonderful numerical growth of the Jews in our eastern metropolis. In 1905 the Jewish population of New York city was 672,000. In 1907 it had increased to 850,000. Five years later it was 975,000, and in 1917 it had reached the grand total of 1,350,000. The complete number of Jews in the United States is 3,012,141, or three per cent of the entire population. Russia is the only country where these figures are exceeded. Its Jewish population is 6,946,090. Austria-Hungary has 2,258,262 Jews. No other country remotely approaches the million mark. The Jews in Palestine number 100,000. Throughout all Asia, the ancient home of the race, there are no more than 499,679 Jews. According to the revised figures, the total number of Jews in the world today is 13,980,715. They are divided among continents as follows: Europe, 9,986,447; America, 3,094,309; Asia, 499,679; Africa, 380,865, and Australia, 19,415.

The Practical Working of a Sodality

THE many varieties of practical piety and good works to which a sodality can devote itself are excellently illustrated in the report of the Teachers' Sodality of St. Joseph's College, Philadelphia, whose membership increased from sixty-one to ninety-one during the course of the year. Of particular importance in every completely developed sodality are the sections formed within it for the prosecution of some specified work. Thus, in the Philadelphia Teachers' Sodality, there was, in the first place, the "Blockley section," whose members volunteered for the work of teaching Catechism to the poor creatures found in Blockley. There was further a section to interest itself in the foreign missions, a section devoted to the spreading of Catholic literature, and a settlement section. The latter numbered thirteen members, who devoted themselves to the missionary work done for the Italians at the Madonna House and the Assunta House. They taught catechism, singing, sewing, embroidery, crocheting and dancing; helped in the preparation for First Communion and contributed clothing for the children at Christmas and First Communion time. Other sections were more directly intended for the spiritual perfection of their own members. Such was the daily meditation section, giving a quarter of an hour each day to this form of prayer; the Communion section, whose members sought to practise Frequent or Daily Communion, since practically every sodalist was at least a weekly communicant; the rosary, Mass, prayer-pact, sanctuary, reparation and visit sections. The members of the latter made visits to Our Blessed Lady's shrine to pray for the sodality. There was a Catholic doctrine section, whose members financed and attended regular lectures on dogmatic and moral theology, and a retreat section. Three retreats were held, attended respectively by fifty-seven, fifty and sixty-four members. Many of these sections, it should be mentioned, embraced the major part of the membership and some contained practically all the sodality members. Sodalists also followed various courses in the night school attached to St. Joseph's College. While the total number of attendances was 2,378 at the sodality meetings, the number of absences for which no excuse is on record was only sixty-five for the year. Sickness and school meetings were the common legitimate reasons for absence when it occurred.

The Honor Roll of a Parish

"THE subjoined list of the men of our parish who are serving our country in the present war is a large one," says the Church Bulletin of the Church of St. Ignatius Loyola, New York city, "but it is far from complete." Then follows an honor roll extending over five closely printed pages and containing the list of 195 names of officers and men. Practically every department of the national service is represented: aviation, artillery, army and navy, officers' reserves, engineers, mine sweepers, signal corps, machine-gun battalion, cavalry, quartermaster's department and ammunition train, ambulance corps and Red Cross foreign service, naval reserves, coast patrol, marine corps and the many other forms and divisions of the country's defense. Thus the good accomplished in a single parish diffuses itself throughout the entire national service. Much may rightly be expected of these young men as of the countless others who have gone forth from the Catholic parishes throughout the land. "May God keep them in His love," and may they bring new honor to their Church by the example of their own devoted Catholic lives. "It is worth noting," adds the Bulletin, "that some families in the parish have given two or more sons to the cause. Catholics everywhere are conspicuous by their loyalty to the Government. The first man killed under the American flag in France was Lieutenant W. T. Fitzsimons, a graduate of St. Mary's Jesuit College, Kansas." A monument is to be erected to him in his native city. Thus in death as in life he will continue to bring honor to his Alma Mater and the Church.

A Tempting Bargain Counter

WE are told to shop early, but we can do our shopping at home in providing the Christmas presents for our poor missionaries in the African jungles, in the Chinese villages or under the Indian sun. What can be more tempting than the following choice of presents from which to make our selection? They are taken from a still ampler Christmas display spread out in a most irresistible way by the editor of the Good Work:

> Fifty cents to support a child for one month in an Indian mission; fifty cents to buy a year's school supplies for one child in a Chinese mission; fifty cents to dress a child for its baptism; sixty cents to keep a Chinese child two months; one dollar to keep a catechist a month in Africa; one dollar to keep a boy in the Little Seminary two weeks; one dollar to pay a Chinese nurse for one month; one dollar to buy twenty bricks for a chapel; three dollars to pay a catechist a month in India; three dollars to purchase a poor slave in Africa; three dollars to pay the salary of a priest's man-of-all-work in India; three dollars to buy text-books for a seminary in China; five dollars to buy and name a little Indian orphan; five dollars more to keep the little orphan half a year; twenty-five dollars to start a new mission in the African jungle; fifty dollars more to build the first grass chapel; fifty dollars more to build the priest's house there; one hundred dollars to build a chapel in India; one hundred dollars for a good picture-machine illustrating the life of Christ; one hundred dollars for a library of English books in China.

Any one who has more than a hundred dollars to give can apply for information to Mgr. John J. Dunn, the editor of the Good Work, New York, and he will not have long to wait for a reply. There are likewise the little comforts of the missionaries themselves to be borne in mind at this happy season, and there are rosaries, medals, holy pictures, altar and hospital supplies to be purchased by them. But our money for Christmas presents should be sent as soon as possible. It will not matter if it arrives a few days ahead of time. Our presents will be marked "Don't open until Christmas," although, as Mgr. Dunn remarks, there will not be a single missionary in the field "who won't shut his eyes to that notice." And who is to blame him for it? "He'll apologize to you with tears of joy."

Making Democracy Safe for the World

THE sanity of the Catholic point of view on the question of education is daily becoming more apparent to non-Catholics. Protestants in particular are recognizing the fact that the Sunday school system of religious education has proved a failure. Much more is required if the child is to be made a worthy citizen under any lawful form of democratic government. "Science and the remarkable development of educational systems," said the Rev. B. S. Winchester at the Protestant Religious Congress recently held in Pittsburgh, "have served but to refine and intensify the horrors of war." What is therefore supremely required is the self-mastery which can be given by religious education alone. "While undoubtedly the first duty of all right-thinking people is to make the world safe for democracy, the next duty, no less urgent, is to 'make democracy safe for the world.' For this education affords no guarantee, unless it be transfused and surcharged with religion." Yet this only true and sane ideal of education is attainable nowhere except in the system applied by the Catholic Church. After completing its cycle of aberration the world can but return to her. She possesses the wisdom of the ages no less than the promise of Christ and the Spirit of Truth.

Work of the Food Administration

"WHY doesn't the Food Administration bring down the high prices?" is a rhetorical question asked in a circular sent out from the office of the Food Administration. The reply given is that it takes time, preparation and much voluntary cooperation to bring this about. The further explanation is then added:

> But something is being done every day. To lower the cost of living, wherever it is possible, is one of the prime aims of the Food Administration, which has already kept the prices of many staples from going much higher. Flour might easily have been twice its present price per barrel if the Food Administration had not established a fair price for wheat and limited flour millers' profits. Sugar would almost certainly have gone soaring if speculation had not been stopped. Then, some prices have been lowered. Flour has fallen substantially below the August prices. Speculation in Cuban sugar has been stopped, saving an exorbitant price though not securing a sufficient supply. This temporary shortage would have meant a large advance in price had not the Food Administration secured a voluntary agreement from the producers of cane and beet sugar. Do not forget these facts because beefsteak is out of reach, sugar still higher than one could wish, and many have to live more largely on hope than they like to. Remember also that the Food Administration has no direct control over the retail trade, save where it does an annual business of $100,000 or more. That explains why, when the price of beef at the packer's door was 14.5 cents a pound, in October, as compared with 16 cents in July, the average price of round steak in 796 cities was 31 cents a pound against 27 in July, showing that while the wholesale price decreased the retail price increased.

If unreasonable prices are asked for canned corn, tomatoes and peas, suggests the Food Administration, the consumer should demand of the retail grocer why this is the case, since prices of such articles should be moderately low. Public sentiment and community cooperation are mentioned as vital factors in the work of lowering the cost of the necessities of life.

Chronicle

The War.—In the beginning of the week, the Austro-German forces in Northern Italy had cut off and captured 14,000 Italian troops, 10,000 in the Upper Piave Valley and 4,000 in the Cordevole, had advanced from Belluno down the Piave and were before Feltre while on the Asiago the Italian lines were heavily attacked in the sector of Gallios, Monte Longara, Hill 1674, and Meletta di Gallio. With the aid of boats the Teutonic armies subsequently effected a lodgment on the west bank of the Piave near Zenson on the southern reaches of the river, about twenty-three miles northeast of Venice. By November 14, at Grisolera, four miles from the mouth of the river, Austro-German detachments had filtered through into the marshy region between the Piave and the Vecchia, while in the north, following a withdrawal of the Italians to a new line east of Asiago, the Austrians occupied the Tezze-Lamon-Fonzaso-Arten-Feltre front between the Brenta and the Piave, and at the same time Primolano and Feltre fell into the invaders' hands. The Italian defense along the Piave stiffened somewhat, but on the northern front the enemy advanced south from Fonzaso and Feltre. On November 17, delayed dispatches from the Italian headquarters announced that the floodgates of the Piave and the Sile, or old Piave, had been opened by the Italian engineers at Grisolera, and that the whole region where the Austro-Germans had gained a lodgment a few days ago is now under water. The flooded area forms a triangle about twelve miles on each side with the apex at Dona di Piave, making a water-barrier to the enemy's advance upon Venice through the low-lying Adriatic coast region, which is also protected by Italian warships. By November 18 the Italians were holding their own at almost every point of the entire line of defense.

Bulletin, Nov. 12, p.m.-Nov. 19, a.m.

On the western front there has been heavy fighting all along the line. The Belgians successfully raided the enemy's posts at Nieuport, while the British have consolidated their lines on the Passchendaele Ridge and thrust back heavy counter attacks. The French War Office announces heavy artillery actions north of the Aisne in the region of Vauclerc, and on the right bank of the Meuse, in the sector of Apremont Forest.

In Palestine the British have made substantial gains. Since the capture of Askalon, General Allenby's troops have steadily pressed forward. The first dispatches of the week reported his left wing in the neighborhood of the ancient Ashdod, fourteen miles north of the Wadi Hesi, the enemy's rear guard occupying a line along the northern branch of the Wadi Sukereir. From Wadi Sukereir, the Turks were driven a distance of five miles to the Wadi Surar, eight miles south of Jaffa, the British capturing Mesmiyeh, Katrah and Mughar and holding the line from El Tineh, on the east through Katrah and Yebnah to the sea. As a result of General Allenby's advance the junction point of the Beersheba-Damascus Railway with the line to Jerusalem came into the possession of the British. By November 16 the British had reached the line from Er Ramle and Lud to some three miles south of Jaffa, and two days later they captured the city. Since October 31 more than 9,000 Turkish prisoners have been taken.

The agreement of Great Britain, France, and Italy for the Inter-Allied War Council, which was adopted after some friction by the parties concerned and read by Premier Lloyd George in the House of Commons, November 14, is as follows:

The Allied War Council

(1) With a view to better coordination of the military action on the western front, a Supreme War Council is composed of the Prime Minister and a member of the Government of each of the great Powers whose armies are fighting on that front, the extension of the scope of the Council to other fronts to be reserved for discussion with the other great Powers. (2) The Supreme War Council has for its mission to watch over the general conduct of the war. It prepares recommendations for the consideration of the Governments and keeps itself informed of their execution and reports thereon to the respective Governments. (3) The General Staff and military commands of the armies of each power charged with the conduct of the military operations remain responsible to their respective Governments. (4) General war plans drawn by competent military authorities are submitted to the Supreme War Council, which under high authority of government insures its concordance and submits, if need be, any necessary changes. (5) Each Power delegates to the Supreme War Council one permanent military representative, whose exclusive function is to act as technical adviser to the Council. (6) Military representatives receive from the Government and the competent military authorities of their country all proposals, information, and documents relating to the conduct of the war. (7) The military representatives watch day by day the situation of the forces and the means of all kinds of which the Allies and enemy armies dispose. (8) The Supreme War Council meets normally at Versailles, where the permanent military representatives and staffs are established. They may meet at other places according to circumstances. Meetings of the Supreme War Council take place at least once a month.

In explaining these terms, the Prime Minister stated that the Council would have no executive power and that final decision in the matter of strategy and the distribution and movements of the various armies in the field would rest with the several Governments of the Allies, and that there would therefore be no operations department attached to the Council.

After President Wilson's speech in Buffalo to the delegates of the American Federation of Labor, November 12, the executive council of the Federation recommended the adoption of the following principles as the basis of future peace negotiations:

The Labor Peace Terms

(1) The combination of the free peoples of the world in a common covenant for genuine and practical cooperation to secure justice and therefore peace in relations between nations. (2) Governments derive their just power from the consent of the governed. (3) No political or economic restrictions meant to benefit some nations and to cripple or embarrass others. (4) No indemnities or reprisals based upon vindictive purposes or deliberate desire to injure, but to right manifest wrongs. (5) Recognition of the rights of small nations and of the principle "No people must be forced under sovereignty under which it does not wish to live." (6) No territorial changes or adjustment of power except in furtherance of the welfare of the peoples affected and in furtherance of world peace.

In addition to these basic principles, which are based upon declarations of our President of these United States, there should be incorporated in the treaty—that shall constitute the guide of nations in the new period and conditions into which we enter at the close of the war the following declarations fundamental to the best interests of all nations and of vital importance to wage earners. (1) No article or commodity shall be shipped or delivered in international commerce in the production of which children under the age of sixteen have been employed or permitted to work. (2) It shall be declared that the basic workday in industry and commerce shall not exceed eight hours. (3) Involuntary servitude shall not exist except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted. (4) Establishment of trial by jury.

From the deliberations and the measures adopted by the Federation no room was left for doubt that the Government had the whole-hearted support of organized labor in the prosecution of the war.

In two messages, one cabled to the King of the Belgians on the occasion of the celebration of his birthday, the other telegraphed to citizens from six States of the Northwest gathered at St. Paul, Minn., President Wilson reaffirmed the determination of the United States to prosecute the war to a successful end. To King Albert, the President, among other things, says:

The President and the War

The people of the United States were never more in earnest than in their determination to prosecute to a successful conclusion this war against that power (Prussian autocracy) and to secure for the future obedience to the laws of nations and respect for the rights of humanity.

To the gathering in St. Paul, the President wired:

Nothing could be more significant than your gathering to express the loyalty of the great Northwest. If it were possible I should gladly be with you. You have come together as the representatives of that Western Empire in which the sons of all sections of America and the stocks of all the nations of Europe have made the prairie and the forest the home of a new race and the temple of a new faith.

The time has come when that home must be protected and that faith affirmed in deeds. Sacrifice and service must come from every class, every profession, every party, every race, every creed, every section. This is not a banker's war or a farmer's war or a manufacturer's or a laboring man's war; it is a war for every straight out American, whether our flag be his by birth or by adoption.

We are today a nation in arms, and we must fight and farm, mine and manufacture, conserve food and fuel, save and spend to the one common purpose. It is to the great Northwest that the nation looks, as once before in critical days, for that steadiness of purpose and firmness of determination which shall see this struggle through to a decision that shall make the masters of Germany rue the day they unmasked their purpose and challenged our Republic.

This second message is particularly significant, from the fact that it is addressed to residents of a section where Senator La Folette and others have been preaching pacifism.

The baking business of the country is to be put on a war basis on December 10 under Government regulation. After that, loaves of standard size only may be baked, and the industry must accept a formula prepared by the Food Administration. There will be no more fancy rolls, in the making of which large quantities of sugar are used. The Food Administration will not demand the mixing of other cereals with wheat, a policy adopted in France and England, but the new war loaf will differ in many points from that which is baked at present. Mr. Hoover, the Food Administrator, believes that a saving of 100,000,000 pounds of sugar and an equal amount of lard will be effected within a year.

The Standard Loaf

The acceptance of "returns" by bakers will be forbidden, thus saving, it is estimated, about 600,000 barrels of flour. It has been found on investigation that because of the "returns" thousands of loaves of bread have become a total loss. Seven cents a pound for bread under the new conditions is the mark now set where the elaborate delivery and credit systems are abandoned. The people will be asked to cooperate in a movement to reduce these overhead charges to a minimum. Authority to proceed under a licensing system was given to the Food Administration November 13. Bakers are classed as manufacturers, thus bringing them under the Food Control law. While the Food Administration has no way in which to control baking in homes, which represents sixty per cent of the total, all will be asked to accept voluntarily, the formula which has been prepared. It is expected that there will be a hearty response.

France.—The Painlevé Ministry, as reconstituted and approved late in October, has resigned. The events which led up to its resignation, which took place on November 13, were as follows: On that date the Premier outlined the scope of the recently formed "Conseil de Guerre Superieur" and asked the Deputies if the Government had the confidence of the Chamber and its authority to represent France at the coming conference of the Allies. A vote of 250 to 192 gave the Ministry a slight but sufficient majority, although a number of members expressed their lack of confidence by refusing to vote. M. Painlevé then declared that he was ready to discuss the diplomatic and military policies of the Government, but requested that discussion of the internal policy be postponed until after the allied conference had been terminated, that is, until November 30. A determined effort was made in the Chamber to force the immediate discussion of recent scandals, and in particular the alleged royalist plot, the accusations against M. Malvy, ex-Minister of the Interior, and the Bolo affair. Another vote of confidence was asked, but this time the Chamber signified its disapproval of the Government by a vote of 277 to 186. It was the first time since the beginning of the war that a number of the Deputies had departed from the policy they have pursued from the beginning of the war of not hampering the Government by direct resistance. Hitherto they have been content to abstain from voting. The Ministers at once withdrew from the Chamber and handed in their resignations.

Painleve Ministry Resigns

President Poincaré, on November 15, invited M. Georges Clemenceau to form a new Cabinet. He accepted the invitation and within twenty-four hours presented the new Ministry to the President. It is made up as follows: Premier and Minister of War, Georges Clemenceau; Minister of Foreign Affairs, Stephen Pichon; Minister of Justice, Louis Nail; Minister of Interior, Jules Pans; Minister of Finance, Louis Klotz; Minister of Marine, Georges Leygues; Minister of Commerce, Etienne Clementel; Minister of Public Works, Albert Claveille; Minister of Munitions, Louis Loucheur; Minister of Instruction, Louis Lafferre; Minister of Colonies, Henry Simon. Though the new Ministry seems to have met with rather general approval, yet it has some powerful enemies.

Ireland.—The Sinn Fein Convention was signalized by the frank speech of the chairman, De Valera, who declared that the organization aimed at securing the international recognition of Ireland as an independent republic. He asserted that such was the wish of the Irish people and that they intended to struggle as best they could to realize their idea. He passed this judgment on the "theologians" of the Irish Times and the Weekly Freeman, "who tell people that rebellion is not justifiable."

The Sein Fein Convention

> To those people who start as theologians with pipes in their mouths, and a glass of grog beside them—and they write many of the anonymous letters—I say in theology, at any rate, they might remember that a little learning is a dangerous thing.

Sinn Fein represented the will of the majority of the people and he felt sure the Catholic Church "would not allow itself to be a tool for the oppression of the people." Moreover, if England should have a constitution approved by the majority of the Irish people he would loyally abide by it, but he would not recognize a constitution imposed upon his people by a foreign government. Despite the general unrest of the country the convention passed off quietly. The Leader, one of the most able of the Irish papers, look for great results from it. The Weekly Independent is sympathetic, the Irish Times and the Weekly Freeman are hostile, but all the reputable papers pay tribute to the zeal and sincerity of De Valera and the other leaders.

Mexico.—Private letters from Mexico sometimes contain brief items which show better than newspaper articles the state of affairs in that unhappy republic. The following abstracts which might be multiplied without number are instances in point:

Letters, and a Proclamation

> (1) In our largest city but one, Guadalajàra, the Carranza authorities have decreed that all Catholic churches, except two, shall be closed. These wretched men assert that the new Constitution gives the officials of each State the privilege of deciding how many churches may be used for worship. Thus, as I have said, in Guadalàjara, with a population of 100,000, two churches are in use, and there are but two priests to attend to them. All the other priests have been expelled.
> (2) Our spiritual condition is pitiable. There are no priests in the entire State (Sonora); as a consequence people are dying without the Sacraments, and our grief is intensified by this dreadful circumstance which, we feel, is entirely due to your utter heartlessness in supporting Carranza.
> (3) An agent of the Carranza Government has arrived at the border to negotiate the sale of several thousand tons of scrap iron, the remnants of many of our railroads long since destroyed by Carranza. The agent offers the enormous pile of material for $40,000.

There lately appeared in La Revista Mexicana a comical proclamation which shows how the war spirit is kept alive in Mexico. The document was issued by the Zapatistas and amongst other headings bore these: "Carranza a prisoner in the capital of the republic. General Everardo Gonzalés . . . and Fortino Ayaquica who are fighting close to the capital, notify the general staff that on the eighth day of this month, the court-martial which is to try the so-called President of the Republic was duly constituted." The proclamation then proceeds to say that Carranza is on trial because the majority of the articles of the Constitution promulgated by him violate individual rights and give the First Chief power to carry out his own plans without the necessity of obtaining permission from the Chamber of Deputies. Then follows this illuminating paragraph:

> The anger of the Chamber was increased by the fact that the Protoconsul Palavicini, at a banquet he gave to the American ambassador in the palace of Chapultepec, declared that Mexico accepted the invitation to take part in the war against Germany and that, even though the Mexican people did not want this war, it would be carried through by force, for which end it would be necessary to recruit troops by force in all the towns. In this Carranza counted on the support of foreigners, it did not matter whether the Indians of Mexico were wiped out or not, for there were plenty of foreigners to repeople the country; they were more intelligent (than Mexicans) more learned and better spoken. Unlike Mexicans they were not stupid by birth, neither were they hypocrites who lived in churches wasting their time praying to wooden saints and paying priests for entrance into Heaven, which does not exist, while the priests themselves do nothing but grow fat and live joyfully, etc.

Thus is the war spirit fanned, first by the Zapatistas then by the Carranzistas, meantime the Deputies continue to admit that Mexico is bankrupt, hungry and altogether miserable.

Civil War

Russia.—During the past week news about the progress of the Bolsheviki's coup d'etat has been so meager and contradictory that it is hard to make out just what has happened. From Scandinavian sources came reports of a Bolsheviki defeat which were contradicted by dispatches from Petrograd. "Yesterday after bitter fighting near Tsarkoe-Selo the revolutionary army completely defeated the counter-revolutionary forces of Kerensky and Korniloff" was the wireless message received in London on November 13 and signed "Mouravieff, Commander-in-Chief of the Forces Acting Against Kerensky," but "General Korniloff has entered Petrograd where the entire garrison except the sailors went over to his side" was a dispatch that came via Stockholm the same day. On November 14 the evening papers announced the arrival of Premier Kerensky in Petrograd with a victorious army. His Cossacks were said to have destroyed the Red Guards and seized the telegraph lines, but from reports published November 16 the Bolsheviki appeared to be in control of Petrograd, Kerensky having retired. A little light was thrown on these and other confusing dispatches by news which reached this country on Saturday. It seems that the battle of Tsarskoe-Selo, between the Bolsheviki and Premier Kerenskys' troops, began on November 10 and lasted, with varying fortunes, till the night of the 12th. Aristocratic officers of veteran regiments were in command of the Bolsheviki, and successfully withstood the attacks of Kerensky's small Cossack army, until an armistice was concluded. The Prime Minister was then betrayed and deserted by his officers and was ordered to go to Petrograd and present himself before the Revolutionary Committee, but while a guard was being formed to conduct him there, Kerensky mysteriously disappeared. He now seems to be universally discredited. In Moscow, too, the situation is confusing. Fighting is said to have been going on in that city for a week. The Kremlin and the Town Hall, which the adherents of the Provisional Government held, were bombarded by the Bolsheviki's cannon and machine-guns, the casualties are thought to have been numerous and rioting occurred. All of Finland is reported to be under the control of the Socialists.

The Bolsheviki Council of Commissioners proclaim the right of the different people of Russia to determine their own form of government, including the constitution of independent States. They insist on the inclusion of Lenine and Trotsky in any composite Socialist Government and declare that the Bolsheviki must have a majority of the portfolios. News came on Monday last that Lenine's Cabinet was going to pieces, a number of Ministers resigning because they thought that the Bolsheviki should unite with the other Socialist parties in forming a Government. Meanwhile the Committee for the Salvation of the Revolution protested against the order for Kerensky's arrest, and the Petrograd Duma quarreled with the Revolutionary Committee about the management of the telephones.

According to advices published in this country on Monday last the Petrograd Bolsheviki, who triumphantly re-entered Petrograd in the middle of last week, were menaced on Sunday, November 18, by an army of the Provisional Government's supporters who were nearing the city. General Dukhonin announced that in the absence of Kerensky he had taken command of the loyal troops. Moscow was reported to be quiet.

Strike Leaders Punished

Spain.—The authors of the recent revolutionary strike in Spain have been tried and condemned As the country was under martial law, the trial was conducted by the military authorities, with perfect justice and complete publicity. Each of the accused was allowed to choose a military captain for his defense. The prosecution charged the leaders of the strike with the "frustrated crime of military sedition and the consummated crime of rebellion," and demanded for the principals, accomplices and abettors "penalties laid down in the ordinary penal code and in the code of military justice." The defense claimed that

> A strike is not against the law, that this strike was motived merely by the economic crisis, and was not revolutionary nor did it constitute the crime of rebellion, and that in any case in labor societies the majority rule and those at the head have to follow out the decisions of the majority, whether they are identified with these decisions or not.

By the decision of the judges, approved by the supreme military authority of the region, the Captain-General of New Castile, Julian Besteiro, Francisco Largo Caballero, Daniel Anguinano and Andres Saborit were found to be the guilty and responsible authors of the revolution and were condemned "to perpetual imprisonment and perpetual and absolute civil disability."

The End and the Means

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S. J.

AS lovers of "The Cardinal's Snuff Box" will recall, it was Mrs. O'Donovan Florence who said that if we poor Papists only deserved the reputation for sharp practices that has been foisted upon us, it would be in Browning's phrase, "Roses, roses, all the way." "Why are we forbidden to let the end justify the means?" she inquires plaintively of the Lord Cardinal Udeschini. "And where are those accomodements avec le ciel of which we've heard? We're not even permitted a few poor accomodements avec le monde." Thus has it ever been. We are not allowed to live up to our reputations. We are given a bad name and hanged for it. In the brave days of yore when inquisitors were as numerous as wire-tappers, and Jesuits held the ear of princes, every manner of lying, writes a New York Methodist clergyman, Dr. Reisner, was upheld by the Jesuits, since that "organization" did argue that "the end justifies the means."

In previous papers I examined von Hoensbroech, Dr. Reisner's first authority, only to discover that, on the very page to which I was referred, this worthy confessed his inability to prove the charge, in a case presented by himself, before a legal tribunal at Cologne. I then accepted Dr. Reisner's invitation to examine what Dr. Sheldon had to say on probabilism and mental reservation. It is now in order to review Dr. Sheldon's direct testimony in proof of the assertion that the Jesuits "did argue that the end justifies the means." The worthy doctor begins with the admission that the maxim "has been declared by the Jesuits foreign to their teaching. No doubt, the Society as a whole has never accorded it a formal sanction," a statement which scarcely proves Dr. Reisner's accusation that it was taught and practised by the "organization." Yet not for this slight discrepancy shall the Society escape, for "Very prominent writers," continues Dr. Sheldon, "have given quite an explicit statement of the maxim." ("History of the Christian Church," III, p. 421.) On examination, these prominent writers reduce themselves to precisely and explicitly two, Busembaum and Laymann, nor does Dr. Sheldon quote from the writings of either theologian, but from "The Constitution and Teaching of the Jesuits" (p. 422, note) written by W. C. Cartwright, a man who as an authority easily ranks with the late and unlamented "Tom" Watson of Georgia.

It is a weary task to rehearse the obvious, but before taking up the two brief citations borrowed by Sheldon from Cartwright, "a word in explanation of our terms is in place." In every human act three elements may be considered. The first is the end, or that for the sake of which the action is undertaken; the next is the means, or the thing done to obtain the end; and lastly, the circumstances, conditions of time, place and surroundings under which the action is performed. Now the end and the means alike may be good, bad or indifferent; here we are mainly concerned with the means, for I do not suppose that even the Jesuits were ever accused of teaching the lawfulness of formal evil, although I am not quite sure that the charge has not been made. Some means to an end may be good in themselves, such as to love God; some intrinsically bad, as blasphemy and lying, even about the Society of Jesus; while some may be in themselves neither morally good nor bad, for instance, to sail a boat, or to pat a small boy on the head as you pass him on the street. Finally, some means, not intrinsically bad, are permissible only in circumstances of exceptional gravity. Thus I may defend myself, even to the shedding of blood, against a thug bent on taking my life. Circumstances, too, may impart a good or evil character to an action otherwise indifferent. To sing is not a sin, but it may be, if my wretched execution causes serious annoyance to a person dangerously ill. To sum up with an example: if out of pure charity I give an alms, I use a good means to a good end. If I intend my alms as a bribe, I am perverting a good means to a bad end. Lastly, if intending to aid those most unsocial persons, the Little Sisters of the Poor, I steal Mr. John A. Kingsbury's purse, I am absurdly trying to make a good end justify the employment of a means intrinsically evil. As to circumstances, I may add that were I to advertise my alms in the daily press, or through a foundation, I should introduce an element calculated to lessen or destroy all merit. (Cf. Thurston, the Month, Vol. 98, p. 618.) In all this there is nothing very recondite. It is the common teaching of moralists (e. g. St. Thomas, Gury, Lehmkuhl, Sabetti-Barrett, Slater, Rickaby) and is daily practiced by respectable citizens who have learned it, not from the theologians, but from common-sense.

As Dr. Sheldon has borrowed from Cartwright two brief texts from Busembaum and Laymann, men held in reverence for their piety as for their learning, I can do no better than recur to the same authorities. Busembaum, for instance, writes, "A precept forbidding what is wrong in itself must never be violated, not even through fear of death" ("Medulla," lib. I, tract, 2, c. 4, dub. 2, n. 1), and adds, "Things wrong in themselves being, for example, blasphemy, idolatry, impurity, slander—as said above." There is cold comfort for Dr. Sheldon in this statement of principle, and less, I fear, in the following quotation from Laymann:

The circumstance of a good end nowise benefits an action objectively bad but leaves it simply and wholly bad—e.g., he who steals to give an alms commits a bad action on the score of injustice, and does not perform a good action on the score of charity. . . . The reason is to be sought in the difference between moral good and moral evil; for, as St. Denis says, "An action is good if all its constituent parts is good; it is bad if any one of them is bad," which means that for an action to be morally good both the object [the deed done] and the end and the circumstances must be good; whereas if any one of them be defective, it will not be a good action, but vicious and evil. (Theol. Mor. lib. I, tract. 2, c. 9, n. 7. Italics inserted.)

As if this were not sufficiently clear, Laymann makes his own the teaching found in St. Augustine's "Enchiridion:"

What is known to be sinful must not be done under any pretext of a good cause, nor for any end as being a good one, nor with any intention professing to be good.

"In other words," concludes Laymann, "a vicious choice [of means] makes the intention [the end] also vicious."

Against this clear statement of principles, Sheldon, after stating ridiculously that Busembaum "can claim the continued and solemn approval of the supreme authority of the Church," simply because his book has been printed by the Propaganda Press, cites from the "Medulla" the mystic words, "Cum finis est licitus, etiam media sunt licita," when the end is licit the means are also licit. Candor would prompt the insertion of the whole passage in which Busembaum explicitly excludes means that are unlawful. Excusing Dr. Sheldon on the ground that he probably never saw a volume of Busembaum, I supply the omission. It is the moralist's answer to the question, "What may an accused man lawfully do to escape punishment?"

It is lawful for the accused, even when really guilty, to escape before and after the sentence of death, or of some punishment equal to death, v.g., life imprisonment, has been passed. The reason is because man's right to his life is so great that no human power can oblige him not to preserve it, if there be well-grounded hope of his doing so; unless indeed the public weal demand otherwise. Hence the accused may escape . . . unless charity urge him not to do so, when the harm to the guards is greater than that which would come to himself. (1) Much more so may he flee so as not to be captured . . . but he must use no violence by wounding or striking the ministers of justice. (2) He may also, at least before the tribunal of conscience, circumvent the guards—excluding violence and injury—by giving them, for instance, food or drink to induce sleep, or by bringing it about that they will be absent; he may snap his chains, or break open the prison, because, cum finis est licitus etiam media sunt licita, when the end is lawful the means are also lawful. (Medulla, Lib. IV, c. 3, d. 7, a. 2.)

It is this case, a "stock case" with moralists, that is likewise considered by Laymann. Both theologians had already stated the principle that a good end could not justify the employment of evil means; and in the stock case it is to be noted, in the words of Father Barrett, the American moralist, that we have an "explicit exclusion of unlawful means, and the sense of the phrase is this only: when the end is lawful, then is the use of means in themselves indifferent, i. e., not unlawful, permitted." In this sense only is it understood by moralists.

Indeed, Dr. Sheldon himself, after parading his two borrowed quotations, remarks that he is not "inclined to lay very great stress upon these formal statements." Nevertheless, he is "disposed to emphasize those actions . . . which in an unpleasant number of instances have indicated a disposition in the Jesuits to harbor the maxim in the loose and pernicious sense" (p. 422, italics inserted). At this, he quotes four passages from Lessius, Laymann and Escobar, leaving them, because of their shocking immorality, in Latin. The principles underlying Laymann's teaching have been discussed and need not detain us. Lessius, according to the quotation, holds as probable that a man in extreme danger "of disease, hunger or nudity" may relieve his necessity by stealthily taking from the goods of the rich, "if no other way is possible," and adds that such action probably is lawful if the danger is not extreme, but "grave." Let stern moralists like Sheldon and Dr. Reisner brand the starving beggar as a thief, but does the passage prove Dr. Reisner's accusation against the Society, or Sheldon's unmanly insinuations that the Jesuits practised what they dared not teach? Escobar's solutions are equally dreadful. "If my property is held by another under an unjust title, may I take it by stealth? Not if you can recover it in some other way; but you are not bound to restitution, because the thing is yours. . . . Does a servant sin mortally by taking a notable quantity of his master's goods? Yes, unless the master is quite unreasonable, as for instance, if he fails to provide his servant with the necessities of life. In this case the natural law gives the servant the right to preserve his life." The depths of Escobar's depravity is plainly unspeakable. But does it prove "a disposition in the Jesuits to harbor the maxim" that the end justifies the means "in the loose and pernicious sense"?

"People of the Sheldon-Reisner type will always believe that your Society teaches immorality," said a New York lawyer to me recently. "Why answer them?" The task does seem a bit futile, but the answers that have been given time and again during several centuries are not so much an appeal to such persons as a testimony to the truth. "It has never been proved, and can never be proved, although the attempt has been frequently made," writes the Rev. Ethelred Taunton in the "Encyclopedia Britannica" (XV, 341) "that the Jesuits ever taught the nefarious proposition ascribed to them." "Whoever without furnishing the proof I demand shall in speech or writing ascribe to the Society of Jesus this shameful doctrine," wrote Father Roh in his challenge of sixty years ago, "sets himself down as a slanderous scoundrel." Strong language perhaps, but thoroughly justified.

With this we may dismiss Dr. Reisner and his outrageous charges against the Jesuits, charges in no wise justified by his "authorities," and as yet unretracted. In the near future my good friend, Mr. John Wiltbye, will deal with like accusations preferred by General Bell, a Georgia dominie, and the New York Globe.

"East of the Sun, West of the Moon"

BLANCHE M. KELLY

THE last century included among its notable achievements the discovery of a country which its explorers called Bohemia. The French were its pioneers, and its main thoroughfare was the Boulevard Saint-Michel. These men, by right of discovery, regulated its manners and codified its laws, a task of extreme simplicity, for it consisted in agreeing that there should be none of either. Newcomers had no difficulty in learning the customs of this country, for they had only to bethink them what was the usage elsewhere, and straightway do the contrary.

The poverty of men of letters was then, as it is now, proverbial. Everybody was familiar with Grub Street. Everybody knew the story of Dr. Johnson in ragged habiliments, eating his dinner behind a screen, whence he contributed his brilliant share to the conversation at his host's table. Poets, however, were still thought to ride winged steeds, to seek their inspiration among the stars, and to learn their fine scorn for the grosser demands of the body from a heaven-taught lore. When Sydney Smith proposed as motto for the Edinburgh the Virgilian line Tenui musam meditaris avena he supplied the witty translation: "We cultivate literature on a little oatmeal." And this was considered to cover the case. Something akin to holy zeal impelled poor blundering Chatterton, and the monk fasting in his cell was not too remotely removed, even in heaven's sight, from the poet who starved in his garret rather than relinquish "the privilege of seeing great things in loneliness." Not that the lives of all poets were edifying, there had been Villon, of course, and Ronsard, to mention only two, but the one had possessed the saving graces of reverence and humility, and the other, whatever the irregularities of his life, came to a repentant end.

It remained for the Bohemians, the Parnassians, the decadents, the symbolists, for they went by many names, for Verlaine, Rimbaud and Baudelaire to live amid sordid surroundings less from necessity than from choice. They frequented cellars and garrets and low resorts; they groveled in gutters and went unkempt. They robbed Grub Street of its dignity without taking away its reproach, nor did they ally poverty with abstemiousness, for they cultivated literature on vast quantities of absinthe and narcotics, and their literary productions smack of the soil on which they grew. And when they were not flagrantly unclean they bestowed such extreme and fastidious care upon their personal appearance as to typify for all time that ludicrous creature, the dandy. The stays of Barbey d'Aurevilly set the fashion for those who mounted an unbridled Pegasus and were less concerned with his flight than with their riding costume. Under the Renaissance-worship of the beauty of this world lay corruption, but the beauty was at least a reflection of a higher Beauty, to which the earthly sister not infrequently acted as handmaid by bringing to the shrine of invisible loveliness the eyes that were sated with seeing.

But the symbolists would give the knee to no such goddess. They would not have beauty at any price, but chose the underlying corruption and set up ugliness on the vacant pedestal. They laid down new norms of art which were abortion and deformity. Perhaps the less said about their morals the better, inasmuch as they set themselves up to be connoisseurs of evil. And so they added still another to their list of achievements, for in their hungry quest for sensations they went to religion for un frisson nouveau, a new shudder. They took the language of the sanctuary, the terms of mysticism, the experiences of the spiritual life and they put them to base uses. They wrote of their unholy loves in language which believers reserve for their moments of communion with the Most High. They no longer went for inspiration to the Muses' sacred hill but to the dissecting-rooms of hospitals, to madhouses and to haunts in comparison with which hospitals and madhouses are the purlieus of heaven.

When a Bohemian colony landed on English shores it encountered that unsympathetic thing, a sense of humor. Britons were disposed to be tolerant of Gallic gentlemen who in the intervals of writing poetry led live lobsters about on silken strings. French being a foreign language was difficult to speak and doubtless some such heroic measures were necessary for the writing of it, but when citizens of London took to wearing flowing locks and fantastic garments, the British public howled with laughter. Manet's illustrations of Mallarmé's "Poe," according to Mr. Edmund Gosse, were greeted with "undying mirth." Gilbert and Sullivan did their best for the "ultra-poetical, super-esthetical, out of the way young man," but people could not be induced to take him seriously.

The Philistine suspicion that literature was a not-quite-respectable calling, which had been aroused by Byron and Shelley and Burns, was not calculated to be allayed by the productions of the "fleshly school" or Swinburne's metrical excesses. But a worse thing than that has happened which is that the Philistine circles have agreed to take the ultra-poetical young man (and woman) seriously. They are expected to be queer and temperamental and many of them at great personal inconvenience strive to live up to these expectations. This, at least, seems to be the only explanation of an American Bohemia, the denizens of which have chosen to be picturesquely uncomfortable amid squalid surroundings, to defy convention, and, in their conversation at least, the ordinary standards of morality and belief. And although this New York Bohemia, with its Russian and Yankee admixtures, is a place which even Baudelaire might consider beyond the just deserts of the evil which he did, as he said himself, knowingly (le sachant), though the odor of the "Fleurs de Mal" is over all their works, there is something pathetic about the new Bohemians. Their atheism has all the shrillness of Shelley's in his youth without its novelty. Their blasphemies do not startle because the blasphemers deny no faith of theirs; once you feel that it does not much matter what you believe it matters less what you disbelieve. Their lewdness is that of a boy who uses improper language for the sake of trying the effect on his grandmother. It is all so studied, so made to order, so upholstered. And then the literature! In form it is usually vers-librist and dramatic and in substance unsubstantial. Self-respecting marionettes would scorn to play in the tenuous, plotless dramas, which are, however, especially lavish in scenic direction, given with the wealth of detail which we associate with bad dreams. Even their literary cosmos is out of joint, for while there is a great deal about suns and moons, the suns seem to be the creations of Leon Bakst and the moons are redolent of green cheese.

There is a two-fold pathos about the perversion of logic which makes such things the necessary concomitants of literature. It is true that Mangan's intemperance dragged him into the gutters of Dublin and that Dowson's excesses led him to an ignoble death, but Mangan knew genuine and grinding poverty and each of these men carried in his soul a flame of faith which enabled him to recognize his failing as a moral transgression and taught him sorrowing remorse. Not all the opium in the world could achieve the perfection of De Quincey's prose and they who ascribe Francis Thompson's soaring verse to the fact that he was a drug-addict forget that he was familiar with the heights of prayer.

There is, however, something strangely familiar about this land of Bohemia, its byways, its shops, the ways of its citizens and all at once you are able to identify it. It is the land "East of the Sun and West of the Moon," the geographical location of which so tormented your childish fancy. Perhaps it was the moon that gave you the clue. You have so long known it for the land of unreality, of delusion, of hallucination. There is behind all the sayings and doings of these people just that hint of conscious make-believe, just that half-glance at the audience which betrays the fact that it is all a game based, it is true, on a clever idea. Yet the cleverest of ideas is dangerous if it becomes fixed. And after all there did come a day when Baudelaire registered his ultimate sensation, the recognition of approaching madness: "J'ai cultivé mon hystérie . . . J'ai senti passer sur moi le vent de l'imbecilité."

And the added pity is that grown men can play at a game like this when their fellows are going out to face the one reality and to contest with death that undelectable country, which soldiers, by way of valiant jest, have named No Man's Land.

A Society of Nations

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

IN the address which he delivered before the Senate on January 22, 1917, the President of the United States set forth the conditions under which the Government would feel justified in asking our people to approve the formal adherence of the United States to a league of peace. Mr. Wilson defined the peace which all men were then longing for as one that would deserve the approval of mankind and would not merely further the interests and immediate aims of the nations engaged in war. That peace should be guaranteed by a force "so much greater than the force of any nation now engaged or any alliance hitherto formed or projected that no nation, no probable combination of nations, could face or withstand it." It should be guaranteed by "the major force of mankind."

In the first days of June, 1917, an "order of the day" was voted in the French Chamber of Deputies to define more clearly and explicitly the aims which France was pursuing in the European conflict. Among other things it proclaimed the necessity "of stable guarantees of peace and independence for all nations, great and small, in the organization of the Society of Nations." The motion was not carried in the Senate, which seems to have been frightened by the concluding formula. But the formula and its ideals met the approval of some of the most prominent French statesmen, among them the Minister of Foreign Affairs in the Painlevé Cabinet, M. Alexandre Ribot.

A league of peace, a federation of peoples, a society of nations, has long been the dream of the ruler, the poet and the statesman. From the days when Virgil sang of a golden age under the heaven-sent prince of the Fourth Eclogue, to those of Tolstoy, the dream has ever haunted the idealist. Practical men even have felt its lure. A Roman Emperor like Constantine, and a French King like Henry IV, entertained some plan to bring it about. As a matter of fact there has been in history a time when the statesman, the poet, the dreamer and the philosopher saw their ideals realized, and when there existed a "society of nations" where the supreme law was not force, where the nations, rude, passionate and self-willed as they were, recognized some higher arbiter than the sword, and bowed to a central authority and law. That "society of nations" was the best safeguard and promoter of peace that the world has seen. If it could be entirely reconstituted today such as it was in the past in its members and in its head, the statesmen and the thinkers of the world would find those guarantees of a lasting peace which they are so eagerly seeking. The society in question was the wonderful society of the Middle Ages, of the eleventh, twelfth and thirteenth centuries, the great Christian Republic of the Ages of Faith with its international arbiters of peace, those world-umpires, the great Popes like Gregory VII, Innocent III, and Honorius IV.

In the eleventh, twelfth and thirteenth centuries, Europe was divided territorially, racially, politically. These differences owing to the difficulty of travel and commercial interchange were still more emphasized than they are today. But the nations had one bond in common. When Innocent III and Gregory VII and Honorius IV were Popes, and Philip Augustus, John Lackland and Henry IV were kings and emperors, divided as they were racially, the nations of Christian and Catholic Europe formed one great social and organic unit. Christian Europe was governed by one common legislation. The same fundamental and essential rights were recognized by all. There was a code, a constitution implicitly accepted by rulers and by subjects alike, which in the comity of nations had a binding force on the conscience of the peasant as well as of the king. The fundamental laws of that great society of peoples were sometimes trampled on, for kings and lords were hot blooded, autocratic and cruel, and nations rebelled just as they do today. But there was an international tribunal to which the helpless might appeal and which, lifted above the turmoil of the fray, could be counted upon to give an impartial verdict. That international tribunal and the judge who occupied its seat of honor were in a position to enforce their verdicts. Their coercive power and judicial sanctions were recognized by the Catholic world. The whole system of laws, precedents and procedures was eminently suited to the times, times of faith, reverence, loyalty to authority, respect both for the temporal and the spiritual ruler, bishop, abbot, Pope or king. It rested upon a perfect harmony between the spiritual and the temporal power, upon what has been called their intimate and efficacious collaboration, their "compenetration."

There is no more fascinating study for the student of social life than that of those Ages of Faith. In spite of the evident imperfections of human nature, those ages are one of the noblest periods of history. Feudalism then reigned in all its power. It had its weak side, for not seldom under cruel and heartless lords it exploited the poor and the serf. But it developed a sentiment of mutual dependence between the rich and the poor. There was a splendid gradation from the lowest toiler of the soil up to the abbot of the rich monastery and through baron, earl and duke, to the highest representatives of temporal rule, the emperor or king. That temporal hierarchy had its manifold ramifications in the feudal body. But it too was subject to a higher authority. The spiritual and higher hierarchy was that of the Catholic Church itself, centered in the Papacy, which exercised its full powers, without fear or favor, over kings and people.

These two powers, the civil and the ecclesiastical, remained it is true, distinct both in law and in fact. But there was constant cooperation between the two. In the provincial, national and ecumenic councils, belted earls deliberated side by side with mitred abbots and bishops, doctors of civil law were called upon to give their advice even on points of church discipline, after the priest had spoken. Bishops and abbots on the other hand were temporal rulers, feudal lords with all the powers of their civil peers.

On the whole this intimate union of the two powers was of immense benefit to society. On account of it, the principles of law, order, self-control, obedience, the lessons of charity, purity and exalted enthusiasm for all noble causes gradually gained ground and developed the splendid and chivalrous society which has so justly been admired as one of the brightest products of civilization. Slowly, out of these conciliar assemblies where Popes, kings and princes, earls and knights, clerks of the Sorbonne and Oxford and merchant princes from the free cities of Germany sat side by side in the profession and defense of a common faith, there grew a uniform code of law, uniform practices making for the peace and the order of Europe, an international code whose foundations were laid deep down in the hearts of the people, for they firmly believed in the authority of the temporal ruler but had a still deeper reverence for the higher and the more sacred office of the Pontiff of Rome. In those days the Pope was the permanent President of a great international peace-court. He was vested with that power because he was King and because he was Pope. He enforced his verdicts by his appeal to the conscience of Christendom. He could enforce them by an appeal to the sword. He could do so, however, far more efficaciously by an appeal to the spiritual weapons which he wielded, weapons which both king and people dreaded more than the battle-axe or the spear. The Popes were then arbiters and umpires in the great international crises of the day. Through them the Truce of God and the Peace of God were instituted to diminish at least the horrors of warfare. When the rights of religion and morality and the common laws which protected society were outraged, the Councils of the Middle Ages, the Popes and bishops of those days had at their command the weapons of excomunication and interdict, so much dreaded by a Catholic people, and they used them. On rare occasions, when there were no other means to avenge outraged morality or check a lawless tyrant, the Pope, commanding in the name of justice and right, ordered the helpless victims to draw the sword and to fight for their rights and the cause of liberty. By tacit consent, by countless precedents, the society of nations delegated these powers to the Popes. They were the judges in Israel. Christian Europe then recognized that there were some things which could not be done with impunity, that there was such a thing as justice, that there was a court which would not condone crime, but, on the contrary, thunder out its verdict of disapproval in such tones that the whole world would hear.

This religious, political and social economy of the Middle Ages was possible because men believed intensely in the mysteries and the teachings of a common Faith, were united in the reception of the same Sacraments, because they reverenced a central authority, and put the spiritual over the temporal. In the society of the nations of the Middle Ages the spiritual element represented by the Pontiffs of Rome ultimately triumphed over the barbarism of feudalism. A peace tribunal, a court of arbitration, was ever in session in Rome. For centuries, until the Reformation broke the bond of unity, in spite of blunders and frailties, the rulings of that international court where the Popes were the supreme judges, worked for the peace and happiness of the world. The world would certainly be happier now if the same tribunal and the same judge could command the same reverence and obedience from a society of nations modeled on that of the Ages of Faith.

Beyond the Realm of Sense

DANIEL A. LORD, S.J.

A FEW years ago, just after the scientific hysteria of the "silly seventies" it seems to have been philosophical bad form for a person to call his soul his own. Souls were carefully card-indexed for the information of antiquarians, and in their place the world was given the omnipotent and all-explaining cell, the complex association of nerve-fibers, or the brain that secreted thought as the glands secrete saliva. It was all so very simple that there was no further need for a soul. Did not the cell explain life, and did not the complexity of the brain-fibers explain thought? A number of persons retorted very abruptly: "No, they did not!" But the human voice with difficulty makes itself heard amidst a riot of applause, and applause was showered pretty freely on the scientists in the limelight.

So those who believed that a fact is not disproved by screaming violently against it or calling it names, those, in fine, who liked to fancy that they had a spiritual soul to distinguish them from their pet parrot or fox terrier, decided to possess themselves in patience for a time. Now it is becoming recognized that anyone who tucked away his soul in intellectual moth-balls was very fortunate. Souls are getting to be the fashion once more. In fact, they are quite the vogue.

By a soul men have understood a vital principle distinct from matter yet so united to it that soul and body make up but one person. This soul they have regarded as the thinking-principle and the principle from which flows those actions which we call free. Those who deny souls maintain that besides matter there is just nothing. The brain alone thinks; and as for free-will—well, if they are honest in their materialism, they pass it over with a flippant reference to popular delusions; their only other alternative is to ignore what they cannot begin to explain.

All men stand in wonder before the tremendous capacity of the human intellect. There is something almost overwhelming in the intellectual attainments of men like the giants of the Renaissance. When Da Vinci wrote to the Duke of Milan the list of his abilities, he was not merely eulogizing his own mental powers, he was uttering a panegyric of the human mind. Socrates, who by his own unaided intellect leaped to the idea of a supreme deity, Aristotle and St. Thomas stripping off the individuating qualities in things to reach deep into their essences, Newton when he arrived at the universal principle of gravitation, not less than the astronomer who from abstract mathematics attained to a knowledge of stars he never saw, gave instances of the magnificent power of the human intellect.

Are such intellects merely the complex association of nerve-fibers? Do they differ only in their degree of intensity from the faculty of cognition in horses and oxen? That is precisely the point in this essay in arm-chair philosophy. It has always been the claim of the best philosophy that the brain alone does not think; that our intellectual life is such that it cannot proceed from mere matter. For an explanation of thought one needs a spiritual soul, that is, a soul distinct from the material body.

It is quite obvious that all our knowledge begins with what we learn through the senses. But the human intellect does not stop with the bare facts as reported by the senses. On the contrary, it is never satisfied with the information thus gained. The intellect knows, for example, not merely that two Pekingese dogs plus their two expensive pups make a kennel of four fine dogs, but it knows that if no such thing as Pekingese pups existed, or, for that matter, if the person thinking were the only material object in the world, two and two would still make four. The intellect has jumped from the concrete puppies to the essential nature of two and two.

As I walk down the avenue a chauffeur in a fine touring-car stops a few feet ahead of me and picks up two very ragged and very delicate children. This individual act of a kindly man impresses me so much that I murmur to myself, "Courtesy is surely oil on the wheels of progress." My mind, not content with the individual case reported by my senses, has leaped to a generalization; I saw a single act of a kindly man; I think about that highly abstract, that intangible quality of courtesy, which no longer fits merely the individual case but all cases where a tender heart prompts men to deeds of unselfish gentleness.

Two litigants fight over a title deed to a piece of uptown property. There is an exchange of words, then of lawyer's visits, a morning with a modern Solomon in check suit and tortoise-shell glasses, and after learned arguments by the lawyers, an interrogation of the witnesses, the aforesaid Solomon pronounces that Litigant A has the right to the property. The judge uses the word "right" casually, believing that everyone in the courtroom understands him; and though not a man present, from his Honor to the tramps who dropped in to get warm, ever saw or heard or tasted anybody's right to anything, Litigant B bows in submission and goes forth to drown his sorrow in the flowing bowl and his attorney's flow of explanation.

Abbot Mendel gathers together the last batch of his hybrid peas from his monastery garden and sits down to put into writing his revolutionary theory of heredity. After all, the number of pea plants he has investigated is relatively small, yet he dares to lay down a law applicable not only to pea plants in his garden but to the pea plants in Asia and Africa, that furnished the tables of Confucius or Rameses II, or to plants that shall bloom in the year of grace 2000. And other scientists seizing on this newly discovered law apply it to cocks and dogs and blooded sheep!

The instances used are by no means extraordinary. The mind is constantly employed in acts of just such a character. One sees a mother fondling her first-born and sits down to write a poem on maternal love. Right, justice, morality, things which the senses are simply incapable of seeing, are the subject of our incessant thought and of tremendous import in our ordinary lives. Science would be out of the question were the human mind not capable of passing from the individual specimen under the microscope to the universal law that lies behind.

Thorn bushes will be producing in the normal course of nature a large harvest of grapes long before the senses will be able to produce such intellectual thoughts. The mere matter that composes the brain and the senses in the philosophy of the materialists cannot explain the simplest abstract concept. Does the eye ever see the abstract quality of courtesy or of maternal love? The answer to that is simply that there is no such thing existing in matter as abstract courtesy or maternal love. Courteous chauffeurs exist, but courtesy does not; mothers who love their children are, thank Heaven, still brightening the earth, but maternal love is an abstract quality and as such is not found in material creation. The senses, as we know from constant experience, report only the concrete, individual type. There must be another faculty in us which reaches thus to the quality which is found not merely in one particular case, but in all cases of a like nature.

It is simply ridiculous to maintain that our senses can grasp a universal law of nature. Did anyone ever see the law of gravitation, or touch it, or taste it, or hear it? Men have seen apples falling to earth and the scuttled ship sink in the waves, but the law that lies back of these facts they have never subjected to touch or sight or hearing.

As for those tremendous moral facts of truth and honor and duty and civil right which are absolutely essential to the life of man, they have no material essence whatsoever. Fancy asking a policeman to show you his right to regulate traffic! Imagine asking the rulers of a warring European nation to let you see the wound in its national honor! Yet for its honor that nation has plunged itself into a devastating war. For truth a martyr will lay down his life. The right of the traffic policeman will stop the most reckless driver. Here certainly are facts that move the world; and yet not one of them has ever been touched by our senses. If matter alone existed in man, no amount of nerve-action could ever know anything about them. Matter can only attain to a knowledge of the material; sense can know only the sensible.

History is a long record of that something within man that peremptorily refuses to be satisfied with mere matter or with bodies. The very fact that man is constantly arguing over the question of souls is enough to show that his intellect will not rest with the material. If merely our brains think, then the idea of a soul, which is a substance without extension or any of the attributes of matter, would never occur to it. It could only imagine the things it has perceived or things like them, and it has never perceived anything save extended, tangible matter.

And that something within man which will not rest content with matter has throughout the history of all races been rising to a Being far transcending the realms of sensitive experience: God. Men have never seen nor heard God with their senses, yet men's intellects have been either admitting Him or disputing about Him from the least known days of old. The very infidel who denies God's existence knows what is contained in the idea of deity. To rise to such an ultra-sensitive idea something more than mere matter is required. Without a soul the thought of God is simply inexplicable.

In a Belgian Garden

E. S. SHARPE, M.A.

IN a little town in Belgium, not very far from the front, is a peaceful convent of nuns. The convent stands in its own grounds, and in the silence of the garden, where the tall poplar trees rise like dark sentinels round about the walls of the enclosure, there come at intervals the dull thud and boom of the heavy guns in the distance, slowly but surely driving the German invader out of Belgium.

In a corner of the convent garden lies a low mound, on which the earth is still fresh, for it was piled up only a day or so after June 7 of this year. Beneath the mound, with his feet turned towards the east as one who sleeps until the coming of the dawn, lies a gallant gentleman and brave soldier, who went up "over the top" at the head of his men at the battle of Wytschaete on June 7, and fell most gloriously in action, with his face towards the enemy. It is the grave of Major Willie Redmond of the Irish Brigade, younger brother of the Irish Leader, and up to the time of his death Member of Parliament for East Clare.

He was over fifty years of age when he first volunteered, shortly after the outbreak of the war. He was appointed Captain in the Royal Irish Regiment, in which he had served before his election to the House of Commons, some thirty-three years previously. He had said that if Irishmen were to come together it was to be by fighting side by side against the common enemy. And he had been as good as his word. His services at the front brought him promotion to the rank of major, and he had been mentioned in dispatches by Field-Marshal Sir Douglas Haig.

Then on June 7 last came the great bombardment and the setting off of the mines, and the Royal Irish Regiment went up to the attack on Wytschaete Wood. Major Redmond could have stayed behind. But he loved his men, and he preferred to go over the top with them and face the common danger. So he went, and gave his life for a cause and a faith that were more dear to him than life itself.

His dead body was carried to the convent behind the lines, where in company with brother officers he had paid many a visit, and where on the walls of the refectory the hand of an artist nun had painted side by side the Irish Harp and the Red Hand of Ulster; the symbol of the union of the fighting men of Ireland. In a corner of the convent garden his body was laid to rest, and the grave was tended by the loving care of the nuns.

On Sunday, October 21, a little company was gathered round the grave of Major Redmond for a touching ceremony. The General of the Irish Brigade in which Major Redmond served was there; there were staff officers of the Irish and Ulster Divisions, staff officers of the French army, three officers of the United States army, and the Mother Superior of the convent and her nuns. A guard of honor was formed of men of the Royal Irish Regiment, men from Major Redmond's Battalion, and the Inniskillings. Catholics and Protestants were the dead man's guard of honor; the men of the South and West on one side of the grave; the men of Ulster on the other, comrades in arms, the symbol of Major Redmond's ideal.

But closer still to the grave were the men who had come from Ireland to offer a tribute to the dead hero: a delegation from the Redmond Memorial Committee, representing men and women of all political parties and of both the Catholic and Protestant religions, united to pay honor to their departed countryman. The delegates were the Mayor of Wexford, Mr. Nicholas Byrne; the High Sheriff of Dublin, Mr. Myles Keogh, and Dr. James S. Ashe.

The silence of the garden was broken only by the rustling of the dry leaves on the trees and the far-off, dull thud of the heavy guns on the Ypres salient, as Dr. Ashe laid on the grave a wreath of Irish autumn leaves and berries, and then the High Sheriff of Dublin laid beside the wreath a bunch of Irish heather bound up with ivy leaves, that had been picked by Mrs. Redmond in the garden in Wexford that the dead man had loved so well.

But more touching than these simple tributes was the ceremony that followed, when a sod of shamrocks, with the soil of Ireland thickly clustered round the roots, which had been brought from Vinegar Hill, was planted on the grave, and the soil of Ireland and of Belgium became mingled together in one. It was, so to speak, a sacrament of union; eloquent of the cause for which Irishmen are daily pouring out their blood on the fields of Flanders.

From the shamrock Dr. Ashe took the theme of his address. The mission of Major Redmond was, he said, to bring together Irishmen of all parties. He likened the shamrock leaf, as St. Patrick had done so many centuries before, to a typification of unity. And so it was planted on the dead man's grave as foretelling the unification of three contending parties in Ireland. Then he went on to speak, addressing himself to the soldiers of the guard of honor who stood round, of the wonderful cooperation of the North and South Irish troops who had stood, had fought and bled and died side by side in this the greatest of all wars, for a common principle of justice and righteousness. From their union, their forgetfulness of self-interests in a great cause, he saw the coming of the day that should bring justice and happiness as well as peace to their own country.

He finished speaking, and silently the delegates left; the military officers left, the guard of honor and the few spectators were gone, and only the Mother Superior and her nuns remained. As they still stood by that grave in the Belgian garden, in the distance the big guns roared and boomed. For the life-work of Major Redmond is finished, and his name has gone down in imperishable honor; but the cause and the Faith for which he lived and for which he died still go on. And when the last gun has been fired, and the last shell has crashed its way to the earth; when the red and bloody night of war has passed, and the day-star of peace returns, the shamrocks from Vinegar Hill will yet be green on that grave in Belgium, and it may be that their prophecy is fulfilled.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should be limited to six hundred words.

"Masses, Not Flowers"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Some time ago, I think it was in April, 1912, a little article under the above heading appeared in the Dublin Leader. It was signed "By the Author of 'Spiritual Sunbeams.'" That article was copied into many papers and journals in England, Scotland, Ireland, America, North and South, Australia, Africa and Canada. It was translated and published in French, Spanish and Italian, and a priest told the writer he had seen it in a Polish paper. I mention these facts now to show that the subject and the manner in which it was treated appealed to many hearts and were approved by many minds all the world over.

I was recently reminded of it by a letter I had from a friend in America. He is a "man of affairs," connected with several associations. He told me he heard of an Irish Catholic dying in one of the hotels of the city in which he lived. The sick man had no near relatives or friends, but the wife of the proprietor, who was a Catholic, kept him out of kindness in the hotel at his own request, though at much inconvenience and at the risk of offending her regular guests. My correspondent visited him and got other Irishmen to do the same and in this way helped to comfort and console his last days.

When the end came they thought of expressing their friendliness and regard by placing some wreaths of flowers on his coffin; but my friend remembered "Masses, Not Flowers," which as head of a branch of the Knights of Columbus he had himself given to his Council as its motto or slogan for the year. He suggested that in this case, instead of wreaths they should get Mass-cards. Forty Mass-cards were donated and placed on the casket, each bearing the name of the donor with the number of Masses he had got offered and the signature of the priest who had made himself responsible for saying them. Some of these cards were very pretty and were tied with ribbon of various tints, Irish colors being much in evidence. Though the deceased had no near relative or personal friends, many Irishmen and women accompanied his remains to the cemetery and said the rosary there. And many of those present said that for the future they would place Mass-cards instead of flowers on the coffins of their friends.

On reading that letter it occurred to me, as the month of the Holy Souls is at hand, once again to make an appeal for "Masses, Not Flowers" for our dead. Flowers on coffins look beautiful and are pleasing to the senses, but are they in keeping with the solemnity, the sacredness, the majesty of death? This is not a Catholic custom. It is believed to be pagan. The early Christians never decorated their dead with flowers. They placed the Cross of Christ on their saintly remains. I saw lately in the account of the obsequies of the Most Rev. Dr. Carr, Archbishop of Melbourne:

> The body was reverently placed in the hearse, which was plain, without plumes or ornament. Some beautiful wreaths had been sent in, but as they are not in accordance with Catholic custom they were not used at the funeral.

"We have loved them in life, let us not forget them in death"; but let our love be true, practical and effective. Let it be a love and a remembrance worthy of Christians and Catholics who believe in the immortality of the soul, the consoling doctrines of purgatory and the Communion of Saints.

Cathechism in the Grades

To the Editor of AMERICA:

There is an astounding assertion in the article, "Catechism in the Grades," by the Sister of Charity, College of St. Elizabeth, New Jersey, namely: "Another new method, and also perhaps of dubious value, concerns itself with graphic representations of eternal truths." A reading of Spirago's "Method of Christian Doctrine," edited by Archbishop Messmer, leads me to believe that graphic representations of eternal truths are neither a new method nor of dubious value. One can open the book almost at random to verify my statement. The chapters on "Object Form," p. 226; "The Blackboard," p. 316; "Wall Maps," p. 314, are so at variance with the statement in "Catechism in the Grades," that I strongly suspect that the writer of it must have had in mind not the method, but the abuse of the method.

On page 226, Spirago's "Methods" says, in reference to the "Object Form":

> Object-lessons are so much spoken of nowadays in educational writings and teachers' institutes, that there is danger of their becoming a mere fad. Yet the principle implied is as sound as any in pedagogy and as old as the human family (italics inserted). It is the very earliest and most natural, at the same time the most easy, form of child-teaching, that of presenting the object thus-far unknown to the immediate view of the child; that of making his mind see the thing by the help of his bodily sight, the most perfect organ of sense-perception. Such a powerful and easy means may not be neglected in imparting Christian instruction. Hence we find that the Church has made use of this form of instructing the faithful from most ancient times (italics inserted). In fact, before the art of printing had been invented, the Church taught her faithful children by means of all kinds of external, objective representations, placing before their very eyes the principal facts, doctrines and rules of the Christian religion. The catechist, therefore, should look for every opportunity where this form of instruction can be appropriately used. It is true, as Schuech remarks, there are comparatively few objects in Christian doctrine which can be shown in themselves, in their own proper being, to the children. But in very many cases it can be done immediately through sufficient representation, pictorial and rhetorical (vivid description) by so-called word-painting, or by striking comparisons from nature.

The constant reading of this most valuable book has helped me to present Christian doctrine to the little ones and has taught me to require the memorizing of the catechism and the proper and timely use of a series of pictures and illustrations.

Novena for the National Welfare

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have read about the "Novena of Peace," to commence November 30 and end December 8, in honor of the national patroness, Our Lady of the Immaculate Conception. As the feast falls on Saturday the exercises might conclude Sunday, December 9, making ten days' exercises in all. A feature of the exercises each evening might be the panegyric of a saint who has proved the savior and glory of his country, like Washington, "great in war, great in peace, great in the hearts of their country." Among those who might thus be honored are Leo the Great, Joan of Arc, Louis IX, St. Boniface, St. Thomas and many others dear to Catholic hearts.

While we wish for victory for our arms, we should wish still more that the dignity and honor of our country be upheld and that God be glorified. As a title I would suggest, "Novena for the National Welfare," in order that our military officials may feel that we are not criticizing them but praying for their best interests. We shall pray for victory and early peace and for the future honor and glory of America, that the title, "land of the free and home of the brave" may be no misnomer.

I trust every church in the land may join in one great novena of devotion to Our Lady, and that our prayers "may penetrate the clouds" and bring lasting and honorable peace to our country.

France's Catholicism

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. Sharon seems to think that the sum of Bishop Chapon's statements as to the Catholicism of France is that "the French are better Socialists than Catholics." Not into any such airy generality may the complicated and paradoxical network of French politics be comfortably packed! We have to deal with two ideas which are seemingly contradictory and mutually exclusive, of a nation which is genuinely Catholic and a government which is genuinely anti-Catholic. The latter idea is evidently true; the former seems to me to be equally true; the difficulty is how to reconcile them. Bishop Chapon suggested at least one line of thought in the way of reconciliation. Mr. Sharon does that scant justice in his summary. I do not insist that Bishop Chapon's explanation is complete, but I think that we American Catholics should at least be able to appreciate its significance and force. We have seen in this country some strange groupings of people in politics at times, yet we do not draw from them the stern conclusions that we apply to France in this matter. I admit that it is not an easy matter fully to explain the contrast between the people of France and the Government of France in the last forty years. But I venture to say that France has never been other than fundamentally Catholic and, please God, never will be, though she may have seemed to be superficially pagan. Such at least, we may confidently assert is the opinion of Pope Benedict XV.

In the Consistory held on December 4, 1915, the Pope appointed three new Cardinals, all from France. This appointment gave France eight Cardinals, a number larger than France had had in the college for several centuries, and on the occasion of their creation the Holy Father publicly pronounced the following words:

> It is not merely to Brittany, not merely to Normandy, nor only to the see of St. Irenæus that We wished to attest our good-will. It is assuredly a pleasure to Us that the Roman purple is about to cover the insignia of the Archbishop of Rennes on the eve of his double jubilee to reward fifty years of service in the priesthood, and twenty-five in the episcopate, so, too, it rejoices Our soul to be able to raise to the dignity of the Cardinalate the distinguished prelate who in the three dioceses of Verdun, Bourges and Rouen has shown himself to be a pastor after God's own heart. And at this moment Our thought takes flight to the dear Grotto of Lourdes where in days never to be forgotten it was given to Us to cement with him the bonds of old friendship; not less are We rejoiced to be able to base upon the merit acquired by him at Grenoble Our most willing grant of the sacred purple to the new Archbishop of Lyons. But why conceal the fact that in honoring the shepherds we have wished also to honor the flock? Why should We not say that in manifesting our good-will to three sons of France We have wished to say again that there burns ever in Our heart a strong flame of love for the country of Clovis, of Louis and of Joan of Arc? Let then the hymn of gratitude which Catholic France raises to the Lord for the happy lot that has befallen it echo round Our throne. We rejoice to have strengthened its attachment to the Holy See in the confidence that We shall see fulfilled the prayer, but lately made by us: "Utinam renoventur gesta Dei per Francos!"

Shall we Catholics in America be more "Catholic" than the Pope where France is concerned? Shall we on the ground of our Catholicism desire that the France which is so dear to his heart, which he has been delighted to honor most signally in her time of sternest trial, shall be destroyed for sins which he lays not to her soul? "Anti-clericalism" is a curious phenomenon. It is found only in Catholic countries where, it seems, the same schools turn out both anti-clericals and saints. Possibly anti-clericalism is, in its essence, mainly a perverted faith. Doubtless many things might be enumerated among the factors that cause it.

However that may be, I may fairly ask whether there is today in the world a nation which exhibits a more heroic devotion to the Holy See and a more ardent missionary spirit than does the French people. And if these be not the marks of a "Catholic country" by what marks shall we know one?

More Chaplains

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Under the above heading you published an editorial in your issue of October 27, pointing out the need which Catholic soldiers have of Catholic army chaplains. You say:

> Yet it must be confessed that the nations of Europe, which have shown such marvelous efficiency in other details of military preparation, have broken down rather lamentably in this matter of according their Catholic soldiers on the battlefield the ministrations of priests. The following excerpt from a letter written by an Irish chaplain with the forces in France to the Irish Catholic emphasizes the disastrous consequences of such a short-sighted policy.

Then follows a piteous account of the absence of a Catholic chaplain in the field and on a hospital ship. You then add: "To the credit of the Government of the United States be it said that there has been no disposition on its part to deny its Catholic soldiers and sailors the consolation of religion."

I fear very much that many of your readers concluded from your editorial (1) that the British army refuses to supply an adequate number of posts for Catholic chaplains; and (2) that this is the result of a disposition on its part to deny its Catholic soldiers and sailors the consolations of religion. I presume that you did not intend to convey this impression, for you are doubtless aware that it would be quite at variance with the facts. Since June, 1915, when the British establishment for Catholic chaplains was increased from one to three per division, the trouble has been, not to find posts for Catholic chaplains, but to find a sufficient number of Catholic chaplains to fill the posts. Since the establishment for Catholic chaplains was increased from three to four per division in the summer of 1916, the number of vacant posts clamoring for priests who do not arrive has been considerable, sometimes as many as seventy. Lt.-Col. Father Rawlinson, O.S.B., D.S.O., Assistant Principal Chaplain in the Field, B. E. F., France, has in letters to the press clearly pointed out that the responsibility for the lack of chaplains lies, not with the military authorities who have provided the posts for them, but with the ecclesiastical authorities who have not supplied a sufficient number of priests for the posts.

In an army division of the British or Canadian forces, numbering about 18,500 of all ranks, there are at least seventeen chaplains, of whom at least four are Catholics. Of the Catholic chaplains, three hold the rank of captain, the fourth is usually a major. Both in the British and in the Canadian forces there is a Catholic chaplain for at least every 1,000 Catholic soldiers, and no Catholic chaplain can properly attend to more. Were there the same proportion of commissioned chaplains in the American armies, the Knights of Columbus would not have to supply K. of C. chaplains, who, be they twice as zealous as the army chaplains, cannot minister to the soldiers as satisfactorily as commissioned chaplains. The United States, with one chaplain for every 3,600 soldiers, is going to war with one branch of its great army hopelessly inadequate. Great Britain corrected that mistake two years and a half ago. America is surely too shrewd to lag behind very long.

Chaplains for English and Irish Divisions

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have been a reader of AMERICA since its first issue, and although I do not think I have ever missed a copy, I consider the article "Religion on a Silver Platter" by Charles Dawson one of the most timely that has ever appeared. Certainly it expresses the thought of many of us, namely, that if the Allies are in the serious need of priests that news reports indicate, a large number of the younger clergy could readily be spared for service at the front.

Many of us are anxious to serve. We are not less generous than our friends, many of whom hastened to the front to serve as physicians, construction-workers, ambulance drivers, etc. We wait for the call only from the proper authorities. Every one understands that a priest cannot leave his appointed place merely because he thinks he can be of greater service elsewhere. I am convinced that once such a call comes, and the assurance is given that our priests will be received in English regiments, the response will be generous and hearty.

The chaplaincies in our own army are for the few. There is a long waiting list, which will be drawn upon only when the Chamberlain bill, increasing the number of chaplains, becomes a law. It will be considered at the next session of Congress, and may or may not be passed. All of those who have signified their willingness to serve were moved to do so by the sense of duty to their Church and their country, and many would no doubt be equally satisfied to serve in English or Irish regiments.

I have in mind two young priests who seriously discussed offering their services to Cardinal Logue, when that great prelate's letter, emphasizing the need of priests at the front, appeared in the Catholic press. But since the question of passports, episcopal approval, and acceptance by other authorities enters into the matter, they thought it better to wait until some authoritative call for volunteers was issued.

There are a number of priests of forty years and over who would make excellent chaplains, but unless the Chamberlain bill changes the regulation age they cannot qualify for our own army. Some of these would undoubtedly offer their services for regiments now at the front. John Ayscough's memoirs of his own service with fighting regiments, so delightfully related in "French Windows," is sufficient evidence of the worth of the right kind of a chaplain even if he is over forty years of age.

Your own editorial in a very recent number voiced the need of chaplains in the United States National Army and incidentally brought out the distress of Catholic soldiers now at the front but deprived of the ministrations of their religion. Mr. Dawson's article is a good-natured and kindly demonstration of the fact that many of us could well leave what we are doing and hasten to the thousands who must face their Master without the grace of the Sacraments. Perhaps through your columns a way might be pointed out how volunteers from the ranks of the clergy might express their readiness to serve with English or Irish regiments.

The Life of Father McKenna

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I feel constrained to make a protest against some remarks of T. F. M. in his review of my life of the late Father Charles H. McKenna, O.P., which appeared in AMERICA for November 10, page 114. Nothing could have been farther from my mind than to insinuate that the missions given by the Dominican Fathers in the East from 1866 to 1870 "were an innovation." And I totally fail to see how T. F. M. could even dream that "an incautious reader" might draw such a conclusion from anything contained in my book. The splendid work of Fathers Hecker, Baker, Damen, Weninger and the other good missionaries mentioned by T. F. M. I know perfectly well. My narrative reflects upon it in no way. Their work was not mentioned for the simple reason that my subject did not call for it.

I might plead guilty of giving Newark's third bishop the name of Wiggers, instead of Wigger, and of writing Baxter street for Bleecker street, if my MS. and the proof-sheets did not reveal the fact that the typesetter made the errors and then failed to correct them, although they were marked for correction. I would, however, that these had been the only such errors to occur. Indeed, I had marked these and other typographical errors for correction in the second edition before reading T. F. M's review. But T. F. M. would lead the "incautious reader" to believe that Father McKenna never even gave a mission for Mgr. Burke.

That such typographical errors will creep into a large work is evident from T. F. M's brief review, in which we read: "It was Father McKenna, who, in 1896, secured the dispensation from the restrictions of the Clementine Constitution that has since permitted the establishment of the Holy Name and the Rosary confraternities in more than one parish of a diocese." It should be: "in more than one parish of a city."

The National Teachers' Agency

To the Editor of AMERICA:

My attention is called to your article, "For the Nation's Gaiety," in the issue of AMERICA for November 3. I note with real surprise that Lackawanna, N. Y., is included in the list of cities mentioned. I assure you that Lackawanna should never have been placed on such a list and there is no excuse for its being so listed. I wrote only one letter to this agency and I enclose you an exact copy of the letter. You will observe that there is no excuse for saying that we advertised for a person of any particular religious belief. I assure you also that I have never advertised for a person of any particular denomination. I have always been careful not to mention a teacher's religion, if I did know it when discussing her with a board or board-member. I have never asked a teacher-candidate her religious views. I have always tried to list the several candidates by their ability and teaching efficiency. My education and early training have been along broad lines and I have been taught from a boy not to discriminate against anyone that is upright, honorable, etc. I resent very much any statement or inference that I have even a remote desire to favor people of any religious sect.

I am writing the National Teachers' Agency that they must correct this serious error and notify you accordingly or prove that your statement is erroneous. I enclose you also copy of this letter. I hope that you will insert my statements in as prominent a place as that given to Lackawanna in the original article.

Lackawanna. A. H. MATHEWSON.

[AMERICA reprinted without change the circular sent out by the National Teachers' Agency. Lackawanna was listed as calling for a Protestant teacher.—ED. AMERICA.]

Air-Raids in London

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have a sister who is an Ursuline nun in a convent situated about ten miles east of London. She writes under date of September 30 concerning the recent air-raids:

> We have had a bad week of it at night and I suppose cannot expect much different till about Thursday next. Last night was the worst yet. We were all in bed, most people thinking a good night lay before them on account of the previous notice of "raid at six o'clock" and then "all clear" about seven; but I, for one, expected them later. At 9:10 we heard the enemy machines, very near evidently, and then the guns all around made a deafening noise and as those nearest us left off, the guns nearer the city took it up and we could hear furious firing till the sounds died away in the far west. After about twenty minutes the reverse process began and we could trace the progress of the raiders eastward and off the scene.
> Shortly afterward another one, or rather batch, came in from the southeast. We could hear violent firing at it along the south to southwest and then off again. That lasted till about 10:20, when all was quiet again; but we stayed up till 12:30, as only then did the notice "all clear" come. The children, however, lay down on their beds after refreshments of hot wine and biscuits about 10:30 and slept very quickly. No bombs were dropped anywhere near here and I only remember hearing one over toward the southeast. We are beginning to get accustomed to the actual raids, but so many disturbed nights close together are very trying. It is wonderful how little it seems to upset the children. They come to chapel and pray aloud with us in perfect darkness except for the lamps before the Tabernacle and Our Lady's statue, and as soon as it seems over they are chatting and laughing over their refreshments in the refectory without a sign of fear or nerves and go off to sleep again in a few minutes after getting back to bed.

Under date October 2 she writes:

> On Sunday night the firing of the big guns all around here was terrific and the raiders were not gone until after ten o'clock. I saw six at one time when they were between the moon and us. Last night [Monday] the first notice of them came at about seven o'clock and we put out all the lights and waited. The guns began at 7:50 and continued with not longer intervals than five minutes till 10:45, the "all-clear" signal not coming for another forty-five minutes. The noise of the raiders was worse than the previous night and some of the Sisters counted as many as twenty-five at one time.

It is harrowing to think of women and children being subjected to such constant anxiety.

The Changed Address

IN the moment you read that henceforth his address was "The American Expeditionary Forces" you lived through the agony of years. Many a mother read it through her tears, and the brief legend stirred love in many hearts. Yet in its deep longing, its tenderness, its yearning to shield him from all harm, that love would not hold him back. There was pride in it that one dear to us had crossed the sea in answer to his country's call to fight for liberty. Wreathed with love, his name lives in hearts that can grieve but never forget. They are the hearts of mothers who bear their sorrows to the merciful Master; the hearts of children made sanctuaries by the Eucharistic Christ, whose every throb is a prayer that God "may bring him back," with peace secured through victory, speedy, righteous and stainless.

Immeasurable is the cruelty of the man who would add one degree of suffering to the burden of fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters and sweethearts, so brave in their sorrow, who remain at home to watch and work and pray. Hence to suppress false reports of reverses in the field, is a matter of deep concern to all men worthy the name, and no doubt, is engaging, as it should, the attention of the authorities at Washington. Unfortunately, there is reason to believe that what seems a conspiracy for the propagation of falsehood is at work. Last spring the utterly unfounded report of a great battle in which our navy suffered severe losses appeared almost at the same time in many American cities, and with it came grewsome tales of wounded men transported to the naval hospitals. More recently, under circumstances that point to a common source, statements that soldiers were committing suicide in the various camps were circulated, to be capped by the preposterous statement that the secretary to the President, discovered in treasonable acts, had been sentenced to death by a secret tribunal.

The harm done by the thoughtless repetition of these "rumors" may be very great. We may look for more and even sillier reports, before the war is brought to a successful conclusion. If bad news comes, and it may, let us not make it harder to bear by foolish exaggerations.

A Day of Thanksgiving

"IT has long been the honored custom of our people," writes President Wilson in his proclamation fixing Thursday, November 29, as Thanksgiving Day, "to turn in the fruitful autumn of the year in praise and thanksgiving to Almighty God for His many blessings and mercies to us as a nation." Every truly patriotic American will frame the wish as he reads these words, that this custom may long prevail and that the day may never come when his countrymen will forget to turn to the Guide and Ruler of the nations and thank Him for the wise and beneficent Providence with which he sways our destinies. When Presidents begin to neglect this solemn and official act of faith, and we no longer lift our hands to God, who has so visibly and almost miraculously watched over the birth and the growth of our great republic, the days of our true greatness will have passed away and America will be as the empires which forgot God and whom God, forgetting in His turn, abandoned to their own weaknesses and follies, to corruption, decrepitude and decay.

Never more than in the present hour did our country need to turn to God. His mercies have been great, it is true, but to try the mettle of which we are made and to school us to a sterner discipline, He has summoned us to a great sacrifice. A great test fronts the nation and its sons. If they feel no gratitude for the blessings God has showered upon them, they will not win the graces which they need in the struggle now. God alone can give these favors. He alone can guide our President and the men who with him decide the destinies of the country, to wise, humane, and patriotic measures. It is only His to give our people unity of mind and heart in the gigantic task to which they are all summoned. From Him, too, will come the victory that must crown our arms and lead us to a just and lasting peace.

To forget God now is national suicide for the American people. War is terrible, but sometimes it is a necessity. And like necessity it is a stern teacher. We have been summoned without fault on our part to breast its crimson tide. The call comes like a summons from God to awaken us from our selfishness and worldliness. The nation had been treading dangerously near the edge of the precipice of greed, luxury, and coarse pleasure, down which it would soon have been hurled. With all its horrors the call to war is a summons to America to regain her nobler self, to turn to God amidst the purifying fires of trial and self-sacrifice and bend in submission to His holy will. By doing so nations become truly prosperous and great. The old Roman poet was not mistaken when he said of his sires that it was because they were obedient to the gods that they won the empire of the world. While we shall thank God for His blessings, to our Te Deums of praise we shall add, in the beautiful words of the President of the United States, the prayer that by God's grace "our minds may be directed and our hands strengthened, and that in His good time. liberty and security and peace and the comradeship of a common justice may be vouchsafed all the nations of the earth."

Idols of Clay

THE cult of the bogus genius, according to H. L. Mencken, in the New York Evening Mail, has bewitched the American people. To prove his assertion, he enumerates the idols and the "rages" of the women's clubs since the time of the Spanish-American war. The women's clubs unfortunately have not been the only ones to worship at the shrine of false and hollow deities. In every rank of society the worshipers have been found. The writer quoted enumerates the idols to which the incense of thousands has been offered. In 1899 the idol was D'Annunzio, it was Strindberg in 1903, in 1913 it was Rabindranath Tagore. In 1917 the fad, according to him, is the Gary plan, in 1914 it was the Montessori system. In 1902, and would to God it were confined to that year, the criminal folly of the hour was race-suicide, that of 1915 was the Russian ballet. For some time Maeterlinck was the favorite upon the pedestal. At another time Verhaeren, H. G. Wells, Pastor Wagner, Bergson and Brieux occupied the niche of fame. Thus it goes on and one of the most reasonable and best-hearted people in the world sacrifices its good sense and its fine instincts in this foolish worship.

The ease with which the American people can thus be hoodwinked is an unhealthy sign. There is a tragic element in it which is alarming. It is an index of the lack of deep and solid principles. If our men and women, with all the keenness of their usually bright minds, and the goodness of their hearts, can thus be deceived by every pretentious pundit and self-advertising faker who in reality is laughing at their amazing credulity, it is because they have no stable and substantial principles either in religion, literature or art. They are carried about by every wind of doctrine. Provided that it carries along with it some beguiling message to lull their senses to a false security or tickle their restless fancy, they are quite willing to be deceived. Were they to stop for a minute and test these passing fads by some simple standard of art or faith they would soon find out how absurd they are, in some cases how criminal. Then their authors and originators would be discarded to the limbo of oblivion which they so thoroughly deserve. A sensualist like D'Annunzio, a wearisome pedant like Strindberg and a pseudo-mystic like Tagore would find but a handful of idle followers. There are countless idols of clay set up at the present moment in the niches of honor to receive the worship of the foolish throng. The hand of a fearless iconoclast is needed to destroy them pitilessly and to raise up in their stead nobler figures and ideals. If these could be brought home to the American people, they would only too gladly hold them in honor and esteem.

A Novena for the National Welfare

FOR Catholics duty to country is next after duty to God. This has been impressed upon them by the solemn teachings of their Church, for while the Church declares without fear and without compromise that her children must render to God the things that are God's, she makes them realize that they must also render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's. She upholds all legitimate authority and commands her children under the sternest penalties to obey it. Her children are untrue to her when they are untrue to their fundamental duties as citizens.

The nation's welfare must therefore be dear to the heart of the true citizen. He must do all in his power to promote it. He should do so in peace, far more so in the dangers and perils of war. Then it is that his true spirit is shown and that the genuineness of his patriotism is tested and proved. Forgetting all selfish considerations his whole heart and soul should be given up to the one thought, the country's good. To that good everything should be sacrificed.

Not all can sacrifice their wealth or their lives. All, however, can use a weapon more powerful than the rifle or the sword, prayer. It is the prayer of the innocent children that brings down victory upon the father's arms, the supplication of the mother and the wife that proves the best shield for the soldier. It is the prayers of the head of a nation, prostrate before the throne of God, that bends His heart to give victory and peace. It is not therefore astonishing that the President of the United States a few days ago fixed a day of prayer for the victory of the American arms and the return of peace to a suffering world.

In the same spirit Catholics throughout the country will unite in a novena for the national welfare, to close on December 8, the Feast of the Immaculate Mother of God, and Queen of Peace, and will entrust to the Ruler of the world through her pure hands the welfare of the nation. Through Mary Immaculate they will pray to the Lord and Master of life and death, that He may protect our people. From every Catholic Church in the country a fervent prayer will be addressed to Him that the drums and the tramplings of war may soon be silenced, that victory may soon grace our battle flags, and that furled in honor, without a single stain of injustice or cruelty to mar their beauty they may be carried triumphantly home. Today in the midst of the sorrows and the tragedies afflicting our own beloved land and bleeding Europe our novena can have but that one purpose, a speedy victory and peace. Our country's welfare, her destinies, her fate, her honor, we shall entrust into Our Lady's hands. The Immaculate Mother of God is Queen and Patroness of the United States. She will listen to our prayers, and present them to her Son. They will not remain unanswered.

More Pestiferous Prejudice

THERE are those who tell us, not without some degree of factitious pride, that in this country every man has a fair chance to make the best of himself. Birth, race and creed, be they what they may, never constitute an obstacle to progress.

Three times recently America has shown this to be the purest kind of "piffle," good enough for a Fourth of July oration or an after-dinner speech on Thanksgiving Day, but altogether out of joint with the facts. A fourth instance in point is set out in the following letters which will perhaps convince a doubting Thomas or two that in some parts of this broad land a Catholic is less esteemed than a dead Dowieite or a lame Mohammedan.

SOUTHERN TEACHERS' AGENCY
W. H. Jones, Manager
COLUMBIA, S. C., Oct. 26, 1917.

Mr. John P. Judge, Jr., 3301 Elgin Avenue, Baltimore, Md.

MY DEAR MR. JUDGE: I regret exceedingly that I did not inform you of numerous places. This was certainly not due to any want of confidence in your ability, but simply to the fact that you are a member of the Catholic Church. This prohibits my nominating you for ninety-nine out of one hundred places received by our Agency. Practically without exception, our patrons require Protestants. Now be assured that there is absolutely no prejudice on my part. Personally I would as soon employ a Catholic as a member of any other church. This does not alter the fact, however, that throughout the whole South there is a prejudice which renders it practically impossible to place Catholics in public school systems.

I shall be very glad indeed to return your membership fee if you wish me to do so, or I shall be glad to continue to try to place you. I am sending you some vacancies herewith.

Yours sincerely,

W. H. JONES.

The aggrieved Catholic replied in these words:

BALTIMORE, MD., 3301 Elgin Ave.,
October 29, 1917.

Mr. W. H. Jones, Columbia, S. C.

MY DEAR MR. JONES: I acknowledge and thank you for your very kind letter in reference to my standing with your agency.

There is only one comment that can be made regarding your statement that practically "ninety-nine cases out of a hundred" teaching positions in the public schools of the South are closed to any American of the Catholic Faith.

It is a sad and pathetic reflection on the narrow and bigoted state of mind of those so-called educators at the head of the Southern school systems that at this late date they still persist in discriminating because of "race, religion or previous condition of servitude."

It is sadder still when you reflect that at this very moment one-third of the army that is fighting the battle for the freedom and liberty of the world is of the Catholic Faith.

I shall take the liberty of giving some publicity to this startlingly un-American prejudice.

Very truly yours,

JOHN P. JUDGE, JR.

Mormons and Holy Rollers, Shakers and Quakers and all sorts and conditions of men, save only Catholics, are fit for schools in the Southland—alas, for the sweet Southland!—in unexplored Jersey, and in sundry towns and villages in other places.

It is to be hoped that Thanksgiving orators have still time to correct their forthcoming orations and that some day Catholics will attend the schools of Hillel and Shammai and learn to take care of themselves.

"Per Crucem ad Lucem"

IN a moving address Cardinal Mercier made to the people of Brussels on July 21, 1916, the eighty-fifth anniversary of Belgium's independence, that heroic prelate promised his flock:

> Today, in fourteen years' time, our restored cathedrals and our rebuilt churches will be thrown widely open; the crowds will surge in; our King Albert, standing on his throne, will bow his unconquered head before the King of Kings; the Queen and the Royal Princes will surround him: we shall hear again the joyous peals of our bells, and throughout the whole country, under the vaulted arches of our churches, Belgians, hand in hand, will renew their vows to their God, their Sovereign and their liberty, while the Bishops and priests, interpreters of the soul of the nation, will intone a triumphant Te Deum in a common transport of joyous thanksgiving.

Before the light of victory breaks, however, as the Cardinal reminded his hearers, the cross of sacrifice and suffering must be nobly borne. He then called his flock's attention to the fact that the just war they are waging, in spite of its horror, is full of austere beauty, for the conflict has brought out the disinterested enthusiasm of a whole people which is prepared to give its most precious possession, even life itself, for the defense and vindication of things which cannot be weighed, which cannot be calculated, but which can never be swallowed up: "justice, honor, peace, liberty," and thus the conflict has purified the Belgians, separated their higher nature from the dross, and lifted them to something nobler and better than themselves.

As the American people have now entered upon a war which threatens to be so long and costly that, before a victorious peace comes at last, it may demand from every man and woman in the country sacrifices similar to those the valiant Belgians have made, let us hope that our leaders and rulers may find in us the same heroic virtues that Cardinal Mercier and King Albert have found in their people. If the privations and sufferings inseparable from war will but purify our national soul, fill us with the fear of God and teach us to value justice, liberty and honor more than any worldly possession, this war will prove to be for our country a heavenly blessing for which we too can sing a Te Deum of thanksgiving when we welcome home our victorious troops.

Literature

NEW FRANCE

THERE are certain characters among men whom we either love or hate; they may be good, they may be bad, they are not indifferent; we cannot ignore them. They do not pass us by, they arouse emotions in us. They may pain their friends, they do not lose them; their enemies may not understand them, they do not cease to be troubled by them. Nations are like that. France has given many surprises to those who do not understand her, and many painful moments to those whose trust in her has failed a little. To those who confound faith with political action, she has seemed faithless; to those who thought her selfish, her sacrifices have seemed a miracle; to those who thought her decadent, her warrior virtues seem something new; for those who thought her Socialistic, her patriotism has been a revelation. We know better now. Since the war has brought home to us the hard plight of the missions, we know she could not have been wholly atheistic who had in the missions three-fourths of all the missionaries, and who supported them by sacrifice and generosity; she could not altogether have left the ways of the Spirit, who could so valiantly practise the Christian virtues of courage, patriotism, resignation and hope. Certain men once discovered a new land and called it New France; yet it was always there before. The true, essential France was always there; we could not see it, our judgment was superficial. It is said of the people of a certain nation that whatever their wanderings and faults, they "always keep the faith". We must be prepared to admit as much for France; she has kept the faith. What she did lose for a time, and lose at a crucial time, were leaders, her intellectual élite. In France more perhaps than anywhere else, the thinkers have power to rule her politics, and after 1870, symbolized by the seizure of Alsace-Lorraine, her thinkers, her real men, sank under the humiliation and disgrace into a sort of fatalistic resignation in their will, and in their intellect surrendered like Renan, to the rationalistic vagaries and false mysticism of Germany. And in politics, a clique of men mostly of an alien race, moving the puppets of a few mediocre vote-getters, ruled, and almost ruined France. France sees it must not happen again.

But as usual, time and truth had their revenge. The real élite, men like Brunetière and Bourget, came over early, but for ten years before the war, it is no exaggeration to say that around writers like Péguy and Vallery-Radot a revolution was preparing only to merge into the great war. It all seems to have begun at the Normal School of Ste. Barbe, where by the way St. Ignatius once sat on the benches. To the atheists and free-thinkers a few young men paid back their own coin. They did question everything, even their own masters! Grace accomplished the rest, and one after another many brilliant young men rediscovered the Christian inheritance of Frenchmen. In all the prose and poetry of men like Péguy, Vallery-Radot, Psichari, Lamouroux, Lotte, Jammes and Claudel there seems a well-defined plan; pitiless criticism of what was, and rapt enthusiasm for what was to be in thought, art and action.

Though Claudel has now the center of the stage, in those days Péguy was the acknowledged leader. In "Cahiers de la Quinzaine," which he edited, he sent out regularly the most austere and relentless messages of loyalty and fairness of patriotism and Christian hope, while Vallery-Radot in "Cahiers de l'amitié de la France," in more restrained language waged the "intellectual offensive" against laicism, liberalism and Modernism, and pointed the way for the future paths of Christian art; Joseph Lotte edited a magazine for university-students in the same sense; Lamouroux one also for the teachers in France's schools; Renan's grandson, Ernest Psichari, came out of the Sahara with new-found faith and a book of the highest art, "Le Voyage du Centurion," the account of his own conversion, and Claudel preached in drama and poem of sonorous and purest French the doctrines of the Incarnation and the teaching office of the Church.

From a study of this artistic and religious movement as we see it in Vallery-Radot, Psichari and the latest poems of Claudel, it is clear that their first achievement was the triumphant criticism of their own teachers Renan, Comte and Taine. In them they first saw clearly the three great separations, that the Renaissance introduced into Europe: art separated from belief, philosophy from theology, poetry from law. With Péguy, Vallery-Radot in his collection, "Le Réveil de l'esprit," waged unceasing warfare against the lies of politics, the spirit of modern science in human morals and history, where it does not belong, the laboratory system in human life, where it ignores the main thing, the soul. Modernism, he sees, lost the Incarnation and with it the idea of the Church and its sacramental system of grace was divorced from life. "Come back!" he cries, "let us have all of Christianity, no concessions, but Catholicism as it is, pure and high, with all its glory of sacrifice and faith." For him the Incarnation is not the mystical word of German Protestantism, but the fact of an intimate and real inter-penetration of the sensible and spiriitual: in Claudel's language, "The word is Christ which tells the Ineffable what It is," and in Psichari's, "The knowledge of the price we are worth and the dung that we are, two equal but contrary certitudes, meet their accord only in Jesus Christ." Hence, for Claudel, (in "Rome") the modern fact, Jesus Christ in our century, is Rome, the place where all roads meet; the world does not contain it for it contains the world, "St.-Pierre-du-Vatican, who keeps the keys, and the gate where all pass to the Beyond."

With this love for the Church, it is not surprising to find their love of country just as strong. More than any others the French realize that religion and patriotism go together; they are both virtues, theologians tell us, against which it is possible to sin, in thought, word and action, as against any other. It was their experience, as it is ours, that those who once attacked religion are the first to be false to country. In a page of remarkable logic, Psichari, the soldier, accounts for his faith ("Centurion," p. 771), in which, by a close process, he works from his acceptance of military authority to that of all, and hence religious, authority. One without the other is false. Humble submission to the Church is their slogan to a generation thirsting for sacrifice and suffering. A patriotism that nobly refuses to place self before country is their offering to the republic. Says Claudel: "Here is our blood we have shed in place of tears for France. Do with it what Thou wilt."

So in art we find Vallery-Radot preaching, and Claudel practicing, the same doctrine. The latter has been called the "great lyric revelation of our time," yet we find his roots reaching down to the very well-springs of faith, that faith which the former tells us must henceforth be the source of art, for art is before all a homage to the creator, God. Christ, then, must come back into art, and then only we shall really have vision, far surpassing the dream of the unbeliever. Grace perfects, it does not supplant nature; it is knowledge, too, and it perfects both the faculty and the object of knowing; it is the true nature, for it is nature as its maker made it, "a prodigious work, a frieze, whereon are unrolled the glories of God, a cathedral stretching to its Lord the longing branches of its piers and vaults." And once again we end on the familiar note of sacrifice, for such an art, the new medievalism, must of necessity give up much that is modern, but falsely true to the age. Yet this art will not be "pious" and sentimental, but—Claudel is always the ideal realized—alive with burning actuality.

We must not, however, imagine these young men were mere dreamers; they were down in the market-place, they were acting. They were mostly teachers, and we find Lamouroux and Lotte the centers of well-defined movements for a revival in the primary schools of France through the direct action of the new generation of Christian teachers on their pupils. As to the result, we must wait. Almost all, Psichari, Péguy, Lotte, Lamouroux, have given their lives for their country, offering them in death for the triumph of the Church. It was but natural that they fell; they were "the best," and any place but the most dangerous was the less good. But can we believe that their ideas will die? Individuals perish; the truth does not, because the truth does not depend on the individual. "God needs not men, but sacrifice," said one of them, and were we too much attached to men maybe we would see less of truth. Maybe, too, the war was a "necessary sin," without it there could well have been defeat, only with it can there be victory. And history shows that some nations have been bad and oppressive in victory, but chastened in defeat; France has always been bad in defeat but heroic and Christian in victory. That is for her one of the moral issues of this war; may it not be for us an additional motive why we should help her win it? J. WILFRID PARSONS, S.J.

The False Decretals. By E. H. DAVENPORT, B.A., New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.50.

The false decretals have been a controversial storm-center for centuries. They have proved a serviceable and handy weapon when there was a question of slandering the Catholic Church and of holding her and her Pontiffs up to scorn as the champions of forgery and fraud. Few subjects require such wide and painstaking reading and research, such powers of analysis, such minute acquaintance with a remote and confused period of history. Yet the false decretals have been time and again dealt with by writers who had none of these qualifications. Mr. Davenport, however, is not of these, for he has many of the requirements of the genuine scholar and he is evidently anxious to find the truth. Though Catholics will not subscribe to all his statements, they will admit that he went to his task with the intention of solving honestly a historical problem.

Mr. Davenport discusses the environment of the false decretals, their influence, their nature as a forgery, and as a reform. In an appendix he briefly touches upon some incidental topics such as their date, which he places about 850, the relationship of the pseudo-Isidorian forgeries, proper, to other collections, all of which were published, the author maintains; not to heighten the power, prerogatives and pretensions of the Papacy, but for the protection and the advancement of the Frankish priesthood. These related forgeries are the "Collectio Hispana Augustodunensis," "The Capitualaries of Benedict the Deacon," "The Canons of Isaac of Langres," and the "Capitularies of Angilramnus of Metz." Mr. Davenport makes it clear that the false decretals of the Isidore to whom they are ascribed were not made for the benefit of the Papacy, that they were written without its connivance and even without its knowledge and that their part in the development of Papal supremacy was comparatively insignificant. He takes issue with Schaff, who calls the decretals "a High-Church fraud," that must be "traced to the Father of Lies." According to Mr. Davenport the collection was rather what we might call "legend" and was in keeping with the "hagiographic" methods of the age. They were the outcome of the political and ecclesiastical conditions in northern Gaul during the ninth century. The Frankish Church was losing, along with its power and prestige, the respect and the love of the people, and was becoming the tool of the State. The "pseudo-Isidore" wished to purify that Church. He never dreamt of advancing the claims of the Papacy. To help on the work he garnered from old collections of councils, letters of Popes, and decrees of synods, all that he thought fit to further his end and thus by advice and warning to lend authority to his words. He invented documents, rearranged them, eked out his authorities when there were lacunae to be filled in. "It was not a forgery," says Mr. Davenport, "but legend and in another sense, a legal fiction." Modern historians pretend at least to frown down upon such methods. In his concluding words the author writes that the false decretals, based upon law and custom, embodied a conception of Papal authority "which after the disintegration of the tenth century and the turmoils of the age of Hildebrand was to be held and practised by Innocent III." Some Catholic scholar should again take up the relations of the false decretals to the various Popes and refute the charges made against these for the use they are said to have made of documents which they knew to be spurious. Like many other accusations made against the Papacy this one also would soon disappear, no doubt, when carefully examined in the light of unprejudiced scholarship. J. C. R.

The Ways of War. By PROFESSOR T. M. KETTLE, Lieut. 9th Dublin Fusiliers. With a Memoir by His Wife, MARY S. KETTLE. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.75.

Into this very readable volume are gathered eleven papers bearing on the war, most of which were written while their brilliant young author was staying in Belgium during its invasion or while subsequently fighting in France. Professor Kettle was killed at Ginchy, September 9, 1916, as he led a charge, and "The Ways of War" is a sort of apologia pro vita sua. The book opens with an admirable memoir by his wife, who is the sister of the late Mr. Sheehy-Skeffington. In sketching her husband's career she indicates so delicately the charm of his personality and the striking character of his talents that her readers cannot but share the "Quis desiderio" emotion that "Tom" Kettle's countless friends felt when they realized that he was no more.

The Germans' perfidious and ruthless invasion of Belgium, which he witnessed while buying rifles in that country for the Irish Volunteers, was chiefly what made this ardent Nationalist decide that his duty lay in doing all he could to win Irish recruits for the "army of freedom." "The absentee Irishman today," he said, "is the man who stays at home." In his opinion the Easter week uprising spoiled the "dream of a free Ireland in a free Europe," and committed him so unreservedly to the attitude he had taken that he managed to have himself dispatched to the front without delay. Mrs. Kettle says of her husband:

> He died that Ireland might not be the specter at the peace conference of nations. His last thoughts were with Ireland, and in each letter of farewell written to friends from the battlefield he protests that he died in her holy cause. His soldier-servant, writing home to me, says that on the eve of the battle the officers were served with pieces of green cloth to be stitched on the back of their uniforms, indicating that they belonged to the Irish Brigade. Tom touched his lovingly, saying: "Boy, I am proud to die for it!" Ireland, Christianity, Europe—that was what he died for. "He carried his pack for Ireland and Europe. Now pack-carrying is over. He has held the line." Or as he says in his last poem to his little daughter, he died—
> "Not for flag nor King, nor Emperor,
> But for a dream born in a herdsman's shed
> And for the secret scripture of the poor."

Among the essays in "The Ways of War" the best are "The Gospel of the Devil" in which the author shows how Bismarck,

Nietzsche and Treitschke are chiefly responsible for leading Germany on its career of "domination, cruelty and planned barbarism"; "The Soldier-Priests of France," in which many of their deeds of piety and heroism are described, and "Under the Heel of the Hun," which gives vivid pen-pictures of what happened during the first days of Belgium's invasion. However violently the readers of this volume may disagree with Professor Kettle's politics and policy—and since the book was written the spirit of Easter week has clearly gained the ascendancy in Ireland—most of them will probably regard the early death of this brilliant and winning young Irishman as one of the saddest tragedies of the war. BOOKS AND AUTHORS

"Wishbone" Catholics who think nothing of using a planchette, attending spiritualistic séances, practising hypnotism, etc., will find a salutary corrective for this dangerous folly in the November 22 issue of the Catholic Mind. In "The Ethics of the Ouiga-Board" Father James F. Barrett tells what perils lie in the thoughtless use of that uncanny instrument, and in the following paper on "The Mischief of Spiritism," the recent decree of the Holy Office on the subject is explained, and to prove that not all spiritualistic manifestations are frauds, a French canon describes the unmistakably satanic origin of some of them.

Florence L. Barclay has dedicated her recent novel, "The White Ladies of Worcester" (Putnam, $1.50), to "faithful hearts the world over," presumably because it holds up the mirror of fidelity. The first faithful heart is that of an abbess, whose vocation, true to the Protestant tradition, is the usual story of a broken heart seeking solace for disappointment in love, and evaporates rather rapidly when, discovering that her lover has been faithful, she throws herself, in spite of the cloistered sanctity of the heart of a nun and her immaculate habit, into his strong arms. The second faithful heart is that of a blameless knight who surreptitiously enters a convent and claims the abbess as his bride, inducing her, after a decent struggle, to give up her vows, and, although she has a dispensation from them, to steal out of her monastery with all the secrecy of a thief. The third faithful heart is that of a bishop, who is himself in love with the abbess in a Platonic sort of way, is led by his affection to give up the prospect of preferment in order to be near her and watch over her; who preaches heresy on the comparative worth of the religious and married life and on the religious life in general, connives by every means in his power, not excluding the condonation of gross deception, to assist the abbess to throw off her fetters, and in the end marries her to her betrothed. The book is not without artistic and literary merit, and is lacking in the extreme sentimentality of "The Rosary," but it hardly commends itself to right-thinking people as a lesson of conspicuous fidelity, and its plot Catholics will of course find objectionable.——"Missing" (Dodd, Mead, $1.50), by Mrs. Humphrey Ward, is a conventional war-story, portraying the restrained wooing by an honorable man of the wife of an officer in the British army, who is reported missing. The husband is discovered towards the end of the novel and calls for his wife, and, after bidding her not to mourn him too long, very conveniently for all concerned proceeds to die. The book is not remarkable in any way, except that it has all that finished workmanship and keen appreciation of the beauty of nature, which has long been associated with the best work of the author.

The following poem, called "Easter Week," is dedicated to the memory of Joseph Mary Plunkett, and is one of the finer lyrics in Mr. Joyce Kilmer's recent volume, "Main Street and Other Poems" (Doran, $1.00).

"Romantic Ireland's dead and gone,
It's with O'Leary in the grave."
Then, Yeats, what gave that Easter dawn
A hue so radiantly brave?

There was a rain of blood that day,
Red rain in gay blue April weather.
It blessed the earth till it gave birth
To valor thick as blooms of heather.

Romantic Ireland never dies!
O'Leary lies in fertile ground,
And songs and spears throughout the years
Rise up where patriot graves are found.

Immortal patriots newly dead
And ye that bled in bygone years,
What banners rise before your eyes?
What is the tune that greets your ears?

The young Republic's banners smile
For many a mile where troops convene.
O'Connell street is loudly sweet
With strains of "Wearing of the Green."

The soil of Ireland throbs and glows
With life that knows the hour is here
To strike again like Irishmèn
For that which Irishmen hold dear.

Lord Edward leaves his resting place
And Sarsfield's face is glad and fierce,
See Emmet leap from troubled sleep
To grasp the hand of Padraic Pearse!

There is no rope can strangle song
And not for long Death takes his toll.
No prison bars can dim the stars
Nor quicklime eat the living soul.

Romantic Ireland is not old.
For years untold her youth will shine.
Her heart is fed on Heavenly bread.
The blood of martyrs is her wine.

EDUCATION

Recalling a Nursery Tale

WITHOUT undue tax on our memories we can recall the adventure of Simple Simon, as the old nursery tale recounts it. Simple Simon met a pieman as both were on their way to a fair. And Simon, with an especial liking for sweets and delicacies, asked for leave to taste. He had, it is presumed, whetted his appetite by much looking and sniffing. In the course of nature he wished to eat. Likewise in the course of nature, the pieman with thoughts on profit rather than on undue, profitless pleasing of patrons, desired to make sure that the prospective purchaser who stood before his tempting wares had the means of becoming an actual purchaser. When Simon was found without a penny, we can readily picture the supercilious stare with which the simpleton was greeted, the tradesman's elevation of eyebrow to indicate scorn and pity, and the climactic swinging away of the tray of goods to others who could satisfy the merchant's longing for gain.

In youth we often wondered at the simplicity of Simon; we pitied him because he did not seem to realize the basic nature of commercial transactions. We felt sorry for him, too, because he had to satisfy his appetite with longing only and iron the groaning creases from his stomach by a smart application of his hands. Merely this and nothing more was left to him, for, poor fellow, he had no penny.

The Parallel

THE story of our youth finds a partial parallel in the educational processes of our time. The parallel may not have been applicable to the education of Simon's time, whatever that was, but it certainly applies today. Educators of today, perhaps not those who lead, but at any rate those who often seek to lead, have assumed the role of pieman, and they are out in the prominent places displaying their wares on a tray. They are not exactly like the pieman of old; he was satisfied if he obtained his penny before you ate of his goods. The pieman of today takes his penny before he bakes his pies, again when he sells them, and yet again after you have eaten. The process of getting an appetite, a filler for that appetite, and the digesting of that filler, do not last so long as the process of payment.

Make a mental notation of the educational schemes that have been introduced into the schools during the past few years and observe what a business-like array of salable goods the educational pieman has to offer. I will go through a few of them: Kindergarten work, playground work, educational dancing, first aid, safety first, the shop-class-room, manual training, vocational education, the crafts, self-government, the Montessori system, the Gary plan. These are some of the more prominently displayed, though there are many, many others which have made the business of the salesman of education thrive.

The Public

THE public is Simple Simon. When I use that term I give myself and thousands of others a dignified name. The city editor of a daily paper would blue-pencil it and supplant it by "goat." Yes, the public is the goat, because it is paying for this experimentation before, during and after, often for years after. Simple Simon's predicament was as nothing compared to ours. He went without, and though he knew it not, he fared well. The temporary practice of self-denial solved his difficulty. Today, we who purchase so constantly of educational wares and pay for their very manufacture are being victimized on a grand scale, over a lengthy space of time. I do not mean to create the impression that the fads of modern education have no good in them. They possess good in some measure, and it is just that which makes them all the more dangerous. A Gargantuan, Falstaffian lie deceives no one; but the lie with a nice bit of truth in it ensnares us all if we do not watch carefully. By way of parallel, the fads which have been offered us have also a large element of truth. They are partly good, they may serve a purpose. The lie that deceives us is the explanation made by their fathers that they will solve the educational problems which we find so trying in our schools. The father of each fad makes the same plea for his child. Each of the fads in its place would be no fad; each of the fads given all the place is still a fad, and like all fads, will fade, fall and give rise to another crop. Through all this process Simple Simon has been paying and paying. Too late he awakens to the realization that his food is not at all nourishing, though in all conscience it may be filling enough.

In our boyhood and girlhood days we pitied Simple Simon because he had no penny and because he had to do without that which he wanted; in our mature days, when we can spare a half-hour for contemplation aside from the smooth track of the rushing, work-a-day world, we are bound to pity the Simple Simon of now, not because he has no penny, but because he has plenty of them and lavishes them on all the fads that are offered; not because he has to deny himself, but because he is stuffing himself with food that will do him no good.

The Love of Novelty

ONE of the most prominent notes of our present-day life is struck in the key of change. We grasp at anything new, merely because it is new. We allow the goods of another day to fall into decay, or become the possessions of others. We are always ready to take in their place something that gleams and shines to heaven with a new finish, in spite of the fact that the polish is slavered on veneer which soon cracks, curls, chips and crumbles. Streaked through all of present-day life you can see the same error. Newness is against goodness; fashion successfully curries favor. The auto is sold because it will bear the greatest strain in the shortest space of time. You can get ten years' work out of it in ten hours. The furniture which adorns our homes is not what it professes to be, and when examined proves to be shoddy. Its fashions change from season to season and it is built to last only that length of time. Mother does not hand down her clothes to her much-more-than-modern daughter. There are a thousand reasons why it would be impracticable; but one of the most important is that the dress of today is not made to last.

In much of our education it seems to be the same. Allowing for the changes of modern society which come about through legitimate means, fads in education are altogether too plentiful. We are essaying the role of Simple Simon with variations. We are paying too plentifully for what we get. Is there a remedy?

Simple Food

WHEN I was a little fellow I often wondered what Simple Simon did when he had finished the partially alleviatory massage of his stomach. I wonder now. The answer seems to me to be that if Simple Simon had the simplicity given of God, a mighty gift, to be rated only one step lower than angelic wisdom, he wandered home in due time and helped himself to bread and cheese! And as he devoured this real food, all thought of the delights he might have obtained from the pie of the pieman left his mind. We of today, too, need more of the bread and cheese of education. We have been treated to too many of the delicacies. They are costly, first because they are expensive, and next because they create a demand for a painkiller internally and a physician externally. Will we begin to appreciate that we need bread and cheese? Will we throw off the role of Simple Simon? Let us make the piemen put in a stock of bread and cheese. We are their market, and there never yet was tradesman who did not supply the demands of his customers.

SOCIOLOGY

The Supreme Moral Safeguard

THE Chamberlin Bill, which has passed the Senate and will be brought before the House at the commencement of the next session, provides for an increase in the number of chaplains to correspond with the larger number of troops in each regiment, according to the new plan of organization. In this connection it may be profitable to call attention to one element of the work of Catholic chaplains which is not generally appreciated at its true worth.

The Government of the United States is to be strongly supported in its energetic efforts to safeguard the morals of our soldiers. Honor to the men who have had the clear vision and brave resolve to plan and to take measures to accomplish a thing so necessary and creditable to our nation. Only those who are familiar with the inner history of past wars can fully realize what an honorable innovation the Government of the United States has introduced in the conduct of this one.

But if it be permitted to make a pertinent and fruitful observation in this regard, we venture to call the attention of those in control of this branch of the Government's activity to the supreme moral safeguard which they are able to afford to at least a very great part of our American soldiers. It is the safeguard of frequent Communion. The non-Catholic can scarcely conceive the reverence in which Catholics hold the Blessed Sacrament. Since, under the appearance of bread and wine, is present Christ Himself, the Saviour of mankind, this Blessed Sacrament has for the Catholic a sacredness inviolable and to the non-believer almost inconceivable. In order worthily to receive so sublime a Sacrament, the Catholic is required by loyalty, reverence, the solemn law of the Church and the very nature of the Sacrament to purify his conscience so that it may be free from mortal sin. This implies a sincere sorrow for past offenses and an honest resolution with the help of God's grace to avoid grievous sins in the future. Now, according to the teachings of the Catholic Church, any deliberate offense against the virtue of purity is a grievous sin when committed with full knowledge and deliberation. Therefore, a Catholic who approaches the Holy Table must be sincerely sorry and regretful for any offense against purity which he may have had the misfortune to commit, and must have a firm and practical resolve to avoid such sins in the future and to keep from occasions, persons and places which would probably lead him to the commission of evil. It is clear, then, that our Catholic soldiers who approach the altar must have beforehand just that disposition, that practical, solid, sincere resolve to keep clean and pure in body and mind which it is the wish and purpose of the Government to promote in the army.

Comparison of Aids to Purity

OF course there are other aids to purity which are being insisted on and provided for by the Government in the camps. Amusements, exercise, healthful games, anything that will keep the mind occupied, is a preventive of vice. But these are mere extrinsic aids. The most powerful of all means are those which affect and strengthen the will, and supreme among these, for Catholics, is the practice of frequent Confession and Communion. The experience of everyday life has shown for centuries that the most powerful of all means of preserving innocence among young men and young women is the practice of frequent Confession and Communion. This is a matter of everyday observation. Indeed, after some time it grows to assume the impressiveness of a modern miracle that so many young folk exposed to severe temptations and differing in no other way from many around them, preserve such entire innocence.

Their Safeguard Lies in Their Weekly Communion

FOR them it is a periodic occasion of a searching of conscience, sorrow for sin and a firm resolution not to sin again and to avoid occasions which would lead them to break the Commandments. Moreover, the influence of frequent Communion as an aid to purity does not confine itself to the individual alone. A man who goes frequently to Communion has the determination and the courage to resist evil, and such a one will not tolerate evil talk, so far as it is in his power to prevent it. The unconscious influence of example which his determined cleanness of mind and body spread around him is a powerful aid to the weak and a constant reminder to his comrades. Where a number of men of the regiment go often to Holy Communion it certainly follows that the morals are immensely influenced for the better. These men have received the Body of Christ only a few days before, and they are looking forward to receiving that Blessed Sacrament again in a few days. Their recollection is a silent, powerful influence, reminding them of self-control, safeguarding them from sudden temptations and making it a part of their life to avoid every thought which is vile and to resist with their whole strength any temptation which tends to make them unclean and unfit to receive the God of purity and holiness. Whether one believes or not in the presence of Christ in the Blessed Sacrament, the objective influence of Communion must remain undisputed. Any sensible person can see that the Blessed Sacrament is a great source of moral strength and protection for those who do believe that Christ is present in the Eucharist and that he who eats His Flesh and drinks His Blood unworthily eats and drinks damnation to himself and dishonor to the Most High.

Communion and Home Influences

AGAIN, an incidental effect of frequent Communion for the soldier, and one by no means to be overlooked, is that it puts him in touch once again with the most sacred influences of home. In the life of the camp he lacks the safeguards which family life, the influence of his parents and brothers and sisters, and the good example of all his friends, have hitherto set around him. But when he kneels before the altar, no matter where that altar may be, there come back to him the most sacred and moving memories and emotions, those of his First Communion, of the occasion when he went to the altar side by side with his mother, father, sisters and brothers, holy memories and emotions are all renewed by the sacred act of approaching the Holy Table. Surely there is gain in this.

If it were possible for the conscript to go home once a week and look into the pure eyes of his mother, tell her all he had done since he saw her last and feel that she knew intimately his every thought, word and action, it is obvious that this would make for clean living, no matter what the temptation. But Catholics of firm and true faith, who go each week to Christ and receive Him into their inmost hearts, looking in spirit into His pure and all-seeing eyes, enjoy an experience more salutary and more powerfully efficacious for cleanness of body and mind than even a visit to a mother.

The Effect of Confession

MOREOVER, when the young man kneels to confess his sins to God through His representative the priest, he searches his conscience, makes a sincere act of sorrow for his sins, and forms a practical and determined resolve to avoid sin and the occasions of sin. The moral efficacy of this determined resolution made under such solemn circumstances week after week can hardly be overestimated.

The officers in command of our army are not unaware of the force of these reflections. They are extremely anxious to have the Catholic chaplain's influence for their soldiers. They realize the efficacy of Confession and perhaps to some degree the influence of frequent Communion. But the full force of what we have been saying was perhaps never brought home to them, otherwise they would be still more eager that every Catholic soldier should have the benefit of this moral safeguard.

Moreover, this influence is the more efficacious because it works from within. Police regulations, healthful activities, entertainments, these things are all very well as far as they go, but at a certain point they break down, and it is not always possible in the rough necessities of war to keep the soldiers in good moral surroundings. When they go to France, what will they meet there? The statistics are not encouraging. We must strengthen our men from within so that they will be able to be good not only in favorable circumstances but even in the heat and flame of terrible temptation. This is best done by frequent Confession and Communion; their influence never fails. They supply the incentive, the firm, moral resolution which will carry the men through the very flame of temptation.

For these reasons it is most expedient to give our Catholic young men every opportunity for weekly Confession and Communion. There will have to be special provision made in many cases. While some of the regiments have Catholic chaplains, there are others, composed in large measure of Catholics, which will have very little chance of approaching the Sacraments frequently, unless special provision is made. Thus we have recently heard of one regiment, which is more than one-half Catholic, but the chaplain is a Baptist minister. While this regiment is in camp with a regiment having a Catholic chaplan, much may be done to promote weekly Communion, but when they are removed to a post where it is difficult to obtain the services of a priest, the men can hardly go to Communion frequently. The Government will do well, therefore, to make special provisions for this supreme moral safeguard to the Catholic soldier. They will find many of the men excellently disposed to this holy practice. Chaplains tell us that when the Blessed Sacrament is reserved from one Mass to the other, the tent where It is kept is thronged with soldiers, and crowds kneel outside in adoration of the Blessed Sacrament. Give them an opportunity for weekly Communion and then they may be trusted even in the severest temptations to keep their bodies clean and their minds pure, for they will be helped by the most powerful motive in the world to cleanliness and decency.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The Failure of Protestantism

THE war is bearing so hard on the nerves of men that many people are speaking their minds freely and in a most interesting way. The latest addition to this group is Charles Reynolds Brown, dean of the Yale School of Religion, who recently lectured to the students of Goucher College, Baltimore, on "Four Hundred Years of Protestantism." According to the Baltimore News he declared that Protestantism "had not fulfilled its promise because it was not brave enough to exalt and insist upon the imperialism of Christ's spirit." The News continues as follows:

> Whereas, the Catholic Church with its seven Sacraments, the lecturer said, touches life at every point, the Protestant Church had not been willing to make an honest effort to reach human needs. He complained bitterly of the sectarianism that divides the body of Protestantism and which makes of the Church not a strong cable about humanity, but has frayed it into many strands, each of which is not strong enough to sustain the whole. There is nowhere a great Protestant Church, he declared, equal to the great Catholic Church.
> The war, Dr. Brown maintained, is the greatest challenge to Protestantism since the days of Luther. But if the Church is to rally herself now, he argued, she needs most of all a great leader, a man of the temper of Lincoln with "malice toward none," whose broad and catholic temper could sweep together the antagonistic elements into a reunited Church.

But if all this be true why is Dr. Brown giving his life to the propagation of Protestantism, an utterly discredited cult in his eyes? Because he is a Protestant.

The Vicar of Christ and the Jews

THE petition of the American Jewish Committee addressed to the Vatican to secure its intervention amid "the increasing horror of the unspeakable cruelties and hardships visited upon their coreligionists in various belligerent lands," and the benevolent reply of the Holy Father are reproduced in the "American Jewish Year Book 5678" (September 17, 1917, to September 6, 1918). The publication of this correspondence, we are told, called forth universal comment of a favorable nature. As an instance, the remarkable words of "the notorious French anti-Semite," Edouard Drumont, editor of La Libre Parole, are quoted. Describing the reply of Rome as "cordial, charitable and consoling," he says:

> These citizens of the United States, who have given proof of such splendid solidarity on behalf of all the scattered members of their race, appear to me to be more inspired than all those monarchs, all those leaders of peoples, who are tainted with the general skepticism and who have denied the moral force of the Church. Those who govern have refused to listen to the representative of Christ on earth, the man who, without a kingdom and without an army, and, from the temporal point of view despoiled of everything, as he is, still remains a sovereign. No appeal has ever been made to this sovereign in all the peace congresses which have ended in the present catastrophe. . . . By a strange phenomenon, those who, in their belief and in their religion are furthest removed from Christian doctrine, now ask the help of this beneficent and world-wide influence.

Referring then to the words of the New York Jews, in which they recall "with admiration and gratitude" the benevolence which the Papacy had on numerous occasions shown them in the past, Drumont continues:

> They can, indeed, recall long persecutions, innumerable years full of intense anxiety, always threatened by perils just as agonizing. They cannot forget that during more than 1,200 years one man alone has constantly spoken in their behalf, has declared without cessation that their liberty of conscience must be respected, has intervened with kings in order to protect the persecuted, has given the example of tolerance by according to the Jews in his domains better treatment than was accorded to them anywhere else. This man, always equal in his goodness, this man who never dies, is the Vicar of Jesus Christ.

The reply of the Vatican is described in the Jewish Year Book as "a virtual encyclical against anti-Jewish prejudices."

"Some Little Bug Will Get You"

THE following clipping from Milestones adds a new emphasis to the warning constantly repeated in the burden of that popular song, "Some little bug will get you, if you don't look out":

> When we were boys we always held that cut finger under the pump and washed it out. But the Red Cross Magazine now tells us that such a proceeding was dangerous in the extreme and makes us wonder how we ever survived. The danger is that the water will carry germs deeper into the flesh where they can get a more tenacious hold upon you. It is even worse to touch a wound, for there are billions of germs on your hands waiting for just such a chance to jump at you. Peroxide is as dangerous as water, says this authority, for it carries the germs in, and is not strong enough to destroy them. The thing to do with a wound is to apply a sterilized bandage and let it bleed. The blood will carry out the germs, and if you don't bleed to death you will survive germless.

It is probably exceedingly "bromidic" to draw a comparison between the horror wherewith we are taught to avoid the germs of physical disease and the supreme complacency and toleration shown in the presence of the miasmic infection breathed out from countless books, papers, theaters, Sunday supplements and a thousand sources of moral corruption. Yet the point is always well taken and deserves repetition, until the lesson may possibly be brought home at length to those entrusted with the care of public morality.

Two Views of the War

"BETTER editorials than I or any other editor can write are being written by the young men who, for an ideal, are giving up their lives in France," says the editor of Every Week, quoting the letters of two boys who both sacrificed their lives for their country at the early age of nineteen. To "the France of tomorrow" the thoughts of Alfred Eugene Cazalis turned before he fell in his last brave charge:

> It is not for death I would prepare myself, but for life. For life eternal, no doubt, but for the more immediate matter of earthly life as well. When war is over and I go home, I must be a changed being. I shall have no right to be as I formerly was—or the lesson will all have been in vain. Through the war mankind must be reborn, and is it not our duty to be reborn first of all?

And to his kinswoman Jean Rival wrote the day before his death, asking her to console his mother:

> If time goes by and she hears nothing of me, let her live in hope; keep up her courage. Then, if you learn at last that I have fallen on the field of honor, let your heart speak those words that will bring solace. This morning I attended Mass and received Communion some meters back from the trenches. If I die, I shall die as a Christian and a Frenchman. . . . God guard me to the very end. But if my blood is needed for our triumph—Thy will be done, O Lord!

So on each side of this great conflict souls are drawn nearer to God in this fiery ordeal. But we must not overlook the equally undeniable fact that together with heroic virtue the most flagrant vice is often known to flourish in the trenches. While some profit by the lessons of the war, others return with manhood and innocence ruined. No efforts therefore which can be made to surround our young men with all the safeguards of religion in the camps and at the front should be considered needless or superfluous.

The War.—On November 20 Field Marshal Haig started a heavy attack against the Hindenburg line. His Third Army, under the command of General Sir Julian Byng, advancing on a thirty-three mile front between St. Quentin and the Scarpe River, penetrated the German defenses for a distance of more than five miles at the deepest point, reaching in the first period of the drive the village of Cantaing, less than three miles southwest of Cambrai, and attacking the third and last German line in at least one point along that front. The British attack, unheralded by artillery, but heavily supported by "tanks," took the enemy by surprise. The initial stage of the advance gave the British the towns of Masnières, Marcoing, Ribecourt, Graincourt, Flesquières, while their cavalry drew in toward the Bourlon Wood, west of Cambrai. On the British right Noyelles-sur-l'Escaut was reached, while northeast of Masnières the enemy's double line of trenches on the east bank of the Scheldt canal was captured. Gains were also made on the Monchy-Croisilles-Quéant line slightly northeast of Cambrai. At the apex of the wedge driven into the German positions, the village of Fontaine Notre Dame, two and three-quarter miles west of Cambrai on the road to Bapaume, was carried in a subsequent movement by the British, but the Germans retook it in a furious counter-attack. By November 23 there was a lull in the struggle, although fighting continued at some points, notably in the vicinity of Crèvecoeur, Moeuvres and Bourlon Wood. By November 24 the British had seized some of the elevations of the town and wood of Bourlon vital to the defense of Cambrai, and had gained important ground near Inchy and east of Quéant, but the enemy was still clinging to Fontaine Notre Dame to the eastward. In their advance, the British took more than 9,000 prisoners. In the Verdun sector the French have been very active, their latest offensive carrying them over first and second German lines and netting about 1,000 prisoners.

Bulletin, Nov. 19, p.m., Nov. 26, a.m.

On the Italian front where the Battle of the Piave River is still going on the week has brought but little substantial change. Though pressed from the Asiago to the sea the Italians still hold their positions. There has been severe fighting on the Asiago Plateau. The Austro-Germans in their attempt to force the line from Monte Sisemol to Monte Castelgomberto attacked in the direction of Monte Zomo, east of Gallio, and violently bombarded the Italian trenches at Monte Tondarechar and Monte Badenneche. Further east on the upper Piave, south of Quero, they attacked in force the Monte Monfenera and Monte Tomba lines. On November 19 Berlin announced that Quero and Monte Cornelle had been taken by storm and that the Italians had been driven from Monte Tomba. Towards the end of the week Berlin officially announced that Teutonic troops had captured the summits of Monte Fontana Secca and Monte Spinoncia on the northern front between the Piave and the Brenta. Rome announced that a great encircling movement attempted by the enemy against Monte Meletta, a key position on the Asiago Plateau, had been foiled. There has been furious fighting all during the week along the Piave and between the Piave and the Brenta, the invaders attempting to cross the Piave in force and also to come down the Brenta Valley on both sides of the river in an effort to reach Bassano and the open plain.

Although the British force in Mesopotamia, following the death of General Maude has been quiet, that of General Allenby in Palestine has drawn closer to Jerusalem and partly invested it. The British have captured En-Nebi Samwill, site of the ancient Mispah, five miles north of the Holy City.

Premier Lloyd George defended himself on November 19 in the House of Commons against the first serious attack his administration has faced, and so far as the House of Commons is concerned, seems to have been successful. The attack on his administration to which he vigorously replied, was focused on two points, the character and powers of the inter-Allied War Council which he had lately announced in his Paris speech, and the condemnation of the Allies' past strategy which he had pronounced on the same occasion. Ex-Premier Asquith was spokesman for the opposition. His speech was a sharp criticism of the new plan for the Allied control of the war and a vindication of his own Government for which, he remarked, that he himself and the present Premier had each his particular share of responsibility. Mr. Asquith's attack was considerably milder than the first hostile outburst from the newspapers and certain sections of the Liberal and Conservative parties which greeted the Premier on his return home. In a characteristically fighting speech Mr. Lloyd George in reply showed no sign of retraction of anything he had said or done, no hint of an apology for what had been called his Paris indiscretions. Answering the criticism that the idea of coordination between the Allies in their plans was a scheme on the part of civilians to interfere with the military leaders, the Premier brought out the fact that Lord Kitchener was the first to suggest it, and that he had exposed it in almost the same terms as he himself had outlined it in Paris. Had the Kitchener plan been carried out, the Premier added, "we should have been further forward in the war now." The reason why he wanted an inter-Allied war council was because he wanted victory, but did not want the whole burden of winning to fall on Great Britain. He desired, therefore, an inter-Allied council so to order the whole field of battle that all the resources of the Allies shall be thrown into the conflict. In the discussion of the mistakes made by the country in the conduct of the war he was not afraid to speak strong language. In dealing with the Serbian campaign, he said that if British troops had been dispatched to Serbia six weeks earlier, that "tragedy" would have been averted. But in spite of past blunders, the Premier declared there were only two things that could defeat England, the submarine menace and the lack of unity. Of the submarine menace he had no longer any fear. "We are on its track," he declared. The other danger was lack of unity. He ended by saying, "Unity is the only sure way to victory, a victory which will bring peace and healing to a world that is bleeding to death."

Ireland.—The inquest into the death of Thomas Ashe was concluded by the return of a verdict which has stirred Ireland profoundly. The judgment of the jury, as printed in the Weekly Freeman and the Irish Weekly Independent, reads:

The Ashe Case

We find that the deceased, Thos. Ashe, according to the medical evidence of Prof. McWeeney, Sir Arthur Chance, and Sir Thomas Myles, died of heart failure and congestion of the lungs on the 25th Sept., and that it was caused by the punishment of taking away from his cell the bed, bedding, and boots and left to lie on the cold floor for fifty hours, and then subjected to forcible feeding in his weak condition after a hunger strike of five or six days. We censure the Castle authorities for not acting more promptly, especially when the grave condition of the deceased and other prisoners was brought under their notice on the previous Saturday by the Lord Mayor and Sir John Irwin.

That the hunger strike was adopted against the inhuman punishment inflicted and as a protest against their being treated as criminals and demanding to be treated as political prisoners in the first division.

We condemn forcible or mechanical feeding as an inhuman and dangerous operation, and it should be discontinued.

That the assistant doctor called in, having no previous practice in such operations, administered unskilfully forcible feeding.

That the taking away of the deceased's bed, bedding and boots was an unfeeling and barbarous act, and we censure the Deputy-Governor for violating the prison rules and inflicting punishment which he had no power to do; but we infer he was acting under instructions from the Prisons Board at the Castle, which refused to give evidence and documents asked for.

Shortly after the publication of this verdict Mr. Duke, the Chief Secretary, was interpellated in the House of Commons, but as he refused to answer a pertinent question, the process was short and unsatisfactory. Incidents of this kind and numerous arrests of Irishmen on trivial charges have given an impetus to Sinn Fein. De Valera is as active as ever. He is attended by throngs of people who apparently look to him for relief from untoward conditions.

Mexico.—Some weeks ago a former uplift official of New York, now in the employment of Carranza, favored American reviews with picturesque descriptions of Mexico's progress under the benign hand of the First Chief. What the Carranzistas themselves think of the condition of their country stands in interesting contrast to the opinions of the aforesaid hired agent. Under the stress of great anxiety the former spoke their minds in a recent debate in the Chamber of Deputies. Their words were reported by the Carranzista paper, El Universal, from which the following significant passages are taken:

An Important Confession

Yesterday's session of the Chamber of Deputies excited the deepest interest. During the session the members began the discussion of the bill concerning the suspension of the law of guarantees in the case of robbers, highwaymen, footpads, burglars, lawbreakers, forgers, etc. During the debate which was not lacking in the most stirring incidents, Colonel Miguel Peralta, president of the Liberal Constitutional Party, made the most sensational charges against the national army, accusing it as one of the most responsible agencies for the abnormal canditions now prevailing in the republic. . . . According to Señor Rivera Cabrera . . . another cause of the prevailing troubles was the hunger which everywhere threatened to stifle the very life of the country. The removal from the Government of many of the men of the revolution was also according to the speaker one of the factors of the situation. The situation was aggravated, he said, by the fact that many men who did not deserve the confidence of the Revolutionists surrounded the President. He also stated as factors making up the national conditions the shameful outrages committed by the military leaders, like the one chronicled in yesterday's papers reporting how an officer, who was speculating in grain to his own advantage, shot a peaceful citizen of Vera Cruz solely because the latter refused to sell the merchandise which the officer intended to seize (sic). Finally Señor Rivera alluded to the behavior of the railroads and reminded his hearers that many of them are the real cause of the high cost of foodstuffs.

Deputy Siurob speaking for the measure (the suspension of guarantees) expressed his opinion that the revolution should again draw the sword, for the evil originated in the Cabinet, then infected the army, the State Governors and lastly reached the very heart of the people. . . .

Noisy protests were heard when Colonel Miguel Peralta reached the tribune to speak against the suspension of the guarantees. According to him the situation was more serious than was admitted by those who are in the upper circles of the Government. Train robberies were becoming more and more frequent, several army leaders had proved untrue to their trust, there was not a single State in which thousands of men, risen in arms, were not to be found. Here even in the capital men could see the most alarming signs of social decomposition, for they were at the mercy of every pickpocket or footpad hidden behind a tree. In the North the Villista party was still alive; in the South there was a faction which had aroused sympathy already and had extended its influence from Morelos to Puebla, the City of Mexico, Hidalgo, the Federal District and even to the "Huastecas." In the region of the Isthmus the Felicistas were to be found who had branches in every State capital, formed of the most powerful and intelligent elements and had in the capital itself their central director. In the South it looked as if General Alvarado instead of triumphs met nothing but defeat.

The Assistant Secretary of the Interior Don Miguel Aguirre Berlanga was present in the hall. He was given the floor to make his report. This official stated that he did so in the name of the Executive, and to give an account to the Deputies of the motives which influenced it in putting before them the measure which they were then discussing. He then stated that it was a matter of public and notorious knowledge that many crimes committed by armed bands had been lately chronicled in the press and that in the space of two months no less than twelve train robberies had been recorded, also crimes like assault and robbery, and even murder. The Executive, therefore, in order to defend society, as its mandate requires it to do, needed the extraordinary means which it begged the Chamber to grant.

To sum up: According to Carranzista officials, Mexico is starving, Mexico is bankrupt, Mexico is torn by numerous and vigorous revolutions, Mexico is infested by bandits who pillage and murder, Mexico is harassed by its army which commits brutal crimes of all sorts, Mexico, in short, is a land of confusion, hunger, despair, blood and hypocrisy, which on translation into English for uplift reviews becomes "Progress."

Rome.—The subjoined synopsis of an article in the current number of the Razon y Fe reflects Spain's ideas about the Pope's neutrality and gives an excellent summary of the Holy Father's work.

Spain and the Pope's Neutrality

Two days after the Pope had been crowned he addressed his first letter "Ubi primum," dated September 8, 1914, to the Catholic world. It was a cry of horror at the spectacle of the awful misery into which the war had plunged nations, an exhortation to Catholics to pray earnestly that God might lay aside His scourge, and an entreaty to the heads of the belligerents to enter into negotiations for peace. His first words, in which he emphasizes his paternal solicitude for all his children, are a plea for peace. Two months later, on November 1, he repeated his earnest supplications for the end of the war, in his encyclical "Ad Beatissimi." Christmas eve, in his allocution to the Cardinals, he alluded to his fruitless efforts to obtain a cessation of hostilities for Christmas day, but expressed his hope of obtaining an exchange of prisoners.

The following year, 1915, had scarcely begun, when the Pope on January 10, published his decree, inviting and urging clergy and laity alike to practise penance as a means of appeasing God's anger, and appointing February 7 for Europe and March 21 for the rest of the world as a day for public and united prayer for peace by all the many millions of Catholics in all parts of the earth. On January 22, in an allocution addressed to the Sacred Consistory, the Holy Father reproved the violations of justice that had taken place, and insisted on his strict duty of preserving a strict impartiality toward all the warring nations. On May 25 he bade the Catholic world turn in its distress to the sorrowing and immaculate Heart of Mary, and to implore her to use her powerful intercession in behalf of her children and to obtain for them the cessation of war and the restoration of peace and tranquillity. Two months later on the first anniversary of the outbreak of hostilities he again expressed his anguish of heart and his desire that the nations at war might again become brothers and settle their difficulties, not by the might of the sword, but by calm considerations of equity and justice. On September 6 he again exhorted all Catholics to work for the reestablishment of a peace based on justice and in accord with the dignity of all the nations; and with this end in view he authorized the Bishops to sanction the use of the invocation "Queen of Peace, Pray for Us" in their respective dioceses during the war. He could not let the year close without again pleading for peace. Recalling his position as the successor to the Prince of Peace, he alluded to his well-known efforts to alleviate the horrors of war and his purpose to use every endeavor to prevent such horrors in future. For this purpose he declared that a way to peace, just, durable and stable, consisted in a clear formulation by the respective parties of their aims and purposes, to be followed by a conference in which, injustice being set aside, mutual concessions and compensations should be made in the spirit of equity.

In the year 1916 the Holy Father, in a letter dated March 4, urged all the families of the belligerents to practise penance during Lent, and to pray earnestly to the Queen of Martyrs for the gifts of Christian fortitude and resignation and for the cessation of the agony of the war. Some months later, on June 26, he appointed July 30, 1916, as a general Communion day for the children of all the world, whose intention was to be the restoration of peace. On September 8 he protested against the insinuations which had been made against his impartiality, and proclaimed that he was guided, not by self-interest but by loving concern for the common good, and that it was his duty to labor for the cause, not of any set of men, but for humanity itself. On December 4 he again expressed his desire that civil society might be restored to order, with respect for right and justice, and that peace the day-star of all good, might shine forth with renewed brilliance on the nations.

Early in the following year, on January 10, he once more voiced his hope that the world might learn the way to peace. And on May 5 he again bade his children turn to the Blessed Virgin as a powerful advocate, and ordered that the invocation, "Queen of Peace, Pray for Us," hitherto permitted in individual dioceses, should be added to Our Lady's Litany, throughout the world, on and after June 1. The culmination of his efforts in behalf of peace was his note to the heads of the belligerent Powers, dated August 1, which in spite of its critics is a monument at once to the universal affection and to the strict impartiality of the Vicar of the Prince of Peace.

Russia.—According to reports received last week fighting has ceased in Petrograd and Moscow, leaving the Bolsheviki in complete control of those cities. In Moscow the conflict lasted from November 7 to 15, some 4,000 people were killed and the damage to property was heavy. Though foreigners were not molested Ambassador Francis has advised all unattached Americans to leave Petrograd. The fear of famine seems to have done more to bring quiet than did the fighting. In many places all parties united to combat hunger. The situation is said to be largely controlled by General Kaledines, the Cossack commander, who holds the country's bread and coal region. Meanwhile Petrograd's civic routine seems to go on automatically, though there is no real government there. The City Council ceased negotiating with the Bolsheviki and began to work for the election of a Constitutional Assembly. Regiments of soldiers paraded the streets bearing banners denouncing the Bolsheviki. Two-thirds of the Executive Committee formed by the Bolsheviki resigned and the remainder conferred dictatorial powers on Lenine, who issued decrees altering fundamental laws. To add to the confusion, two Central Committees of Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates claimed authority, each denying the other's rights. On November 17 the Military Revolutionary Committee arrested the Director of the State Bank because he refused to sign their orders for funds, and on November 22 a body of Red Guards demanded $5,000,000 from the bank "within ten minutes." The time expired without their receiving the money, so they retired.

Progressive Anarchy

On November 22 the news came that by order of the All-Russian Workmen's and Soldiers' Congress the Council of the People's Commissaries offered "All the peoples and their respective Governments an immediate armistice on all fronts, with the purpose of opening pourparlers immediately for the conclusion of a 'democratic peace.'" The Council announced that when its power is established, a formal offer of an armistice will be made to all the belligerents, enemy and ally. The Council also sent orders to the "citizen Commander-in-Chief" to approach enemy generals with an offer of a cessation of all hostile activities for the purpose of holding peace pourparlers. In a proclamation to the army and navy Lenine ordered regiments at the front to elect delegates, who are to open formal negotiations with the Germans, and 360,000 Ukranian troops are reported to have been recalled from the front. On General Dukhonin's refusal to propose the armistice, Lenine appointed Ensign N. Krylenko Commander-in-Chief of the Russian forces. A reduction of the troops, beginning with the class conscripted in 1899, has been ordered.

Bolsheviki Peace Offers

On being interviewed by an Associated Press correspondent Trotsky declared that the Workmen's and Soldiers' Government was opposed to a separate peace with Germany, but was convinced that the Russian offer for a universal peace would be supported by the proletariat of every country. He outlined as the "plans and intentions" of his Government:

(1) There will be an immediate publication of all secret treaties and the abolition of secret diplomacy. (2) An offer of an immediate armistice on all fronts for the conclusion of a democratic peace. (3) The transfer of all lands to the peasants. (4) The establishment of State control of industries through the medium of organized workmen and employees and the nationalization of the most important branches of industry. (5) The delivery of all authority to local Workmen's and Soldier's Delegates. (6) The convocation of a Constituent Assembly which will introduce its reforms through the medium of the Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates and not through the old bureaucracy on an appointed date.

"We rely on the German army and the working classes to make a continuation of the war impossible," said Trotsky. But if his offers of peace are rejected he will declare a revolutionary war against German imperialism. He boasted that the working classes, the army, and most of the peasants are with him, no one but capitalists and land-owners being against him. The new Ministry has laid down the "following principles as the foundation of its measures regarding nationalities in Russia":

(1) Freedom and self-determination for the peoples of Russia. (2) This right of the Russian peoples to their free self-determination to be extended even as far as separation and the forming of independent States. (3) Suspension of all nationalist and religious privileges and limitations. (4) Free development to all national minorities and ethnographic groups inhabiting Russian territory. Concrete terms are to be drawn up immediately after the forming of a commission for national questions.

To show how completely the Bolsheviki Government has broken with the past, Trotsky has published the texts of seventeen secret treaties and telegrams found in the Russian Foreign Office. The United States and all the other Powers refuse to recognize the Bolsheviki Government, and M. Bakhmeteff, Russian Ambassador at Washington, has officially repudiated it. America and all the Allies have cut off supplies from Russia. Kerensky, who is still in hiding, has resigned, and General Dukhonin has refused to surrender the chief command of the army to Ensign Krylenko.

A Spiritual Ambassador

MICHAEL WILLIAMS

THESE United States have received and welcomed many important missions and embassies and special representatives of great powers and interests during this strange period of the great war. There have been princes and dukes and lords and great commoners from France and Russia, from Italy and Great Britain, ministers of state and generals and admirals and ambassadors and editors and financiers; a kaleidoscopic pageant of great personages, all intent upon securing the friendship, the sympathy and the support of this nation on behalf of the peoples who are allied or associated in the universal war for liberty. Isolated, perhaps provincial, despite all our wealth and power and consequence, as we have been in the past, now we are keenly conscious of our copartnership with the rest of the world; with its joys and its woes, with its struggles and its anxieties; with all its multitudinous interests and complex, strenuous affairs.

Comes now an ambassador of another sort: a minister who is unlike all that have appeared heretofore, a special representative of an interest unlike all others—one that is far too often ignored or even opposed by these others, yet one more important than any that has gone before it in appealing to Americans. I refer to Dom Aelred Carlyle, the Lord Abbot of the Benedictine Abbey of Caldey, Wales, who is now in this country; his mission being to appeal to its Catholic population with an appeal that cannot fail to stir their heartiest interest and enthusiastic support.

This mission has two main aspects. It would be difficult to make a just decision as to the aspect which is the more fundamentally important; but unquestionably the first of these aspects, namely, to obtain financial support for the work soon to be undertaken at Caldey to train aspirants for the decimated priesthood of Great Britain, will make the strongest and widest general appeal to the loyalty and generosity of American Catholics. Without a powerful and numerous body of active priests, where would the Catholic Church be? To support the priesthood, I think, comes first in the scale of values when a Catholic layman considers his public duty to religion.

But the second aspect of the Lord Abbot's mission will also appeal with a peculiar force to Americans at this time. It is his hope to find many American men with a vocation to the Benedictine life, who will desire to join the Americans already in training at Caldey, so that by and by a branch of the Caldey Benedictines may be established in this country, devoted exclusively to the carrying on of the great work of contemplation, under the primitive rule of St. Benedict. For the Abbot of Caldey has observed what many others have already perceived, namely, that there is a marked and constantly increasing interest in mysticism in America. Many forms of this interest are freakish, morbid, dangerous; wild aberrations of mysticism, indeed; but at least they are proofs of the hunger and the thirst of the modern American soul after spiritual life. Now, mysticism when guided and controlled by the Catholic Church, is one of the most potent and most stimulating of all religious forces. The contemplative Orders are the authorized, authentic systems for the guidance and the inspiration of legitimate mysticism. The contemplative Orders are the specialists, the experts, in the concentration and the control of the power of prayer, of all the channels of sane and well-ordered practical mysticism. And the Benedictine Order, the Abbot of Caldey believes, is peculiarly well-adapted to American conditions and the American temperament.

Let me, however, return to the first aspect of the Abbot's mission to America. In order to set it forth in the proper perspective, it will be well if I first briefly review the well-known history of Caldey Abbey itself, as that review will explain the special reasons which at this great crisis in our history has brought Dom Aelred Carlyle to our shores.

The Abbot of Caldey, it will be recalled, is one of the most notable of the many notable converts to the Catholic Church in recent times in England. A collateral relative of Thomas Carlyle—that dour old philosopher would probably cast eyes askance at his strange descendant, were he alive today—and a man of large private means, Dom Aelred Carlyle when a young boy, and a member of the Church of England, was led to dedicate himself to the observance of the rule of St. Benedict by reading a book on monks and monasteries discovered in his father's library. As a medical student at St. Bartholomew's Hospital in London, he later gathered a band of young Anglicans about him to follow as well as they might the religious rule of St. Benedict while going about their ordinary affairs—strangely do these medical students contrast with the type of St. Bartholomew student immortalized, and unmoralized by Dickens in the "Pickwick Papers." Later on there came official recognition by the Archbishop of Canterbury of this effort to revive the contemplative life in the Church of England. Dom Aelred Carlyle was made the first abbot of the revived Order of St. Benedict, and gathered a community of Anglican monks about him on the little island of Caldey, on the coast of Wales, in 1906.

Seven years later, Dom Aelred and all his followers, together with a community of Anglican Benedictine nuns, at St. Bride's, Milford Haven, were received into the Catholic Church. In the midst of fruitful and diversified labors, undertaken in the most obvious good faith, the fervor and devotion of the community for twenty years, ever since Dom Aelred initiated this revival, had been nourished by Catholic books and practices, the inexhaustible treasury of mystical riches from which all forms of modern mysticism derive and often pilfer their only vitality. And the community had been groping about striving to find "a coherent and logical mode of loyal adhesion to the Church of England."

For more than twelve months, as the crisis approached, the claims of the Catholic Church had demanded the attention of the community, and several well-known Anglican divines had been asked to solve the difficulties which bristled between the theory and practice of High-Church doctrines. . . . The outcome . . . was to sweep away the honest delusions of years and to bring us face to face with the fact that extra Ecclesiam nulla salus. The uncompromising attitude of the Anglican Bishops in regard to the faith and devotional practices of the community was the immediate cause, under God, of showing us once, and for all, that the Protestantism of the Church of England was inherent and ineradicable, and that apart from the Pope and his jurisdiction there could never be any true Catholicism.

From a worldly point of view, the first effect of the wholesale conversion of the Caldey Community was disastrous. The greater portion of the annual revenue of the monks came from Anglican donations. All these were withdrawn, and the Community faced the hardest kind of a struggle for existence. But Pope Pius X showed the most generous helpfulness. He granted all the necessary privileges and dispensations so that the community might be regularized as Benedictines as speedily as possible. He personally contributed for a term of years towards their support, and his example spurred on the English Catholics.

Then came the great war. Dom Aelred was professed at Maredsous, in Belgium, upon the very day the Austrian Archduke was assassinated. He got back to England the day Great Britain declared war. "In fact," he told the present writer, with the gracious humor that distinguishes him, "as a Catholic Abbot, I am very much of a war baby!" Caldey Island was swept bare by the army-recruiting of practically all its workingmen, most of whom had been employed by the monks in the stone quarries that constituted one of their principal means of support. Soon it was apparent that, with the many other more pressing calls upon them, the English Catholics could do no more for Caldey.

Against this ominous situation loomed all the brighter for the dark cloud hovering over them the glorious truth that spiritually the success of the Caldey Benedictines grew ever more pronounced and far-reaching. The fact that this lonely island on the Welsh coast, where hermits and monks have dwelt since the fifth century, though not continuously, was a veritable power-house for the calling down and the distribution of God's grace and favors, was palpable. From the very trenches came scores of applications for admittance after the war from officers and from private soldiers.

Not only so, but there appeared another work which Caldey could do. The decimated ranks of the priesthood in all European countries is one of the most menacing, most appalling factors of the war situation. While England has not sent her priests into the trenches to fight, nevertheless she has taken the seminarians, and chaplain-duty has called hundreds of priests far from their usual duties. And many are dead or dying, of bullets or of disease.

At the same time, there is a most remarkable and wonderful wave of vocations to the priesthood in Great Britain. There has never been a time in the history of England since before the revolt of Luther "when there were so many who long to leave the fishing nets of the world to follow the Divine Master in His fishing for souls," as the Abbot of Caldey says:

These are called late vocations. In many cases a youth will have thought over the question in pre-war times, but the realization of his hopes seemed impossible. Want of classical education, or of means, drove him into the merchant's or professional man's office in spite of his high ambitions. The war, however, has revived his hopes. His experience has doubled his value. He is a tried young candidate. He knows the world and has fought against it as well as against the flesh and the devil. There are dozens and dozens of men who have been brought face to face with spiritual realities, and whose only ambition and hope is to devote the remainder of life to the greatest cause, the salvation of souls. But there is a difficulty. It is that young subjects like these cannot be received into a seminary or the novitiate of a religious house until they have been tested and prepared, and have acquired a knowledge of Latin. At the present time so far as we know there is in the British Isles no place where men can be received, nor is there machinery for dealing with them. Something has already been done by means of "Our Lady's Young Priests' Fund" set going by the Stella Maris magazine, and at present there are many young candidates placed in various day and boarding colleges in preparation for different dioceses and Orders. These, however, are not the later vocations of the young men at present in the army who are specially in our mind and for whom it is particularly wished that something may be done.

With true apostolic spirit, the Benedictines of Caldey are preparing to open a central preparatory college for all dioceses and Orders where some of these young warrior-aspirants inspired by the Holy Ghost amid the roar of battle may be received as in a clearing-house, to be sorted and placed according to the signs of their vocations. The estimated cost of training a candidate will be fifty pounds, or $250 a year. Precious little, this, I may say, when we consider that these war-born vocations, these priests of the Almighty garnered from the fields of death to bring souls into the meadows of everlasting life, may be nurtured for so little. Americans are being appealed to most earnestly to become "war fathers" of young soldiers, and help them while they are in training camps, or in France, in order that they may become and remain good soldiers of Uncle Sam. This is good work, too; but how much greater, how much more vitally necessary for Americans to become war fathers of these young soldiers of Christ, who have heard His call to rally under a standard more essential than any flag, to a service more needed than that of any army.

These, then, very briefly indicated, are the main aspects of the mission of this spiritual Ambassador, the Lord Abbot of Caldey, in America. Here is an alliance deeper than any other. The Church of Christ is the Church of Christ no matter under what flag this or that portion of its members may be, and the appearance among us of Dom Aelred is a needful reminder of our spiritual brotherhood as Catholics.

Necessary Egotism

DANIEL A. LORD, S.J.

WHEN dear old Rip roused himself from his rather protracted nap and stroked his unaccustomed white beard, he thought at once of his home and of the probable reception that awaited him there; and then he wondered mildly if he had not better wait until it grew dark before returning to his lares and penates. In reality, years had passed since he left that home; but for him the days of his vagabond youth with all their associations of cavernous pockets and tempestuous wife, of elfish bowling clubs and vast draughts of exhilarating liquor lay within easy reach of memory. He was, as far as he knew, the same old Rip that had taken his gun and his dog up into the Catskills, though his garments were tattered beyond recognition and the gun at his side had evidently been substituted by puckish gamins for his own fowling-piece. About it all there was a certain vague strangeness, but the one thing of which he was quite sure was that he was the same Rip Van Winkle who yesterday or the day before at latest had lain down to rest.

That is a strange link which binds the feeble old man on his last bed with the same man as a child at his mother's knee. Rip was unique merely in that he skipped the entire period of his middle age. He went to sleep a fresh, blooming hunter and awoke a doddering relic. But for most men the various epochs of life dissolve gradually into one another. Childhood slips into youth; youth glides imperceptibly into manhood; manhood ripens and reaches a full maturity, and then begins the gradual descent toward that bed on which the eventful last scene is played. Shakespeare's seven ages are really not acts bounded at each end by a rising and falling curtain; they are rather one long act in which, in various costumes, a single actor plays his several roles. The realization of one personal identity throughout links the life of today with the life of yesterday, or of last year, or of twenty or fifty years ago.

The old man can no more shake off this consciousness that he and the child of five that bore his name are identically the same person, than he can shake off his head by diligent nodding. When a man of business takes a week off to run down to "the old home," he looks fondly at the orchard where he, then a lad in overalls and a torn shirtwaist, his feet innocent of shoes, stole the forbidden green apples. He boasts that he could, in those happy days of unconscious digestion, eat more than any boy in his "neck of the woods"; he tells how single-handed he licked a bully ten years old; and though, when the old folk bring out a faded tintype of a very stiff and frightened youth in short-long trousers and a blouse starched like a strait-jacket, he screams with enjoyment at the thought that that puny youngster was once himself, he has not the slightest doubt that he and the frightened youth are the very same person.

The surviving members of the class of '57 are entertained by the alumni association. Smith, aged eighty-one, egged on by his fellow-antiquities, brags that in his day he was the swiftest runner in his college; "beat Harvard, by Jove, in the 100 at 11 flat." And though the dear old chap could not beat a snail if the snail give him a handicap, no one doubts that this is the onetime champion.

That tremendous sense of personal identity linking the man of the present with the man of the past has its grim features as well. What has this prim, passionless professional man, diffusing wisdom and majestic decorum from his very presence, to do with the hot-blooded, impetuous youth who, in a moment of wild, blinding passion, flung a trusting soul headlong to ruin? Yet in the quiet of his room where no eye sees, wisdom and decorum fall from him like a loose glove, and conscience flings into his quivering face the crime of his distant youth.

This identity of personality is absolutely necessary for whole classes of intellectual operations. The composition of the Canterbury Tales took Chaucer some twenty years, but through that entire period he never lost sight of the single plan that he had formulated in the very beginning. And today it would be simply impossible for any man to take up the incomplete work as Chaucer left it and carry it to the conclusion which Chaucer clearly had in mind.

Or take the physicist who is employed on some delicate experiments covering reams of paper and years of time. Suppose that there were no identity of person there, that from day to day the experimenter could not recognize that he was the one who performed these experiments yesterday and the day before. It is obvious that any completion of the experiments would be impossible. He must recognize the steps which he took to reach the present point in his problem; he must be able, without any break in the sequence, to bring his results from the first equation to the final answer; he must be in a position at the conclusion of his experiments to grasp the problem as a single, logical whole. And because the physicist is conscious of his identity with the man who began and continued the experiments, its ultimate solution is more than merely possible.

Everyone from his own experience knows that he is the same person throughout the longest and most varied life. Baby, boy, lover, soldier, justice, grandfather, ancient, he is absolutely the same individual. To brand such a universal and necessary conviction as a delusion is to incur the righteous laughter of those with common-sense. Yet without a soul distinct from the body, it is simply impossible to explain this perception of identity. With a soul, the problem is relatively simple.

Suppose we take first the materialistic attitude that there is nothing in a man but his body. At some time in our lives we have all been amused at finding out the enormous quantities of food we consume in the course of a normal year. We realize, though, the significance of this apparent voracity when we learn that the simplest action of muscle or nerve literally burns up our bodies as a locomotive burns coal. We live like the old-time racing steamboats on the Mississippi, by burning ourselves up; so much so, that in the course of every seven years, conservative scientists maintain, we have completely changed every nerve and muscle and bone in our bodies. In the case of the brain the destruction and rebuilding is much more rapid. Americans who live at high pressure probably renew their brain-cells faster than anyone else.

If, then, nothing exists but our bodies, our conviction, ineradicable though it may be, that we are the same persons today that we were seven years ago is simply false. We have nothing but our bodies, and our bodies have been changed as we changed our coats and hats. The child, with its fresh, pink skin, its sensitive nerves, and its resilient bones, is no more the sage, with his wrinkled, parchment skin, his dulled senses and his brittle bones, than the baby's beribboned shoes are the sage's carpet slippers. If there is no soul, unchanged substantially during all the changes of the body, to link together this ever decaying, ever renewing "mansion of flesh," we have no greater fool than the man of seventy who feels himself the same person as the child of seven, the youth of seventeen, the bridegroom of twenty-seven. As a matter of fact, he has been a new personality every seven years.

Absurd as materialism is, the modern theory of a world-soul is a very dark shade more ridiculous. Briefly put, the theory is this: There are no individual souls; instead there is one huge soul which, like Lake Michigan flowing through the hydrants of Chicago, trickles through the individual brain in a stream of thought. To use the favorite figure, the world of men is a great stained-glass window through which the cosmic mind flings its thoughts as the sun flings its rays. The thoughts, of course, receive their individual character from the brain through which they seep, just as the rays of the sun are colored differently by the individual bits of glass. But the person does not think; the world-soul thinks, and a man can be said to have a soul only in so far as the thoughts of the world-soul filter through his brain. There is no thinker; only thoughts! Some philosophers would be saved if they only had a sense of humor.

For here is confusion confounded and compounded. My body is constantly changing, but so are my thoughts. The only permanent thing is a world-soul which is not mine. My body is not permanent; my soul is as common as a public drinking-fountain, and my thoughts are considerably less durable than the fountain's flowing water. I have a constant conviction of my personal identity, though really the thinking principle in me is in no way personal to me and is as much the property of every man in town as the air or the sidewalk. As for my thoughts, they just "roll along."

In other words, the idea of a world-soul gives the lie to my conviction of my individuality because I share it in common with Tom, Dick, and Harry, not to mention Ah Sing and Uncle Mose. The succession of thoughts renders impossible any explanation of a continuous personality, for even supposing that thought two knows all about thought one, and thought three knows both one and two, yet, when I go to sleep, I make it a point to stop thinking, and the chain of thoughts is nicely riven in twain. A fine way for a person to break with the past under this theory would be to take an anesthetic.

As a matter of fact, we could not run our world unless, besides this mere belief in personal identity, there were actually in every man something that kept him identically the same. Unless the thief, the murderer, the wife-deserter, arrested years after the crime, were absolutely identical with the man who committed the crime, all the judges from the supreme bench to the courtroom of Alice's Wonderland could not punish the offense. A lapse of seven years under the materialistic theory or a single change of mind under the successive thoughts-theory would make a man irresponsible for his contracts, would annul all the marriages in the land, turn fathers into persons quite unrelated to their children, and set our little earth completely on its head. But fortunately we do not manage affairs on such theories as these. All the while we dispute about it, we presuppose something in a man that makes him responsible for all the acts of a lifetime, that binds him to his contracts through years of time, that keeps him in precisely the same relationship to father or children or wife. That something is nothing else than an unchanging soul which is distinct from the changeable body, and is the cause of fleeting thought.

A New Religion

EDWARD F. MURPHY

THERE is much talk these days about the return of religion to its own. Spencerian fingers have ceased to flip God away into the realm of the unknowable. Agnosticism was acceptable when the men were finding the world itself so fascinating that they would not, and hence easily persuaded themselves that they could not, know anything about Him who made it, much less pay serious attention to Him who redeemed it, and spoke of a cross to be carried. But those who felt proud of their apathy and ignorance of things Divine some years ago, today seemed stirred and humbled by the knowledge which sorrow has brought. Was it not St. Augustine, who said that eyes laden with tears are more easily lifted to God? The point has been scored that, while frivolous philosophies may do well enough in an era of peace and prosperity, men simply cannot do without religion when the earth is quaking and hearts are breaking. Through today's mystery of pain, men are seeing the solution of the mystery of the universe. For trouble has turned mental and sentimental processes in the direction that leads to the God whom Comte banished and Spencer blurred. Subconsciously the world realizes that He alone who has permitted this tidal wave of blood can stem it, and suspects that His purpose in permitting it was to make Himself known in His might to those who refused to see Him in His mercy.

It is clear that the dawn of a religious day is breaking. But the question has already flashed forth: What brand of doctrine shall we accept? Marx, Christ, or a combination of Christ and Pan? The religion of democracy, plain archaic Christianity, or an up-to-date bridge across Olympus to Calvary? Certainly not the first, for the religion of democracy is not a religion at all. If it is anything, it is mere Socialism painted with piety.

It surely would seem that there could be no conjunction of the cloven-footed god with the perfect Man of Galilee. But Edward Lewis in the pages of the Atlantic Monthly makes one. Even as the infatuated Jews once shrieked for Barabbas, so does Mr. Lewis call for Pan, though kind enough to allow Christ to come along too. Our intellect was darkened and our will was weakened by the sin of our first parents; otherwise the attitude of the Atlantic scribe could be esteemed by Catholics only as a great enigma or as matter for the attention of alienists. It is extravagant that Mr. Lewis should refer men who are groping in the gloom for their God, to the mythology at which Lucian laughed. Would he thrust the libidinous Zeus, deflowerer of Danae, Semele and Europa, alongside the pure Christ who taught the blessedness of the clean of heart? Would he rear the shameless Aphrodite to the plane of the Immaculate Mary, as once the French extremists enshrined a scarlet woman on the altar of Notre Dame? Can he be sincere in his enthusiasm for a revival of the "Divine Comedy" or its equivalent? His reasons are interesting.

Paganism, he maintains, unwarrantably offends the nostrils of the modern world; a stubborn reminiscence of the days when Christ was wrestling with Pan and the Galilean conquered. His apparent opinion is that Christianity uncharitably refused to think nobly of a noble enemy conquered, and that the ship of the Church sailed on a grand career of obloquy down through the centuries. Now if there indeed was evil in Paganism, there were also Socrates, Aristotle, Phidias, Homer, Pindar, Aeschylus, Euripides, and Archilochus. Why should we think only of a swollen, rose-crowned inebriate of an Epicurean when the word pagan floats into our brain? Why forget the clean, well-disciplined Stoic? We are prejudiced against Pan, though "no deity has a juster claim to live than he; and, could he die, all other deities would perforce become silent and powerless, for the natural is the tap-root of the spiritual."

We venture the assertion that Christ was a trifle more natural than Pan. He was incarnate, born of a woman, suffered and died. Pan rose from the froth of the Hellenic imagination and sank when the bards ceased to pluck their lyres. His was an abstract existence, while Christ's was actual and hence exceedingly more natural, in Mr. Lewis' own sense of the word.

Christ appears to have realized just as well as Mr. Lewis that the natural induces the spiritual. It is sound psychology that the data from which ideas are abstracted by the intellect are acquired through the senses. It is from the natural order that we ascend to the ideal or, as Mr. Lewis calls it, the spiritual. That seems to have been a good reason why Christ came in manhood to redeem us; by His concrete presence, example and the word of His lips, all of which penetrated the senses of men, Our Saviour reached their souls. When He returned to His Father's house, He left behind Him a visible Church and the tender Eucharist, thus providing for the external as well as the internal devotion of His children. There is after all much of the natural, as well as the supernatural, in Christianity. It is the former that is raised to the latter by grace. "God became man that man might become God."

The brilliant names and virtues of certain pagans should not blind Mr. Lewis to certain truths. The Stoics were a rather limited quantity in the pagan world and hence were hardly representative of the persuasion of Pan. Nor did their merits spring from religious motives, but rather from philosophic preoccupations. They flourished at a time when the gods were eliciting many sniffs. And, at best, an oasis does not disprove a desert. Too, the barrenness of paganism is not falsified by the rich names of the new great ones of Greece. Like Lucian, Socrates smiled at the popular deities. How nebulous the personal religion of Euripides was, apart from the exigencies of the drama, is plain from his skeptical verse, quoted in Lucian's "Zeus, the Tragedian"

Zeus,
Whoe'er Zeus is, for I know not, unless
By hearsay.

Paganism was too fleshly and gross to satisfy the spiritual cravings of men. It had to go even before Christ came. Only the shell was left when the star shone over the hills of Bethlehem of Juda.

The effect and value of the Christian dispensation, adjudges Mr. Lewis, was discipline. But discipline is not an end in itself. Excellent! He is reminding us of what Christianity never forgot. The end of Christian discipline is the perfection which is like God and leads to Him. Christian discipline qualifies for the higher life that begins with death, and also gives purpose and peace to these days of earthly exile. The Atlantic writer scorns the virtue that chills and diminishes passion, seemingly esteeming such to have been the object and lesson of Christ. Yet who would accuse the Nazarene of being a sawdust personality? Jesus loved and wept and stormed. Is it not just as possible to be passionate over the good which Christianity teaches as over the evil which paganism permits? Few pagans ever had a vehemence to surpass St. Paul's. Certainly this Apostle's virile virtue did not chill or diminish his passion. Too, there is to be considered a long and significant line of enthusiastic saints, who lived every ounce of their lives. Mr. Lewis and hagiography, however, likely are strangers.

"Oh, the bitterness of the continual repression of desire, the galling of the bands, the chafing of the fetters! Oh, the stupidity of authority——" Thus moans our admirer of Pan and critic of Christ. He should pause in his sighs to realize that Christianity with her hedges aims merely at keeping men from making fools of themselves and injuring others. In which noble service, she joins hands with the law of the land.

Mr. Lewis himself seems to suspect that he is preaching chaos, for he actually drifts into admitting and admiring the result of discipline. One then wonders why he bothered to complain about Christianity at all.

"The great sin," according to Mr. Lewis, "is not to live with enthusiasm—The great untruth is to be unreal—The great treachery is to refuse expression to Self——"

This sounds like a sentence from the rouged lips of some heroine in the Cosmopolitan Magazine. The cry for "self-expression" has been taken up with a vengeance by such ladies as simply will not become mothers, and hence have plenty of time for the follies and fads. But if everybody expressed himself or herself, our jails and lunatic asylums would be quite inadequate. Some selves are inexpressible, others are not worth expressing, still others are horrible beyond expression. We have no objection to a genius setting himself forth in terms of goodness, truth or beauty. But there is another side to the situation: should we care to let a Bacchus express himself in grapes and debauchery, or a Nero in such street-orgies as the black nights of old Rome knew?

Thank Heaven, we have a Law that decidedly limits self-expression and a Christ to uphold it, not a Pan to subvert it!

Joseph Lotte, Lay Apologist

BLANCHE M. KELLY

EVEN before the outbreak of the war, which has been to so many the channel of grace, resulting in their return to practical Catholicism, there had begun in France a wonderful renewal of Catholic life. The movement has been largely, though not wholly, among literary men, men who gave the years of their youth to the propaganda of unbelief and whose recovery of faith in Christianity has been characterized by all the ardor with which they formerly pursued wandering fires. The head and front of this movement was Charley Péguy and the name of Joseph Lotte is so inextricably connected with his that his biographer, M. Pierre Pacary, could describe him by no more fitting title than Un compagnon de Péguy. And indeed Lotte himself would not have been so well content with another, for they were companions in many adventures during many years—Péguy the leader and master and Lotte the disciple—although on that thorny road back to Rome each walked alone, Lotte if anything in advance and assuredly the more simple, direct and uncompromising of the two.

"Ah, mon pauvre vieux, nous en sommes tous là!" was his astonishing reply to Péguy's avowal that he, atheist, Socialist, Dreyfusard, had recovered the Faith of his Catholic childhood, although he had not yet returned to the practice of it. "We are all come to this pass!" The words seem to have been wrung from him; they were his first signal of capitulation, his first half-shamefaced, half-defiant acknowledgment of defeat by a Stronger than he. They were such a cry as issued from the lips of Saul, in the dust of the Damascus road:

My harness, piece by piece, Thou hast hewn from me,
And smitten me to my knee;
I am defenseless utterly.

Emile Joseph Lotte was born at Rochefort, France, on February 20, 1875, and was baptized in the parish church of St. Louis. He grew up in a household where the mother's ardent piety acted as a foil for the father's anti-clericalism. Of Breton blood, and therefore as Faguet wrote of Lamenais, croyant comme il était vivant, with a certain eager chivalry of soul, swift as a drawn sword, flashing, dauntless, the springs of pity deep but easily stirred, with a capacity for bursts of irresponsible fun which is not uncharacteristic of melancholy natures; such in his boyhood was the future champion of Dreyfus, the future founder of the Bulletin des professeurs Catholiques de l'Université, the future soldier of France. About the time of his second Communion his whole soul responded to the appeal of the Dominican under whom he made a retreat and his mother relates how he fell asleep nightly over the "Imitation of Christ." But his father was an enthusiastic Republican and this meant, to use Lotte's words, that he was "anti-clerical and anti-Roman." The boy's faith began to crumble and the last vestiges were demolished by the mocking disbelief of his professor of philosophy at the lycée of Cherbourg. At the College of Sainte-Barbe in Paris, although he continued to attend the services of the Church, he had ceased to receive the Sacraments, and after a time he discarded the outward appearances of belief.

It was at the Sainte-Barbe that he met Péguy, openly incroyant and yet President of the Conference of St. Vincent de Paul, and, more curious still, proposed for the office by Louis Baillet, fervent, foredestined, already under the spell of the Benedictine rule of peace. Gentle St. Vincent himself could scarcely have foreborne smiling at the spectacle of these young atheists carrying soup through the bitterly cold winter nights to the poor of the Quartier de la Glacière. The Lotte of those days would beguile his friends on these tournées with the rollicking songs of Breton sailors, with Baillet not the least charmed of his audience.

Lotte's failure to enter the Ecole Normale supérieure was followed by his year's military service, a period of teaching at the lycée of Nantes, a year of study at the University of Rennes and then his professorship successively at the College of Loudun, at the lycée of Roche-sur-Yon (1905), at that of Brest, and finally at Coutances, whither he went at his own request in 1910. He had married in 1898, and to gratify his wife had permitted the Baptism of his daughter Monique, but in 1905 he forbade that of his son. In his eyes at this time Baptism was an ancient custom, of little importance save as a step towards First Communion: et voilà ce qui est dangereux.

With Péguy he had flown to the side of Dreyfus, as knights responding to the "à moi!" of a comrade unhorsed in the melée, and religion, which to their minds meant anti-Semitism, intolerance and persecution, knew no quarter from their blades. But when Dreyfusism became a political issue it lost its hold upon their loyalty, always idealistic and aloof. Still it had been a good fight while it lasted, and though Dreyfus, the politician, had to be relinquished there was still the tragic memory of Dreyfus, the proscribed, and the gigantic figure of Bernard-Lazare, Péguy's portrait of whom is not unworthy to stand beside Carlyle's Mirabeau. It was the same with Socialism, and when they had parted with Jaurès, drawn into the political whirlpool, there was still Jaurès the poet to be remembered, Jaurès, who had "Polyeucte" by heart and the sonnets of Ronsard. There were still the fiery ensigns which these lost leaders had enkindled to be carried forward undimmed. Oddly enough, in the midst of Lotte's anarchistic beliefs there persisted a love for France and her army, and over the army of France there has always hovered the tradition of those who followed her kings, who were not seldom her saints, to the battlefields of God.

Mgr. Batiffol, who, as chaplain at Ste.-Barbe, had known both Péguy and Lotte in their student days, attributes their rescue from materialism to the philosophy of Bergson, but sorrow, wiser than all philosophers, was about to become the preceptor of Lotte's soul. With terrible swiftness, after an illness of one night, died his daughter Monique, and shortly afterwards, in the spring of 1907, his wife in a period of convalescence from typhoid fever, secured his consent to the Baptism of André, and a year later, after great suffering, which his love shared, she too died, but first she made her peace with God. The soul has its sanctuaries into which human eyes have no right to peer, and so we cannot analyze the emotions of a man confronted with the realization of how bitter a thing death is to them that have no hope. This lore, which was confirmed at the bedside of a sister who fell sick shortly thereafter, was saved from being barren knowledge by the lads who followed his course in morals at the lycée of Brest. He found himself obliged to answer their questions, compelled to give a reason and a cause, and one day to his stupefaction he found himself uttering the name of God. It was at this juncture that Péguy avowed himself a Christian and that Lotte made his memorable reply: "Ah, mon vieux, nous en sommes tous là!" Returning in the train from that interview Lotte stammered his first prayer in many years, and characteristically it was the Hail Mary.

It was a full year, however, before he took the final step. "The Church seemed so fearsome, afar off, and then the priests—the priests whom one had scorned." But he took the step, encouraged by the prayers and advice of a humble nun, and on Easter Sunday, 1910, the Lord Christ came into that heart where, "the doors being shut," He had already entered by His grace.

That Lotte was not merely swept by a new enthusiasm into new waters of folly is evident from a poignant passage in the Bulletin, in which he dwells on the trials of desolation which Thérèse of Lisieux experienced before her death. He is writing editorially:

> At last she understood, but we had understood even before she did, for we have known this keen torture, we have felt this darkness pressing upon our shoulders, this wall has risen stark before our eyes; we have heard these blasphemies and this mocking laughter, we have been tempted by this despair. But it was our just desert, the necessary crisis of our spiritual rebirth. Our soul, when it was recaptured by God, was sin-stained and unclean. Satan held all its approaches and possessed it as his own. He stirred up illusions within it as he would; we dared not utter a prayer without hearing beside us an outburst of mocking laughter; we could not draw near the Holy Table without feeling either that we were utter fools or that our sole presence in such a place at such a time was a sacrilege. When the wave of grace which has borne him to the foot of the altar has subsided, no one can imagine the loneliness, the destitution, the unwontedness, the dryness, the dejection of the converted Christian.

But no one could be more delightfully simple in his devotion than the converted Lotte. The little Breton whose livre de chevet was the "Imitation" awoke in him. He loved the Magnificat and the Salve Regina. He went daily to Mass and Communion in the chapel of the Soeurs de la Miséricorde at Coutances and he made frequent retreats. Once he went to the Benedictine monastery at Oosterhout, where Louis Baillet with his community was in exile. Baillet was dying, but surely there must have been laughter in that room where these two met in the peace of their souls and remembered the atheistic Vincentians of Sainte-Barbe and the ballads of Brittany. Lotte had great devotion to the Mass. "We are parishioners," he wrote, "who go to Mass and endeavor to follow it. Is not this the whole sum of piety, to hear Mass devoutly, and does not Christian perfection and the highest mysticism consist in conforming one's life to the Mass?"

It could scarcely be that so dauntless a champion would be a laggard in the defense of his recovered Faith, and so in December, 1910, he instituted the Bulletin des professeurs Catholiques de l'université. "The creation of a link of friendship, a mutual assistance of faith and prayer . . . for an increase of the ardor of our spiritual life, in order that the influence of our character and devotion may bear fruit in our pupils." Such were its objects. They were not very well received and there were other causes of complaint, notably Lotte's pervasive admiration of Péguy, which sometimes betrayed him into excess of praise; nevertheless the Bulletin had its public, if the name can be given to the necessarily restricted circle to which it was addressed. Lotte was founder, business manager, editor and chief contributor. It was quite outspokenly a periodical of apologetics, and many of Lotte's articles, although less rhapsodic than Péguy's Cahiers, are among the most remarkable manifestations of what M. Paul Sabatier is pleased to call "the present religious orientation of France." Perhaps Lotte's personal appeal and influence are not better exemplified than in the very pathetic letter addressed to him by an instructor who finds himself at the crisis through which Lotte has passed. There is something very like tenderness in his answer to him, and yet how categorically and emphatically he lays down the grounds for belief:

We believe, first of all, because we have not acted maliciously (n'avons pas fait le malin) towards God, and it has been enough for us to have perceived him at certain privileged moments of our life in order to acknowledge quite simply that He exists. We believe, secondly, because having experienced the existence of God we have understood with our heart as well as with our reason that He could not be indifferent to us, that He must necessarily love us, that we are His children, or else this world, this life and everything in it would be too horrible for endurance. We believe, thirdly, because having claimed this love as our due we have only to open our eyes to see in the birth, the life, the teaching and death of Jesus Christ the proof of so unutterable a love that there remains for man only one fitting attitude, that of perpetual thanksgiving. Fourthly, we believe because life according to Christ being impossible without Christ, His presence must necessarily be perpetuated amongst us and this is done in the Blessed Sacrament. Fifthly, we believe because in a world where everything is changing, this teaching could not subsist nor this presence be perpetuated except in an unchangeable institution; now it is well known that this institution is the Roman Church.

Lotte rejoined his regiment in September, 1914, and on December 27, as he was studying a map in the shelter of a wall, he fell, shot in the temple—a death on the field of honor, surely, and a becoming death for one who had always been a brave soldier and a generous foe.

A Rally for Christian Democracy

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

CHRISTIAN Democracy is the highest expression of social science illuminated by the light of faith. The name itself, as Pope Leo XIII was careful to explain, is not meant to convey any political significance. There is question solely of a democracy of social endeavor, a "popular action" for the common welfare in which all alike are to participate. It does not preclude the efficacy of the ballot, but rather supposes the full and intelligent Christian use of it as a powerful means for the promotion of social justice.

Christian Democracy is based upon the fundamental truth that society is a moral organism: a social body all the members of which are united for a common purpose, by a common bond of brotherhood, under the common fatherhood of God. "No one lives in a community for his personal advantage only," says Pope Leo XIII in his Encyclical on "Christian Democracy," cited throughout these pages; "he lives for the common good also." Each member is therefore to contribute his own share towards the welfare of the entire body, and that body, in turn, must reasonably provide for the welfare of its individual members. In every conflict between private and public interests the former must yield to the latter, since the common good is the supreme social law. This, however, does not imply the Socialistic abrogation of inviolable individual rights. It does not imply the negation of all private capital, but its proper restriction and regulation. Due precedence must, moreover, be given to all the interests of a higher order. Right reason demands that spiritual claims prevail over merely temporal considerations.

Christian Democracy is earnestly concerned for the welfare of all classes of society, yet it openly professes to devote itself primarily to the interests of the poor, since they, in particular, stand in need of its assistance. Its chief aim is thus expressed by the Sovereign Pontiff:

To make the conditions of those who toil more tolerable; to enable them to obtain, little by little, those means by which they may provide for the future; to help them to practise in public and in private the duties which morality and religion inculcate; to aid them to feel that they are not animals but men, not heathens but Christians, and so to enable them to strive more zealously and more eagerly for the one thing which is necessary: that ultimate good for which we are all born into this world. This is the intention; this is the work of those who wish that the people should be animated by Christian sentiments and should be protected from the contamination of Socialism which threatens them.

Christian Democracy, in a word, is not satisfied with a national prosperity, which may be based entirely upon the excessive wealth of a privileged class, but seeks to bring about a public prosperity in which all alike can share in due measure. It has no fatuous delusions about a Socialistic abolition of classes, but neither will it admit the denial, in practical life, of the brotherhood of men. Therefore it demands a mutual love and consideration and a just regard for the full dignity of every human being made to the likeness of God. It will bitterly fight the attempts of Socialism to interfere with the individual rights of citizens, whether capitalists or laborers, but it will no less fearlessly erect an adamantine wall of public opinion and civil law against the encroachments of liberalistic capitalism, based not upon individual right but upon individual privilege opposed to the common good.

There is one lesson, above all others, which it would bring home to the hearts of men, and this is that no social regeneration is possible in our century, or in any century, except by the aid of religion:

> It is the opinion of some, and the error is already very common, that the social question is merely an economic one, whereas in point of fact it is above all a moral and religious matter, and for that reason must be settled by the principles of morality and according to the dictates of religion. For even though wages are doubled and the hours of labor are shortened and food is cheapened, yet if the workingman hearkens to the doctrines that are taught on this subject, as he is prone to do, and is prompted by the examples set before him to throw off respect for God and to enter upon a life of immorality, his labors and his gain will avail him naught.

So likewise the additional profits of rationalistic capitalism, without regard for God and His Commandments, will be new millstones hung around its neck to sink it deeper into perdition. Nothing can ever still the unrest of a State in which godless labor is gathering its resources for a combat against equally godless capitalism. Neither will ever be satisfied; neither will ever say enough, whether there be question of wages on the one side or of profits on the other. The law of force alone restrains them, and when this dam is broken, nothing but the deluge can follow. Labor and capital will alike be involved in the common ruin. To save civilization from this impending catastrophe, Pope Leo XIII solemnly sent forth his warning to the world:

> The condition of things at present proclaims, and proclaims vehemently, that there is need for a union of brave minds with all the resources they can command. The harvest of misery is before our eyes, and the dreadful projects of the most disastrous national upheavals are threatening us from the growing power of the Socialistic movement.

Hence the imperative need of the Christian Democratic movement, equally opposed to Socialism on the one hand and to rationalistic capitalism on the other. While the former is distinguished from Socialism by the fact that it preserves inviolate all the true rights of property, it is no less sharply contrasted with unrestrained capitalism by its demand for a regulation and restriction of the power and privilege of private capital, wherever they are detrimental to the public welfare. In opposition to Socialism, Christian Democracy would preserve industrial freedom and economic initiative as the mainsprings of national prosperity, but in equal opposition to encroaching capitalism it would firmly set for it the bounds defined by the greater good of the entire people

Christian Democracy is the golden mean between the two destructive extremes of Socialistic and capitalistic excesses. It favors free cooperation and such a measure of municipal or government ownership of public-service utilities as can best contribute to the general advantage of all the citizens. Much of the success of Socialism comes from the use of Christian Democratic measures as stepping stones to its own pernicious ends. These measures, though deprived of their religious motives and often rendered unjust or revolutionary in their Socialistic application, still contain at least a remnant of Christian truth which is used as a bait for the unwary. Socialism, for this reason, has become more dangerous than ever. The time approaches when even the elect may be deceived.

No one, therefore, can fail to understand how important it is that the principles of Christian Democracy be firmly grasped by all Christians. It is no time for mere defensive warfare. Though combating Socialism on the one hand and liberalistic capitalism on the other, we must lift on high our own glorious standard. Aggressive action is required. The teachings of the Gospel and of the natural law must be firmly but carefully applied to all the great social and economic problems of the day. The guidance of the Church is more than ever necessary that men may not be misled by the utterly unwarranted interpretations given to the Scriptures by infidel Socialists. Hence the need of a clear, consistent, Christian Democratic movement which, by the cogency and moderation of its arguments, can unite all men of good-will.

While Christian Democracy relentlessly opposes the oppression of the poor, it likewise demands justice for the wealthier classes and seeks their cooperation no less than that of the laboring men. It is not, like Socialism or individualistic capitalism, a mere class system. Like the Church and the Gospel, on which it is founded, it is intended for all alike. There is no Christian who cannot and should not be a Christian Democrat. His Christian faith demands no less of him, if the Gospel of Christ is to have its practical application in his life.

Christian Democracy is not content with merely defending the just rights of the rich as well as of the poor, but it likewise recalls to both their sacred duties. While the latter may not transgress the laws of Christian morality, the former, too, are bidden to bear in mind that their responsibilities are in direct proportion to the greatness of the temporal benefits they have received. "We wish them to understand," says Pope Leo XIII, "that they are not at all free to look after or neglect those who happen to be beneath them, but that it is a strict duty which binds them."

Christian Democracy is the consummation of Christian charity no less than of social justice. It is the practical application of the Ten Commandments and of the twofold law of love which embraces them all. It seeks to provide for the souls of men while caring for their temporal welfare. It goes about in the spirit of Christ, with malice towards no man, with good-will for all, battling for justice and the reign of love in the hearts of all mankind.

National Teachers' Agency and the Editor

I.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

My attention has been called to an article in AMERICA, pages 86-87, of November 3 issue, in which you mention "vacancies today." Our records do not show that we have issued such a request, and our records are not of this sort at all. I advise you that the call from Lackawanna for a science teacher did not limit the candidate in matters of religion. I would like to know how you received the information you published. I inclose a printed statement of the vacancies issued last week that you may understand that we did not mention religion in any case.

Today a superintendent in central New York asks for a grade teacher and he demands that the candidate be a Catholic to suit local conditions. He also suggests that another teacher for another place be a Protestant, if possible. He has absolutely no prejudice, but is trying to serve the local social conditions. These things often happen and we keep ourselves within the limits of the requests received. So far as our general policy is concerned, I am not in sympathy with the narrowness that limits public school teachers in matters of religion. I have fought many fights in behalf of liberalizing conditions. I therefore assure you that your statement is unfair both to interests which you represent, to us, as well as to the Lackawanna superintendent.

Our letters to condidates are written as confidential information. Your publication of this information, which you must have received through a candidate, is not in harmony with the ethics of business, for the candidate signs a contract with us to protect the information and use it for himself only.

I have known Mr. Mathewson, the superintendent at Lackawanna, many years, and I know that he is not narrow in his religious belief. In fact, his wife is a Catholic while he is a Protestant. This is thorough evidence that he is not in sympathy with the condition you represent. I ask that you explain and change the impression, especially protecting Mr. Mathewson. You also should exonerate us. I await with interest your reply.

Respectfully,

Philadelphia. D. H. Cook.

P. S.—Upon serious thought I conclude that your organization would not be writing to Mr. Mathewson unless you had evidence of the case you mention. I no doubt wrote to some colleges soliciting candidates for the Lackawanna position. There is a chance that an error crept into our statement to the colleges. If so, I will be glad to explain fully to anyone, for I am interested to protect Mr. Mathewson, who is the innocent party, and ourselves, who have no desire to increase the prejudice but rather to decrease it in every possible way. D. H. C.

II.

Mr. D. H. Cook, National Teachers' Agency, 1530 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Dear Sir: I beg to acknowledge your letter under date of November 12. I regret that your records do not show that you sent out the circular under discussion. If kept even tolerably well they should show it, for your agency mailed such a document to the presidents of Eastern colleges. One of these gentlemen placed his copy of your communication in my hands. I in turn reproduced it verbatim in the columns of America. The enclosure reprint may refresh your memory. You ask me "to explain and change the impression, especially protecting Mr. Mathewson." In answer I protest that the task is quite beyond me. I cannot understand why your agency was guilty of the wholly unwarranted demand for Protestant teachers for public schools which are supported by the money of Catholics also. Moreover, it is your duty, not mine, to elucidate the problem. Yours it is also to protect Mr. Mathewson. Finally, in view of the circumstances, your request that I "exonerate" you, must be met by the advice that you exonerate yourself. I am, sir,

Very respectfully,

R. H. Tierney, Editor.

III.

To the Editor of America:

Your favor of November 14 received. Thanks for the inclosure. It is evident that an error crept into the information that was mailed to the colleges you mention. It is absolutely true to fact that Superintendent Mathewson of Lackawanna did not ask for a Protestant. Therefore, it is our error that the information was sent out with the suggestion that a Protestant only was to be considered. I have traced this to an error in our office work. It is not uncommon that we receive information from school authorities that they desire a teacher of a certain religion. It is nearly as true of Catholics as of any denomination of Protestants. This fact is traceable to the church conditions of the community where the teacher is wanted. I would not think it wise to publish the statements in any case, for, so far as I have discovered, the matter is the result of local conditions and is as thoroughly the opinion of one denomination as another. I have in many cases insisted with employers that they should employ members of other churches than those they suggest. In fact, I am and shall remain a friend of the teacher who respects all religions and does not make herself objectionable because of her own belief.

I have already told you that Mr. Mathewson is not in error. I have explained why. The mistake is ours rather than his. Your letter to me is not quite satisfactory, because my statement of the case relative to Mr. Mathewson is a statement of fact. The error that our office made is a clerical one and simply grew out of the condition that one or two of the places mentioned in our list preferred Protestants because of local conditions. I really think that the appointment at Lackawanna favored a member of the Catholic Church. I regret the error in the notice as sent to the colleges and I assure you that it does not represent my sentiments or wish in the matter of delivering teachers. I have no desire to discuss the problem except to make clear that we are not prejudiced and do not have any relation whatever to the very unhealthy movement carried on by societies opposed to the Catholic institutions. I shall be interested in the returns from Mr. Mathewson's communications, for I wrote him recently explaining the transaction. Respectfully,

Philadelphia. D. H. Cook.

[(1) The "printed statement" mentioned in the first letter above bears no resemblance to the circular letter criticised in America. The former consists of advertising matter, a questionnaire and a list of vacancies. The latter was a request to presidents of colleges that they supply Protestant teachers for eight public schools. (2) D. H. Cook bases his remarks about the ethics of business on a false assumption, as is clear from the second letter. Moreover, under the circumstances, he is hardly in a position to impart a lesson in ethics. (3) He attributes the occasion of his "error" in asking for Protestant teachers to the fact that one or two schools mentioned in the list sent out preferred Protestants. If but one or two schools preferred Protestants, why did he demand Protestants for the eight schools seeking teachers? Probably to emphasize his liberality towards Catholics. (4) The Editor of America regrets that Mr. Cook deceived himself into thinking that satisfaction was due him. No attempt was made to give him satisfaction. None was due him. (5) Neither Catholics nor Protestants have a right to make religion a test for a position in a public school and neither should be encouraged in the practice even for the sake of retaining patronage. Moreover, it has not yet been proved that Catholics are addicted to this un-American practice.—Ed. America.]

White Slavery

To the Editor of America:

I presume I am the preacher referred to by Mr. Connolly in his discussion in your pages. It is not quite exact to say that I "deplored the Houses of the Good Shepherd." I rather deplored the fact that such houses did not exist for male offenders. All admit theoretically a single standard for men and women. A sin is a sin whether committed by a suffragette or a Tammany Democrat. But in practice and everyday life a wide difference is accepted. The young blood who has sown his "wild oats," when he comes to marry will select and exact not a woman who has stepped aside from the straight path, but one without taint or blemish. The man whose past cannot bear scrutiny will scrutinize with lynx-eyes the past of the woman he chooses for his life-partner and will recoil from the suggestion of marrying a woman whose record was as bad as his own. Instances of a double standard in practice are of everyday occurrence.

Condemning, then, in the Cathedral, this double standard and the widespread impurity of men, I suggested that if male offenders were relegated to Houses of the Good Shepherd many of them would be checked in the path of self-indulgence, when what was meted out to their victims, more sinned against than sinning, was meted out to them with no stinting hand. Perhaps now that women have the vote they may be better able to protect themselves and punish their aggressors.

Poughkeepsie. THE PREACHER.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The following astounding statement in Miss Baxter's letter would be incredible had it not appeared in cold print:

What he (Mr. Connolly) complains of, very justly, too, it seems to me, is the clerical and lay apathy on the part of Catholics in the present widespread movements tending towards the protection of women and the social and moral betterment of the poor.

Every Catholic parish in the city is a "movement," established for years, for these very purposes; every Catholic school, every Catholic home is also just such a morally dynamic center. These are the true prophylactics against white and any other sort of slavery. It is of the very essence of Catholic life to protect men, women and children and make for the social, moral and spiritual betterment of both the poor and the rich. This is not a "movement tending," but an actual movement, accomplished. There are Catholics who need to study what is under their very noses.

The Cruger case has stirred up the muddy water for a nine days' sensation. The newspapers print huge headlines and various uplift activities are flaunted in the public eye. Catholics are not featured among them; ergo, Catholic apathy. Catholic charity work is so obvious that some Catholics overlook it, just as some people forget that daylight comes from the sun.

Let's be done with this ignorant criticism. Because some ladies in silks and satins motor into the slums "for the social and moral betterment of the poor," Catholics are apathetic to the improvement of the poor! Consult the Catholic Directory, page 152, giving the recapitulation of the Catholic activities, ecclesiastical, sociological and charitable, of the Archdiocese of New York, and give pause before criticising. Then visit the various institutions and organizations and see for yourself what they are actually doing. You will find there men and women by the hundreds who have given up the silks and satins, the comforts and the ambitions of life to go down among the poor and be the poor for the social and moral betterment of the poor. There is only one limit to this Catholic work and that is money. Zeal, courage, love, self-sacrifice are there in abundance. You who complain, because you do not see, if you yourselves fail in zeal, courage, love or self-sacrifice, at least aid with your alms to the extent of your means.

Religious Freedom and the Constitution

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Kindly allow me to thank your correspondent, S. L. B., of Covington, Ky., for correcting my confessed ignorance on a point of constitutional science, where I nursed the flattering but false impression, as it now appears, that the Federal Constitution expressly guaranteed the freedom of worship, within due bounds of public morality. I ought to have been better informed; but I was unconsciously trusting to a mere impression, possibly based on a confusion with "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness" in the Declaration of Independence. At all events, I had long carried about with me, as an axiom of religious liberty in the United States, the notion that the Federal Government protected certain primary rights of conscience from their iniquitous interdiction by the several States. Possibly, besides, instead of getting knowledge by review of the text of the Constitution, I suffered myself an ideal assumption equivalent to the postulate: The State can do no wrong!

The tyrannous contrary presumption, that Oklahoma, or any other American State, boasting of civilized enlightenment, not only can, but will, in a moment of blind bigotry, strangle a free-born rational soul in its absolute affairs between itself and the infinite Creator, outrages my first instincts and last faculties of right reason, my tenets of fundamental ethics, and my sense of just government.

New Orleans. WILLIAM PRICE.

The Bishop of Cork and the American Press

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The metropolitan papers have recently published a sensational report to the effect that the former German Ambassador at Washington requested the German Foreign Office to press the Holy See for the appointment of Dr. Cohalan as Bishop of Cork. In its last issue the Osservatore Romano, the semi-official organ of the Vatican, states definitely that no solicitations were addressed from Germany or Germans in regard to the selection of a bishop for the aforesaid See. It is clear then that either the Ambassador made no such request, or that the Foreign Office ignored it. At any rate, it is most unfortunate that the New York papers, which have fallen to a low plane indeed, should persistently try to discredit the Holy Father at a time when unity is so imperative for the welfare of the nation.

Help for Armenia

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of November 17, you "earnestly recommend" to your readers the "worthy charity" of the Armenian and Syrian Relief Committee. It would be impossible to overestimate the value of charitable assistance given to these unfortunate peoples of the East, provided it be given in the proper way; and you seem to take it for granted that the proper way is through the relief committee of which you speak in the following words: "The Armenian and Syrian Relief Committee is an organization inspired by true charity, which makes no distinction of creeds."

I do not know who compose this committee, or in what proportion its members are Catholics; but if it is true that it makes no distinction of creeds, why is it that the funds collected must be distributed exclusively by Protestant missionaries? My testimony might, perhaps, be open to question, if I relied merely upon my own experience of many years as a Catholic missionary in the East; but it is supported by the testimony of a Protestant minister. The Rev. William H. Hall, of the Protestant College at Beirut, recently returned from relief work in that district, and from his own words seems to be very anxious to assure Americans that Catholics have nothing to do with the distribution of funds collected by the Armenian and Syrian Committee. Writing in the New York Times, for October 22, 1917, he says: "The funds collected in this country by the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian relief are being disbursed through these American [Protestant] missionaries and teachers of the American [Protestant] college in Beirut." What he says of the funds destined for the Armenians and Syrians is true also of the other American contributions to charitable works in the East.

No wonder, then, that America is considered everywhere in the East a Protestant country; no wonder also that thousands of these starving Armenians and Syrians become Protestants, partly, it must be confessed, through Catholic contributions. To these poor and ignorant Christians of the East, Armenians, Syrians, Greeks and others, Protestantism points out the way of escaping starvation.

New York. GEORGE CALAVASSY,
Missionary Apostolic.

[The Armenian and Syrian Relief Committee has given assurance that money will be distributed through Catholic mediums also. Catholics who prefer another depositary can easily send their gifts to the Holy Father.—ED. AMERICA.]

Some Irish, Old and New

LIKE all Irish priests, the late Canon Sheehan was deeply interested in the Church in the United States. Fully appreciating her strong vitality, manifested particularly in works of education and charity, the Canon was by no means blind to the fact that, because of worldly prosperity, some were falling away from the Faith of their Irish ancestors, and losing their "attachment to the Church which they had helped to build up." In his exceedingly interesting volume, "Canon Sheehan of Doneraile," just published by Longmans, Father H. J. Heuser records how in conversation, the Canon expressed his fear that many "children of the Saints" were setting up new gods:

> The wealthy Irish-American is raising a generation that learns not merely to forget the old land of their fathers, but to become ashamed of it; to imitate the manners and fashions, and last of all, the vices and infidelity of a great body of Americans who recognize no definite faith, and who make civic virtue their sole religion, secular training their sole education, and worldly success the standard of all their attainments.

The words sting, but they are true, every one of them, and there is scarcely a large city in the United States in which they have not been verified, to the scandal of all decent non-Catholics and the eternal ruin of many souls. What some call "the Irish," by which they mean the second and third generation of Irish emigrants, are probably the only people in this mixed United States among whom are found, in notable numbers, individuals ashamed of the stock from which they have sprung. The descendants of English, German, French, Italian, Polish, and Hungarian settlers, all confess to a certain love for the home of their ancestors. Only the "prominent" Irish are ashamed of martyred Ireland, a nation that has nobly suffered far beyond all others in the high and holy cause of love of country and love of God.

When men fall to that depth of degradation, they have fallen beneath all contempt. The grandson of the hardy peasant, type of a faith undaunted after centuries of persecution, dances attendance upon an unclean crew of sneering money-grubbers, who despise him for his craven spirit, while they use him as a pliant tool. His sister, separated in time by a brief span of years, has nothing in common with the old Irish grandmother, one of a congregation, as Dooley writes, that heard Mass devoutly with their prayer-books upside down, because in her day in Ireland the price of an education was denial of the Faith. Granddaughter has what some consider an "education"; her Faith is of the dead kind that knows nothing of good works. Her brother, graduate of non-Catholic schools and mephitic drawing-rooms, might be a heretic, if he had enough religion left in him to make a respectable heresy. As it is, he is only an uninteresting apostate.

What changes has time wrought! Seventy-five years ago, the Irish in this country built the roads, dug the trenches, filled the churches, blessed God when the little girl went off to the convent, and wondered why God was so good to them when the boy was called to the altar. Today an uncomfortable percentage of their descendants are doing none of these things. The Irish of those times were poor and ignorant and Catholic, and when the last moment came, they went to God confident that while their sins were great and their merits small, His mercy was infinite. Their modern representatives are wealthy, ignorant, too, but not Catholic, to any noticeable extent; and when their last moment comes, our best hopes are founded on the widest extension of the Church's merciful teaching on invincible ignorance. And the reason? These degenerate descendants from noble sires have made "civic virtue their sole religion, secular training their sole education, and worldly success the standard of all their attainments." They are not many, happily, and for this the country may be thankful. Few perils are so pernicious as Irishmen warped out of their Faith, ashamed of the loyal fighting race that for centuries has done battle for all the things that are true and good in every clime of the earth.

Exeunt the "Godmothers"

"HOW could I?" asked the Oxford man, reproached for not going to the assistance of a fellow-student, struggling in the water. "Why, we had never been introduced!" The bearing of this legend lies in the application. Necessity rightly does away with convention; but when no need exists, it is not wise to throw convention aside to make one. It is probably true that our soldiers in camp and abroad are yearning for letters from the old home town, and also probably true that their friends and relatives, aware of the yearning, are doing what they can to assuage it. But in no case is it either necessary or proper for our American women to write to soldiers of whom they know absolutely nothing.

The custom seems to have become widespread within the last year. The motive of the writers is, no doubt, above suspicion, but the dangers of the practice are obvious. Very wisely, therefore, has the Committee on Public Information announced its disapproval.

Neither the War Department nor the Woman's Committee of the Council of National Defense is furnishing the names of soldiers for "godmothering." While the War Department appreciates the spirit in which the women are offering to write to soldiers at the front, the experiences of France and England have proved that the plan ultimately works more harm than good. General Sibert has recently issued a statement from France to this effect, showing his marked disapproval of the idea. We receive so many letters asking for the names of soldiers, that a statement should be made through the press that we are not endorsing the plan.

Mr. Toots used to write letters to himself, and Micawber won fame by writing to all sorts of persons, but both individuals were well acquainted with the favored ones to whom their epistles were indited. Our quondam "godmothers" can do no better than follow their example in writing and writing often, but always with complete regard for the safeguards which are quite as necessary in time of war as in time of peace.

Our New Voters.

IN spite of the almost unanimous support of the press, the constitutional amendment for woman suffrage was adopted by the State of New York on November 6 by a decisive majority. In thirteen States women now enjoy complete suffrage; in nineteen, they may vote for president; in New York, the first of the Eastern States to eliminate the sex requirement, they may vote, not only for president of the United States, but for all elective officers, local and national. There are 3,060,848 women, twenty-one years of age and over, in New York; how many meet the suffrage requirements has not been definitely ascertained. But it is probable that the voting population has been increased by nearly 2,000,000.

To question an accomplished fact is a waste of time. Before the last election opinions on the fitness and expediency of votes for women varied; of these opinions, one set now possesses little more than academic interest. What now remains is to urge upon our new voters the duty of using their privilege, and of using it wisely. If the action of the people on November 6 has only added to an idle and unthinking electorate, a great step has been taken towards the downfall of genuinely popular government. There is no reason, however, to hold this pessimistic view for granted. To argue that the vote is the panacea for the evils which afflict society is folly; but if the women of New York prepare themselves to exercise the franchise with discrimination, the social and economic reforms which many have attached to this extension of the electorate, may be brought appreciably nearer. It would be the merest pretense to claim that this Review, while scoring "feminism," held anything but a neutral attitude on the question decided on November 6; but now that the people have spoken, it finds itself in complete accord with the New York Woman Suffrage Party in the resolutions:

> We should not at this convention endorse any principle, party or individual, or commit ourselves to parties or partisan measures, before we have had ample time to study conditions and problems of government which are new to us.
> We should inform ourselves of the various problems of government in order to use our new power of citizenship to the greatest advantage of State and nation.

This is an excellent beginning, full of promise for the future. If not the greatest, the franchise is among the greatest privileges of an American citizen. Privileges, like rights, imply duties. If States and cities have been scourged by bad government, it is largely because citizens, otherwise "good," have been deplorably negligent in the performance of a prime civic duty; the duty of voting with wisdom and regularity.

The Knights of Columbus

ONLY those who have visited the military camps have any conception of the work which is being done by the Knights of Columbus. In many instances the recreation halls have already been completed and turned over to the authorities. Such has been the case in Camp Greene, Charlotte, North Carolina; in Camp Wadsworth, Spartanburg, South Carolina; and in Camp Doniphan, Fort Sill, Oklahoma. These are only a few of the more recent solemn dedications of buildings which have been honored by the presence of the bishop of the diocese in which they are situated. Similar work is being pushed both at home and abroad; and it may be confidently expected that not only in the course of their training but also while in the trenches and during the period of their convalescence, our Catholic soldiers will be given every possible spiritual and material assistance.

There is, however, a danger in recording this success, for it is apt to lead to the impression, to the delusion, which, deliberately fostered, might easily become a shabby cloak for slothful indifference, that efforts on the part of individuals, not members of the organization, to further the work would be something of an intrusion. Now that the President has put into the hands of the Knights of Columbus the care of Catholic soldiers, petty rivalries would indeed be utterly out of place; but where competition is to be deprecated, cooperation is much to be desired. If the work is to be well done, generous assistance will be needed.

The construction of the recreation halls is only a beginning, their maintenance and the other activities of the Knights will be an increasingly large drain on the resources of the organization. Even the Y. M. C. A., with its great wealth and its perfect system, found it necessary to appeal to the charity of the country. The needs of the Knights of Columbus are almost as great, and as they are the official appointees of the Government for the administration of work for Catholic soldiers, it stands to reason that they, too, will require large contributions, and that the bulk of Catholic charity should be given to them.

Every Catholic in the country should take this matter to heart. Mere pride should make us anxious that the work of the Knights be accomplished in a manner worthy of the Church. We cannot afford to have their hands tied by lack of funds. Besides, it is an object of pure zeal. In France the Knights of Columbus and Catholics in general have been held up to public admiration for the generosity with which they have taken up the interests of the Faith. We must live up to our reputation. When our Catholic boys are so prodigal of their blood, we cannot be niggardly with our gold.

Readers and Reading Today

MEN of common-sense agree that it is better to read a good book than to write a poor one. It is better, too, say reputable publishers, to sell an old book that is worth reading than to bring out a new one that is trash. These two principles, it is gratifying to observe, seem to be governing the American book-world this year. Our entrance into the war has made us serious-minded and has deepened and broadened our intellectual interests. For publishers report a marked falling-off in the demand for light and frothy fiction and for problem-novels; that books bearing on the war are now among the best-sellers; that there is a constantly increasing call for good poetry; that books dealing with spiritual things are being widely read; and that the "sales of the great old books of the world" keep steadily growing.

As the character of a man's reading of course determines to a large extent his habit of thought, this remarkable change that has come over the American people's taste in literature can hardly fail to promote the strengthening of moral fiber that is so necessary for the successful prosecution of the war. For if there is now little demand for immoral or worthless novels, their authors, after haunting in vain the offices of publishers, will probably either cease writing altogether or will produce something worth reading, and their former patrons, feeling the need, in these trying times, of mind-food that really nourishes, may perhaps be tempted to open some literary masterpiece they once admired and even to become actually interested in some work that is a book indeed.

After all, they are not so very numerous, these real books. For a French investigator reports that though books have now been made for some 3,000 years, the works of only 500 authors are still read. Out of 50,000 works brought out during the seventeenth century, he computes that hardly 50 are republished today; out of every 1,000 books published throughout the world 600 do not pay the cost of printing and only 100 can be said to profit the producers much, and, sadder still, out of those 1,000 books, as many as 650 are forgotten at the end of a year and only 10 are heard of twenty years later.

So if future historians can number among the minor blessings that followed America's entrance into the war the remarkable fact that those who formerly wrote worthless books and wheedled publishers into bringing them out, suddenly abandoned their typewriters and occupied themselves with something useful instead, and that the "general reader" quite as unexpectedly began to take down from his library shelves long-unopened literary masterpieces and to read them eagerly, we shall have additional reasons, when peace comes at last, for grateful rejoicing.

"Comfort Kits" for Profiteers

LAST spring a group of altruistic New York patriots met and decided that nothing would sooner bring the war to a victorious end than brightening our fighters' lives by furnishing every American soldier with a "comfort kit" containing pipes, tobacco, toilet articles, etc. Considerable money, it was wisely foreseen, would be required to bring the project to a happy issue, but it was confidently hoped that if an "Army and Navy Bazaar," of which the executive board was to receive "no salary, profit, percentage or remuneration," were held this fall, the public would respond generously and every American soldier in France would joyfully receive his comfort kit by Christmas. Accordingly the bazaar was held and its gross receipts came to the neat sum of $71,475.93, which meant, the confiding public perhaps inferred, that some 70,000 of our brave boys at the front would early be gladdened by a present of a one-dollar comfort kit. Unfortunately, however, owing to the fact that the bazaar realized exactly $756.96 over and above "expenses," only 700 of our soldiers, not 70,000, will receive that highly desirable gift. "But what became of the other $70,718.97 of the gross receipts?" the interested public inquired. "It was used to pay bazaar-workers' salaries and commissions, rent, newspaper-advertising, decorations, etc.," an honest auditor answered. A large portion of the $70,718.97, it transpired, was used to provide with a new variety of "comfort kits," not the soldiers, but the bazaar's promoters. The managing director, for instance, was forced to solace himself with a comfort kit of only $756.96, for he would have received one of $7,500 if the bazaar had been better managed. The chief beneficiary of the affair, however, appears to be the promoter of a "souvenir program" which brought him an exceedingly comfortable kit of $24,000, all clear gain. The District Attorney is now investigating the bazaar, indictments are in order, and the scandal has aroused the public's just indignation.

The lessons taught by this sordid affair are so clear and striking that they cannot well be missed. First of all, unscrupulous and irresponsible people should not be permitted to exploit in the sacred name of patriotism the generous and confiding public. With a view to preventing such abuses, the promoters of charity bazaars and the like, and all too, who collect for them, should be forced to provide themselves with State or Federal licenses. Secondly, relief-work of all kinds should be so systematized and coordinated that with the least possible expense and red tape the sum realized may reach the quarters it is meant to benefit, and the transactions of the charity's promoters should always be open to official inspection. Finally be it noted, that it is not Catholic charities that are involved in scandals like those that have brought discredit on the promoters of the Army and Navy Bazaar. The books of all Catholic public charities can always be examined by those who have a right to do so, and the money our institutions receive is not spent to provide comfort kits for profiteers, or to pay high-salaried officials, but every dollar of it is conscientiously used in direct relief-work.

Literature

WILFRID WARD'S LIFE-WORK

WILFRID WARD and his life-work must be viewed from many angles. It is certain that by his death the English-speaking Catholic world was bereft not only of its greatest apologist since Wiseman and Newman, but, besides, of an eminent editor, essayist, biographer, historian and philosopher. To get any adequate idea of the man, then, it will be necessary to study him under these several and vari-colored aspects, and then fuse them into the white light of a single impression.

The most important and enduring of his tasks is undoubtedly that which he accomplished as the historian of the origin and progress, the problems and personalities, of the Catholic revival in England during the last century. To this work he devoted his best years, and by its products, the lives of his father, of Cardinals Newman and Manning, of Aubrey de Vere, together with the corporate life of the Oxford movement, he will be chiefly remembered. These masterly lives are entirely free from the modern over-emphasis on "objective history." Not that he obscures or conceals facts or traits of character that are calculated to lower our opinion of great laymen or churchmen, but he refuses to narrate with the passionless candor of the purely objective historian the glorious events of the Catholic revival. He indulges in a laudable and enthusiastic pride for the great work done by Catholics since many of the learned men of Europe began to return to the Church, and science, sacred and secular, again began to blossom within her precincts. Besides, where the merely objective historian calmly paints only the face of the facts, Ward searches for master-ideas and motives, for the hidden sources of character. He cares for no fact merely as a phenomenon, but only because it is the counterpart in the outer world, of ideas energizing in the minds of men. He is a psychological, rather than an ontological historian. And thus he is a greater realist than those who are content with the outer shell of the facts, for the creative ideas of men are in a sense more real than the facts, since they are prior to the facts and cause them.

But to say that Ward is a psychological historian is the same as calling him a biographer. In fact, his biographical gifts are greater than his historical, which he cultivated as subsidiary to his treatment of character. We feel after reading the biographies mentioned above, that we have known the men in real life, instead of having the impression of an assemblage of moral and intellectual traits in a card-catalogue. Even after reading the shorter essays he wrote on such men as Huxley, Tennyson, Mill, Hutton and others with whom he was intimate, we carry away a more real and unified impression than certain ambitious lives of the same men would give us. Chesterton, in his striking way, sums up this biographical talent as follows: "Wilfrid Ward was a biographer in a sense as exact and more exalted than we apply to a biologist. He really dealt with life and the springs of life."

Closely connected with his biography of individuals was his biography of corporations. As an editor he kept in touch with and delineated the lives of corporate bodies, of the Church and the world, of the forces of belief and unbelief, of nations and constitutions, of philosophies and currents of thought circulating through the modern world. His editorial forum was the clearing-house where Catholic scholars brought their views and discussed the developments of modern science and criticism in relation to their bearing on the Church. The Dublin Review attained under his editorship the greatest splendor in its long life of three-quarters of a century, and this is a great distinction when we consider that O'Connell, Cardinal Wiseman, W. G. Ward and similar writers were contributors to it during the Victorian age.

Besides the historian, biographer and editor, we must recognize in him the apologist. In this character he appears before us as the heir to and the developer of Cardinal Newman's philosophy, especially that portion of it outlined in the "Essay on Development." Philosopher and apologist blend together inseparably in Wilfrid Ward. As a philosopher then, he produced several constructive volumes, "Witnesses to the Unseen," "The Will to Believe," "Problems and Persons," and "Men and Matters." Apropos of his habits of thought Chesterton says:

> Thinking was to him like breathing. He never left off doing it, and he never thought himself remarkable for doing it. He had the same relish for reason that his father had. But like the men of his father's generation he was somehow never touched with that dehumanizing rationality which can in our time turn the intellectually consistent into cranks. For him, unlike so many writers of today, mental gymnastics were, like bodily, meant to balance a man and not to break his neck. Logic was one of the manly sports.

Wilfrid Ward, like every man who ventures beyond the philosophical paling of conservatism, reaped such undeserved epithets as "Modernist" and "liberalist." Especially did he receive such compliments from Catholic philosophers who were more concerned about what the oracles of antiquity had said than about the reasons why they had said it. These men could not see that a doctrine could be held intact today, even if the arguments that had once sufficed to defend it were antiquated and newer ones were substituted. But Ward's loyal Catholicism is proved by the fact of his taking a course of scholastic philosophy in Rome, while the Modernists either never knew their heritage of Catholic philosophy or early rejected it for Kantism. Besides this grounding in the traditional thought of the Church, he had the benefit of personal intercourse with Cardinal Newman, who gave him valuable hints on how to bring the old truths within the reach of the modern mind.

As a matter of fact, far from being "liberal" in an invidious sense, Ward's motto in the matter of philosophy was substantially that laid down by Leo XIII in his Encyclical on the restoration of Thomistic philosophy, "Vetera novis augere." Just as the Summa of Aquinas had taken stock of and criticized the vast heritage of patristic philosophy, rejected the false, assimilated the true and welded it together in a synthesis with the newer Aristotelic philosophy, so Wilfrid Ward insisted that the time was ripe for a revision of scholasticism in the light of the science of today. It was surely no more radical a plan in our century than the plan of Aquinas in the thirteenth. But the radical conservatives liked him no more than their medieval prototypes liked Aquinas. These over-conservatives are thus described in a certain passage in which, comparing the structure of Catholic thought to a cathedral built in ages past and now falling to ruin, he says: "There are two classes of enemies to true conservatism, those who would pull it down, and those who would leave it untouched, without the conditions which render it habitable in the present." Ward stood for judicious repairs. And when the Encyclical against Modernism came out his true conservatism was vindicated. He was for revising scholasticism; the Modernists were for repudiating it in favor of Kantism. In every respect this condemnation of radicalism is philosophy was an apology for Ward, for while it gave him an opportunity of showing what real conservatism is, it showed that he put his Catholic Faith above intellectual eminence in all the different departments in which he excelled.

TO A CHILD

I know you are too dear to stay,
You are so exquisitely sweet;
My lonely house will thrill some day
To echoes of your eager feet.

I hold your words within my heart,
So few, so infinitely dear;
Watching your fluttering hands I start
At the corroding touch of fear.

A faint, unearthly music rings
From you to heaven—it is not far!
A mist about your beauty clings
Like a thin cloud before a star.

My heart shall keep the child I knew,
When you are really gone from me,
And spend its life remembering you
As shells remember the lost sea.

REVIEWS

A Short History of England. By G. K. CHESTERTON. New York: John Lane Co. $1.50.

When those who read Mr. Chesterton's "The Crimes of England" heard that he had begun to write a history of his country, they were able to forecast with considerable accuracy what the character of the work would be. All who are familiar with this brilliant author's addiction to paradox, his skill in turning an unforgettable phrase, his love and admiration for nearly everything medieval, his wholesome hatred of Puritanism, and his uncompromising attitude toward capitalism and the "Servile State" will find this "Short History of England" a thoroughly Chestertonian work. Each of the eighteen chapters in the volume is an essay on the character of important epochs as the author views them. The book is anything but a "chronicle-and-comment" history or a "trumpet-and-drum" narrative. He complains that the so-called "popular" histories of England have been written against the people, so he is determined to produce one "from the standpoint of a member of the public." As was to be expected, Catholic readers will find the volume well stocked with "strong points." Here are some of them:

> The Church . . . . worked of her own nature toward greater social equality; and it is a historical error to suppose that the Church hierarchy worked with aristocracies or was of a kind with them. . . . Ireland was not converted but created by Christianity, as a stone church is created; and all its elements were gathered as under a garment, under the genius of St. Patrick. . . . Ireland was never Roman and it was always Romanist. . . .
> It is not merely flippant to say that monks and nuns stood to mankind as a sort of sanctified league of aunts and uncles. It is a commonplace that they did everything that nobody else would do; that the abbeys kept the world's diary, faced the plagues of all flesh, taught the first technical arts, preserved the pagan literature, and above all, by a perpetual patch-work of charity, kept the poor from the most distant sight of their modern despair. We still find it necessary to have a reserve of philanthropists, but we trust it to men who have made themselves rich, not to men who have made themselves poor. Finally the abbots and abbesses were elective. They introduced representative government, unknown to ancient democracy, and in itself a semi-sacramental idea. . . .
> It is admitted that the conscious and active emancipators [of slaves in the Middle Ages] everywhere were the parish priests and the religious brotherhoods; but no name among them has survived and no man of them has reaped his reward in this world. Countless Clarksons and innumerable Wilberforces, without political machinery or public fame, worked at death-beds and confessionals in all the villages of Europe; and the vast system of slavery vanished . . . . The Catholic type of Christianity was not merely an element, it was a climate; and in that climate the slave would not grow.

Before finishing the book readers can learn from Mr. Chesterton with what disastrous results, for example, the plunder of the gilds, which followed the pillage of the monasteries, was attended; how Henry VIII "sought to lean upon the cushions of Leo and found he had struck his arm upon the rock of Peter"; wherein Elizabeth's policy differed from Mary Tudor's; and just what the character of "The Age of the Puritans" was. There is also an excellent analysis of the eighteenth-century statesmen's attitude toward republics, striking reflections on Marlborough's perfidity, and many another brilliant page besides.

The Martyr of Futuna; Blessed Peter Chanel of the Society of Mary. Prepared from the French by FLORENCE GILMORE. Ossining, New York: Catholic Foreign Mission Society. $1.00.

Another valuable addition to the Catholic Foreign Mission Society's growing list of publications. Coming at a time when nations and individuals alike in their mad rush for supremacy keep the sword raised till a new bit of territory be added, such a reminder of the peaceful methods used by the Great Ruler of mankind in the conquest of the world and its prince is no less refreshing than inspiring. The subject of this history is only another of those who, leaving home and relatives and friends, labored among far-off savages to win to God the kingdom of men's souls. Miss Gilmore's translation is well done.

The Society of Mary of Lyons, more commonly known as the Marist Fathers, grew out of an idea originating in the seminary of Sainte Irénée. To Ven. Jean Claude Mary Colin is due the later development of this project, and in 1836 Pope Gregory XVI approved the Society of Mary, entrusting to it the missions of Oceanica. Among the first companions of Father Colin was Blessed Peter Chanel, parish-priest, teacher, missionary, martyr. Born at Cuet, a little village in the eastern part of France, on July 12, 1803, Blessed Peter early grew to know and love Mary, the Mother of God, towards whom throughout life he cherished a tender devotion; to her he prayed that his desire for the missions might be fulfilled, dedicated to her his every undertaking, consecrated to her his life. His early years were spent as shepherd of his father's flocks, a presage of his later life-work, when he was to gather into the fold of Christ the souls of his "little savages." A kind teacher, a zealous parish-priest, and a prudent superior, he won the esteem of all; his departure for the missions in 1836 occasioned the sincerest regrets. His work among the natives of Futuna covered the short period of three years and a few months, still his endurance of hardships of all kinds, his universal charity, and his joy at the thought of dying for Christ, were the marks of a true apostle. Although our martyr's days were cut short before he could behold the fruits of his toil, it cannot be said of him that he fretted his hour on life's stage and then was heard no more, for the closing chapter, "Martyrdom-Conversion of the Island," once more assures us that the martyr's blood is the seed of Christians. A copy of this book in the hands of those interested in the missions may mean an increased number of vocations; the fields are still white with the harvest and the laborers few. Catholic libraries, especially, should not fail to procure the life-story of this nineteenth-century martyr. J. H. C.

Love Songs. By SARA TEASDALE. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

This collection of Mrs. Filsinger's sweet and pure little "Love Songs" is very refreshing reading nowadays when so many versifiers of her sex sing for the most part of "modernity," passion and eroticism. She has here built herself a "house of shining words" and musical which will delight all lovers of lyric poetry. The author is a keen discerner of beauty and knows how to barter for it profitably. For she sings:

Life has loveliness to sell,
All beautiful and splendid things,
Blue waves whitened on a cliff,
Soaring fire that sways and sings,
And children's faces looking up
Holding wonder like a cup.

There is a world of truth and meaning in such dainty lyrics as "The Look," "Gifts" and "Wisdom," and the following poems entitled respectively "Faults" and "Riches" are excellent examples of "Sara Teasdale's" manner:

They came to tell your faults to me,
They named them over one by one;
I laughed aloud when they were done,
I knew them all so well before—
Oh, they were blind, too blind to see
Your faults had made me love you more.

I have no riches but my thoughts,
Yet these are wealth enough for me;
My thoughts of you are golden coins
Stamped in the mint of memory;
And I must spend them all in song,
For thoughts, as well as gold, must be Left on the hither side of death
To gain their immortality.

The thoughts melodiously expressed in such poems as "Mastery" and "Lessons" are hardly Christian, however, and from other lyrics in the volume it would appear that the author does not believe that her soul is to live forever. But nearly all the "Love Songs," strictly so-called, are so sincere and fragrant that many of them will doubtless be set to music. The volume makes a dainty gift-book. W. D.

William Dean Howells. A Study of the Achievements of a Literary Artist. By ALEXANDER HARVEY. New York: B. W. Huebsch. $1.50.

The reader should first peruse the index of this volume, for it is interesting and startling. If somewhat flippant in tone it is decidedly picturesque. It is probably one of the few indexes in which the horrors of the text are relieved, or perhaps rather intensified by an illustration. Here it is the picture of Emily, the lady of the famed Castle of Udolpho, under the spell of one of those preternatural visitations which haunted the mysterious tower, and which Mrs. Radcliffe "played up" so successfully. And if the reader turns to such words as "Aztec," "Lucullus," "Mississippi," he will find something to enlighten him on the way in which indexes should be made.

But the index, smart as it may be, leaves the impression that the author is not always serious. Even when he is trying to analyze the craftsmanship of Mr. Howells, an unpleasant vein of sarcasm slips into his work. His analysis of the American novelist is keen, and at times approaches brilliancy. He is outspoken in his literary criticisms and is a sturdy champion of the literary emancipation of our American authors from too subservient a thraldom to British standards, models and verdicts though he unnecessarily repeats his protest. He has judgments of his own, and though many must disagree with him when he says that "From the standpoint of literature regarded as a fine art, 'The Rise of Silas Lapham' is the finest novel ever written," or that the coffee-pot episode in "April Hopes" is the most humorous thing in fiction, we like such frankness. The reviewer also thoroughly agrees with Mr. Harvey when he states that Captain Marryat never wrote a story of the sea that can compare with our American Melville's "Moby Dick," the "Epic of the White Whale." We add that the American boy who has not read that splendid yarn has missed a real "thriller." The final judgment of our critic on the powers and the limitations of Howells seems to be correct. According to Mr. Harvey, the author of "A Modern Instance," "Doctor Breen's Practice," "A Hazard of New Fortunes" is a great literary artist, an interesting story-teller, who can be dramatic but never descends to cheap theatricals and is classic in style and manner. Howells is a "reporter, a reporter of genius . . . a humorist of the rarest gifts, an artist with words, but still a reporter." He deals with what can be seen, handled and touched. But he does not descend into the inner recesses of the soul, does not probe its secrets. There is surface to his work, but that work has little depth. In one passage of the volume Mr. Harvey couples the name of Our Lord with that of Byron's most disreputable hero. This juxtaposition cannot but prove offensive to all sincere Christians. J. C. R.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The second series (Catholic) "Sermon Notes" (Longmans, $1.25), by the late Mgr. Benson, edited by his biographer, Father Martindale, is made up of a course of twelve sermons "On the Will," which were preached in Kensington during the Lent of 1907, four discourses on "The Way, the Truth and the Life," four on "Miracles of Christ," five on "Characteristics of the Christian Religion," some "Kikuyu Sermons" and various odds and ends. The editor remarks that the sermons on the will are occasionally open to a Modernistic interpretation, and he has indicated these danger-points by inserting asterisks. "The necessary ecclesiastical permission for publication," he says, "was secured under that condition." But the book has no imprimatur.

The friends of Anne Shirley, Miss L. M. Montgomery's amiable heroine, will be interested to learn from the author's latest story, "Anne's House of Dreams" (Stokes, $1.40), how Dr. Blythe's newly-wedded wife comes to Four Winds to live, meets there the beautiful Leslie Moore, whose somber days she helps to brighten for good, receives valuable advice from the sharp-tongued Miss Cornelia on the management of men-folk, and sees Captain Jim, the light-house keeper, safely across the bar. A pleasant story pleasantly told.——In "His Last Bow" (Doran, $1.35), by A. Conan Doyle, the phœnix-like Sherlock Holmes arises from the ashes of an obscurity some part of which was spent, oddly enough, in Chicago. While the great detective has lost none of the cunning so envied by Scotland

Yard, he has acquired, for professional purposes only, a strange dialect which he excuses on the ground that it is the current English of the Western metropolis. "Brother Mycroft," figuring in one of the tales, scarcely lives up to his reputation for astuteness, but Sherlock is as cunning as of yore and Dr. Watson exhibits to perfection all his pristine good-nature. Sherlock, as the moralist will note with satisfaction, seems to have overcome his bad habit of using drugs to stimulate his imagination.——"Our Square and the People in It" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.50), by Samuel Hopkins Adams, is a delightful little volume of stories about life in New York. Fiction indeed are these tales, and highly imaginary, for it is too much to hope that in this great wilderness there are communities in which men and women display so neighborly a spirit as Mr. Adams finds in "Our Square."

The November Month opens with a paper on "The Luther Centenary," by Father Sidney F. Smith, which is an admirable appraisal of the heresiarch's life and work. In "The Two Nations," namely, the rich and the poor of England, Father Keating points a dark picture of how labor was exploited during the later eighteenth century. W. M. Letts contributes an excellent war-hospital story; Father Pollen continues tracing the career of Simon Hunt, the schoolmaster of Shakespeare, who died a Jesuit priest; there are some trenchant editorials on the ethics of reprisals and the following prayerful sonnet by H. W. Bliss could well be recited by all who are now making the novena to "Regina Pacis":

Queen of the peace that breathed at Nazareth,—
Source of all mothers' and all children's love,—
Queen Mother of the Prince of Peace; above
Thou reign'st in peace with Him! Let then the breath
Of mothers mourning for their dear sons' death,
As thou didst weep for His, thy kind heart move,
Let mothers' lips again their children's prove;—
For thou had'st Jesus' lips at Nazareth!

When, with His blood and tears, on Olivet—
Mother of God! the shuddering earth was wet,
Were they,—or thine on Calvary,—in vain?
Nay, by that pain ineffable came peace!
Bid, Mother, bid thy Son bid wars to cease:
Pain gave thee peace;—Oh! give us peace through pain.

Here are some recent pamphlets that deserve mention: "Que Serai-Je? Une Causerie avec les Jeunes" (Frères du Sacré-Coeur, 684 rue Fulham, Montreal), is the title of the French translation of Father Cassilly's valuable pamphlet, "What Shall I Be?" 50,000 copies of which have been sold by the America Press. A Spanish edition of this booklet has now been out a year, and a Polish translation is soon to be published.——The two Central Verein pamphlets for our Catholic soldiers, "Guide Right" and "God's Armor," have been widely distributed in the camps and at the front. A second series, entitled "Who Goes There?" is now being issued by the Central Bureau of the Central Verein at St. Louis. The first of these new soldier booklets, "Thrift" ($0.05), by P. G. R., brings home in plain and convincing words the need of the virtue of thrift in the soldier's life. It will help to preserve him from many vices, strengthen his character and aid him to provide for those dependent upon him.——"What Martin Luther Said and Did" (The Catholic Leaflet, Grand Rapids, Mich., $0.05), consists mainly of a compilation of passages from Luther's writings showing the nature and effect of his doctrines. Other leaflets from the same press are: "How and Where We Got the Bible," "The True Church Must Date Back to the Time of Christ," "Why the Church Has a Pope," "The Catholic Doctrine on Purgatory."——The first of next year's almanacs to reach us is the "Almanac of the Sacred Heart" (Apostleship of Prayer, New York, $0.12), which contains, besides numerous illustrations in color, the usual variety of devotional and instructive articles including several stories by Father O'Rourke.——Our Sunday Visitor Press has out a good pamphlet, entitled "The 'Reformation' Condemned by World's Best Historians" ($0.05), which is an effective refutation of misleading assertions made by Professor L. Wessel in a leaflet issued by the American Lutheran Publicity Bureau.——"A Handy Companion for Soldiers and Sailors" (Kilner, $0.10), is another neat little prayer book a Vincentian Father has compiled.

"Public Schools of Disloyalty"

EXAMINING the "campaign literature" which kept the presses busy in behalf of a discredited candidate during October, the casual visitor from Altruria or Altoona might have concluded that New York was misnamed. So numerous were the "reforms" wrought during three years and nine months, that the city might claim by right, what it deserved in fact, the title of "New Utopia." But since election day, when reform fell with a jazz-like groan, fancy has been replaced by reality. The District Attorney has been kept exceedingly busy arraigning a small army of patriots who proved their patriotism by primary frauds, and in other ways the good people of the city are learning that the "reform" administratian failed to send all the rascals to Coventry. The public schools are an unhappy instance in point; the phrase at the head of this column is not a Papist fling, but the subject of an editorial in the stodgy New York Times for November 16.

"Propagandist" Teachers

IT is not precisely a secret that for some years the New York schools have been harboring teachers whose loyalty was at least suspect, and less of a secret that the majority of these teachers were Socialists, with a habit of indulging in speech quite free from thought. So bad had conditions become, that when Mr. Arthur S. Somers, of the Board of Education, recently declared that the public schools were fast becoming "hot-beds of sedition," he only said publicly what many had long feared was true. Writing in the Times for November 18, Mr. B. S. Allen, of New York University, remarked that the evidence for this fairly general persuasion was "cumulative and widespread." "Ever since the outbreak of the war," he wrote, "I have been hearing of the brazen, outspoken disloyalty of teachers," adding that his informants were not sensation-mongers, but "reliable men and women," colleagues, for the most part, "of the disloyalists in question." The De Witt Clinton High School, Manhattan, is the institution most affected: "It has been too long conspicuous," commented the Times editorially on November 16, "as a seminary of sedition, anti-Americanism and Socialism"; but it is not alone in its shame. According to the New York Sun for November 19, Mr. Somers has received complaints filed by parents against twelve teachers in three Brooklyn schools. "Under the guise of Socialism," Mr. Somers is reported as saying, "these teachers have been conducting a propaganda encouraging 'free speech' in a most extreme form." "Time to clean house," writes Mr. William T. Hornaday in the New York Tribune for November 20. "At last the housecleaning that has been so unmistakably due in New York's teaching force is on." How greatly needed was this reformation is to be seen from the statement made by Dr. John L. Tildsley, assistant superintendent of schools, to the effect that in the public schools many teachers were Socialists, pacifists or internationalists, that Socialistic books and pamphlets were freely circulated in several high schools, and that "hundreds of pupils were being turned to views antagonistic to this Government, because they were permitted and even advised to read certain radical publications." "The teacher's desk has been made a soap-box platform," is the summing-up of the New York Times. "Pacifism, opposition to the war, attacks on the Government, have prevailed."

The Reign of License

PRECISELY why the Board of Education took such tardy cognizance of these scandalous conditions must remain a mystery; but finally, Dr. Tildsley was appointed to conduct an investigation. The results up to the present are that five teachers, Morris Barasch, Israel Mirsky, Joseph Jablonower, Charles Ham and Cornelia Cleaveland, have been "transferred," and three, Samuel Schmalhausen, A. Henry Schneer and T. Mufson, have been suspended, pending charges of "holding views which are subversive of discipline in the schools, and which tend to undermine good citizenship." There is indeed reason in the protest of the five transferred teachers, that "if they are not good enough to teach in De Witt Clinton, they are not good enough to teach in any school," and further investigation may urge the board to concur in their conclusion. The specific charges against the suspended teachers, signed by Dr. Tildsley, are thus formulated by Assistant Corporation Counsel McIntyre:

1. That the said Mufson, as teacher of English in the De Witt Clinton High School, fails to live up to his duty as teacher, inasmuch as he conceives it proper to maintain before his classes an attitude of strict neutrality in class discussions dealing with (a) the relative merits of anarchism as compared with the present Government of the United States, (b) the duty of everyone to support the Government of the United States in all measures taken by the Federal Government to insure the proper conduct of the present war.

2. (a) That the said Schneer stated that patriotism should not be discussed at the De Witt Clinton High School; (b) that the said Schneer stated that persons wearing the uniform of a soldier of the United States should not be permitted to address the student body in the assemblies of of the school; (c) that the said Schneer stated that the School Board had no right to institute military training in the schools; (d) that in or about the year 1917, the said Schneer wrote a bibliography of contemporary literature, copies of which he caused to be placed on sale in the store of the school, which contained references to works which should not have been called to the attention of the students of the school.

This last clause contains one of the most serious indictments of the public schools as we have them today. While a given text may be unobjectionable, the "required reading" and references privately suggested by teachers who know little and care less about religion, may be, and often are, pernicious in the extreme. This fact is only one of many which may exclude from the Sacraments Catholic parents who send their children to non-Catholic schools. The charges continue:

3. (a) That the said Schmalhausen considers it not to be his duty to develop in the students under his control, instinctive respect for the President of the United States, as such, the Governor of the State of New York, as such, and other Federal, State and municipal officers, as such; (b) that in making written criticisms of a certain letter dated October 22, 1917, addressed to the President of the United States, written by Hyman Herrmann, pupil under his instruction, the said Schmalhausen failed to make such criticisms of the contents of the said letter as would lead the said pupil to perceive the gross disloyalty involved in his point of view as expressed in the said letter; (c) that the said Schmalhausen stated that as an instructor of the said pupil, he would consider it proper to allow the said pupil to write and read aloud to his classmates similar seditious letters addressed to the President of the United States.

The letter thus criticised, written as a class exercise, and addressed to the President, a "Messiah in Disguise," reads, in part:

> Surely your purpose is to get supreme domination and to crush Germany for no other reason it seems, except a mad desire for murder, meanwhile making us the goats. My most venerable Lord, I feel that I am tiring you, and I shudder to think that as a result you may be delayed in your grand wholesale murder.

The anathema launched against Dr. Tildsley by the Evening Post is an added assurance that Dr. Tildsley has done his work well. But it is only just to note that the three teachers have entered a general denial of the charges, and that final decision has not yet been made by the board.

The Results of License

TO students of municipal conditions in New York, it is by no means surprising that revolt has broken out in the schools, or, in the words of a De Witt Clinton teacher, I. A. Dotey, that for "the past few years the pupils have been consulting their individual inclination." The surprising feature is that the disorder has not gone to greater extremes with both pupils and teachers. For at least three years, pestiferous, money-grubbing "revolutionists" of varied stripe, have been allowed to preach both in the press and on the streets, principles of disloyalty to God and country alike. They have told us much of the rights of the individual, nothing at all of his duties; and by favor of "free speech" doctrines that lead directly to moral and national ruin have been openly disseminated. It is no defense to say that then we were not at war. That circumstance made seditious doctrines not a whit less immoral. The action recently taken by the Government in indicting, under the Espionage act, the editors of a well-known purveyor of infidelity and obscenity, shows once more how treason to God ultimately works out in treason to society. Beginning with the birth-controllers, hardly a faction which a year ago brazenly advocated immorality in the streets of New York, has failed to align itself with the actively disloyal, or with "the passively loyal." The craven crew has no stomach for anything calling for unselfishness or generous sacrifice.

The Catholic School and Loyalty

WHAT has happened in New York is only one of many reasons why Catholics cannot approve a system of education wholly dissociated from religion. I wish to be the last to move an indictment against the teachers, Catholic and non-Catholic, in the public schools; for the most part, they are men and women whose purity of purpose, high ideals, and devotion to duty, deserve what is rarely given—sincere respect and genuine admiration. O, si sic omnes! Nevertheless, as facts have shown in New York and elsewhere, the loose requirements of the ordinary school board can never guarantee that the teachers will be persons to whom the training of a Catholic child may be safely entrusted. Only the best among them can rise above the system of which they are part, and as far as the system is concerned, none need believe in God, and all are forbidden by law to teach His existence, and the great truths connected with that dogma. What the public school can be at its worst, not even the recent but belated activities of the New York Board of Education can adequately picture. True, a teacher in a Catholic school may also be quite unworthy; but it is well to remember that he is bad in spite of his system. The ordinary school board does not require, and cannot require, much beyond the conventions, while moral uprightness and personal piety are imperatively demanded of every teacher in the Catholic school. One conclusion easily drawn from the New York investigation is that the only place for the Catholic child is the Catholic school, the school which alone can and does inseparably unite loyalty to country with loyalty to God.

ECONOMICS

Wage-Earners in Washington

"AMONG all cities," wrote a recent visitor from foreign shores, "Washington seems to represent a content, calm in its sufficiency." That is only an impression; according to a report in the October "Bulletin of the Bureau of Labor Statistics," a study of this city of calm content reveals "a shocking state of economic indecency." This study is founded upon an inquiry into the cost of living among wage-earners in the District of Columbia, authorized by Act of Congress on December 20, 1916. The Bureau began the work in January of the present year, and completed it in June. Together with various data on incomes and expenditures for 1916, a few facts on the increased cost of living in 1917 were obtained.

Methods and Incidental Data

THE usual questionnaires were employed, and special agents were sent to interview housewives in their own homes. Only those families were scheduled whose principal breadwinner worked for wages or, if paid a salary, received not more than $1,800 a year. The term "family" was taken to mean any group of persons living together in one establishment, including boarders and lodgers; but "boarding houses were excluded." Figures were obtained from 1,481 white and 629 negro, a total of 2,100 families. Considering the city's population, 363,980, of whom about 100,000 are negroes, these figures should furnish a fair basis of estimate. Some incidental light is thrown by the report on the size of families in the capital. The wording of the study is not a model of precise expression, but it would seem that the number of children is somewhat below a healthy normal. "The average size of family households covered was 4.9 members, and the average net family (i.e., excluding all persons, including children, living as boarders or lodgers) was 3.7 members." An analysis of the figures shows that "families," taking the term in both senses, were slightly larger among the whites than among the negroes, and it is interesting to note that the size of the families of both sorts increases with the annual income. Thus the "average size of net family" in the group with an income under $600 was 2.9, in the group of $1,500 and over, was 4.0. As a whole the work of the Bureau has been well done, and the results fill ten pages of closely printed tabulations in the "Bulletin."

The Theoretic Minimum

IT is, of course, evident that income cannot be taken as the final criterion of want or affluence. Goldsmith's parson was passing rich on forty pounds a year, because that sum sufficed to supply his wants, minister to his modest comforts, and leave a surplus against a rainy day. The test is not the size of the income, measured in dollars and cents, but its purchasing power, what it will mean translated into the necessities of life. The Bureau holds that in a large city "the barest minimum upon which existence for a normal family can be maintained upon a level of common decency, cannot be less than $900 or $1,000." This standard is taken from the findings of the Board of Estimate and Apportionment of the City of New York, dated February, 1917, and reviewed in AMERICA for May 5 and May 12. The New York investigators contemplated an unskilled laborer's family, living in the city, consisting of father, mother, a girl of ten, and two boys, aged thirteen and six. Upon this basis the following annual budget was prepared:

Housing	$168.00
Carfare	30.30
Food	492.388
Clothing	127.10
Fuel, light	46.75
Health	20.00
Insurance	22.80
Sundries	73.00
Total	$980.418

This estimate represents an increase of about sixteen per cent over a similar budget prepared by the New York Board in February, 1915. Since February, 1917, food has undergone a notable price-increase, while the remaining items have either slightly increased or remained unchanged. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the relative price of twenty-seven articles of food advanced from 128 to 131 in the period, July 15-August 15, 1917, a rise of fourteen points in the scale from February 15, 1917. The relative prices on August 15 in the years 1913, 1914, 1915 and 1916 were respectively, 89, 94, 88, and 110, figures which indicate food prices as the budget's most variable factor.

The Real Maximum

DATA not given in the "Bulletin" probably justify the Bureau in applying the New York minimum of $980 to Washington. "It is startling to learn that in the capital of the nation, in a year of unprecedented high prices" comment the investigators > 807 or thirty-eight per cent of the 2,110 families investigated, had yearly incomes of less than $900; and 1,295 families, or sixty-one per cent, had incomes of less than $1,200 a year. . . . The negroes fared worse than the whites. Out of 629 negro families, 180, or nearly 29 per cent, were obliged to try to keep body and soul together on less than $600 a year, and 472, or no less than three-quarters of the total, lived on less than $900.

> Among the white families conditions were better, but not vastly so. Out of 1,481 such families, there were sixty-five who had less than $600 to keep them through the year, while no less than 335, or nearly 23 per cent, existed on less than $900, and 710, or almost one-half, had less than $1,200 a year.

A study of the table of surplus and deficit shows that nearly 30 per cent of all families finished the year with a deficit. Only 520 or about 24.6 per cent had a surplus; "while the best that 964 families or 45.7 per cent could do was to come out even." Comparison by races is given in the figures:

	Families	Surplus	Deficit	Even
White	1,481	30.2	29.0	40.9
Colored	629	11.6	31.3	57.1

As might be expected the deficits are particularly striking in the low-wage groups. In a total of 807 families having an income of less than $900, only eighty-one struck a balance at the end of the year. Of the remaining 726 families in this group, 457 barely managed to keep the expenditures within the income. With 269 families the expenditures were greater than the income. With the majority of the families in this group, which represents more than one-third of all families studied, the judgment of the "Bulletin" is probably justified: "They lived literally from hand to mouth." The situation of many was abject poverty; others struggled from day to day in the hope of something better; very few, if any, were able to live in a condition befitting the dignity of human nature. Properly speaking, they did not "live"; they merely existed.

The Pigeon-hole

CONGRESS has a way of condemning unpleasant situations to legislative oblivion, by summarily dropping them into the pigeon-holes with which official Washington abounds. It is true that concerns of higher and wider importance than the condition of wage-earners in the District of Columbia must be considered in the coming session. But it is to be hoped that the civic bodies at whose request proposals for this study were first moved, may now secure suitable action from the Congressional Committee in charge of the affairs of the District. It is particularly unfitting that the capital should be the Pharisee among the cities, outwardly fair, inwardly full of "economic indecency." There are two things to be insisted upon, as Mrs. Simkhovitch well remarks in her "The City Worker's World," by all interested in the furtherance of a vigorous democratic State. The first is wages admitting of such a standard of life as will enable the worker to contribute his best to the whole, and the second is a mode of life that is satisfactory to the community, apart from the consideration of wages. Neither can be secured in a community which calmly suffers "a shocking state of economic indecency."

NOTE AND COMMENT

Knights Errant of Christ

SINCE the beginning of the world war it has been our privilege to witness the rapid bourgeoning and steady growth of the mission idea in our country. Not merely are more liberal donations pouring in for the mission cause, but vocations, too, are multiplying. The latest evidence comes from St. Mary's Mission House, at Techny, Ill. Never in the history of that institution, the editor of the Little Missionary writes, "did the Fathers of the Divine Word receive as many applications as this year from the aspirants to the missionary career." Thirty-seven boys were admitted after the final tests; a bright and manly set of lads, to judge from their pictures, and as brave as any that have ever been bent upon high adventure for a noble cause. Knights errant of Christ, they are preparing from early youth for their future profession. Taken from the seventh and eighth grades of our schools, they will still have thirteen years of preparation to pass through before they can receive the Divine accolade, which is to fit them to go forth, priests and missionaries, for the conversion of the pagan lands. "Who," asks the editor, "is willing to join them?" It is of interest to note that this development of the missionary movement is in no sense a local growth. For fifteen States are represented in this single group. There are in all 120 boys and young men preparing for the foreign missions at Techny.

Those Costly Oats

"RICH gentlemen must have their little pleasures," observes the New York Journal. "But is it necessary to waste food on race horses for gambling?" The writer then calls attention to the fact that in these days of patriotic retrenchment, when mothers of six children are urged to give them corn meal instead of wheat, workingmen are exhorted to go without beef once a week, and coal must be economized because railroads are overcrowded, nevertheless, rich gamblers are maintaining thousands of purely ornamental race horses, each one of which consumes every day twelve quarts of the best clipped white oats and twenty pounds of the best timothy hay, rides in perfectly equipped "Pullman cars for horses" and has at least one private servant. At the Pimlico track there were 1,200 race horses living in the foregoing style, and at the Laurel track 1,000. No one is unfeeling enough to drive to desperation the poor little rich man, but until the war is over, would it not be possible to reduce the size of his racing stables, so that some of this money now used for fine oats and hay, for constant service and for track-gambling, might be made to relieve some of the economic pressure that has begun to be felt by the laboring man?

Accident Frequency and Severity

A NOTABLE feature is introduced into the report on "Accidents and Accident Prevention in Machine Buildings," recently issued by the United States Department of Labor. Previous studies had merely tabulated the number of accidents. The same rating was given to a broken finger and a broken back. According to the latest method, accidents are computed according to the amount of workdays lost. Even fatal and permanent injuries are registered in these terms. The experience of life-insurance agencies is used as a basis for the computation, so that fatal injuries are rated at the loss of thirty years of a man's working life, and permanent disability is counted at thirty-five years. Thus in the 194 plants covered by the investigation in 1912 the number of accidents was 13,647. This is equivalent to an accident-frequency rate of 118 per 1,000 full-time workers, and a severity rate of 5.6 days lost per worker. 300 days are counted as full-time work for the year. Contrasting these rates with the experience of a representative steel plant for the same year, we find that the frequency rate in the latter was 154 and the severity rate 14 days lost. The point brought home here is that while accidents in the steel plant were only about one-third more frequent than in machine building, their severity was two and a half times as great. This important item was not clear before. Boiler shops and yard labor show by far the greatest hazards. The former have a frequency of 224 cases per 1,000 full-time workers, and a severity rate of 27 days lost for each 300-day worker. In every case where comparison is introduced between plants possessed of a good safety system in accident prevention, and those lacking in such equipment, the accident-frequency rates are from three to four times higher in the latter than in the former instances. The moral is obvious.

Splendid Results of Catholic Instruction League

THE work of the Catholic Instruction League has everywhere achieved remarkable results. In Omaha it has recently been instrumental in the establishment of four new parishes. Within two months twelve new catechism centers were organized in that city with a staff of sixty teachers. The experience of the league made manifest that there were at least 1,000 Catholic children in and about Omaha who received no religious instruction except such as its teachers were able to give them. The same, we may safely say, holds true in due proportion of all cities. Especially consoling therefore are letters like the following from Duluth:

> You will rejoice with me. Two-thirds of our public school children attend not only their catechism center, but also Sunday school after the children's Mass. Twice a week instruction is given to public school children. We have Bible history, hymns, catechism, and hope to develop Christ Child work again. Our centers have their own sodalities of the Holy Angels, the Children of Mary and their C. I. L. Cadets. The Italians have a Junior Holy Name. We will introduce the League of the Sacred Heart.

Equally enthusiastic is a letter written from Freeport, Ill., where the Catholic Instruction League has just been introduced:

> We opened four centers last Tuesday. We had thirty-one children at St. Mary's, thirteen at St. Joseph's, ten at the east side center and six at the west side. The children were delighted and so were the teachers. We are going out to visit families on the west side this afternoon. We haven't one-half the children yet. All the public school teachers are teaching but three, and they would if they could.

Such zeal is bound to be successful. Further details are given in the letter concerning the renting of a new house for a catechism center. In some cases churches, schools or halls are used, in others private residences or homes of the teachers are made available. Some teachers gather together the children of their neighborhood and give them evening instruction. So the zeal of the early Christians is renewed in our day. Every city needs its catechism centers. The late Father Leo Lyons, S.J., of Milwaukee, was particularly successful in this work. At the time of his death he had enlisted the co-operation of more than 100 young women, mostly public school teachers, in his catechism centers. Describing this work, the Milwaukee Evening Wisconsin writes:

> Two of these centers muster 400 Italian children in the third ward and at Bay View, where a settlement house has been purchased and equipped. Two Slavonian centers have been opened on the south side, two others on the west side, and one on the north side, all of which are taking care of upwards of seven hundred embryo citizens of Milwaukee. But a few weeks ago he was called upon to inaugurate a similar enterprise in the city of Kenosha.

The following are some of the works undertaken at these Milwaukee centers: The teaching of Christian doctrine, Bible history and Mass serving, the singing of hymns and national anthems, sodalities, military drill, industrial training, calisthenics, sewing, mending, knitting, entertainments, games, picnics, education in church support and the same put into practice. To this Father Lyons added during the vacation months of July and August his admirable off-the-street movement. With the help of the pastors of the various churches he daily gathered together about him the youngsters on the Marquette campus. Like countless others engaged in this noble work, Father Lyons was a very busy teacher, who nevertheless succeeded in finding time for this great apostolate. A similar tale might be told of the catechism centers in Chicago. It is here that the headquarters of the Catholic Instruction League are established. Every city of our country should be enrolled in this splendid movement.

Florence Nightingale and the Catholic Church

ATTENTION is called in the London Tablet to a number of hitherto unpublished letters addressed by Florence Nightingale to Cardinal Manning. They make apparent how close she stood in all her sympathies to the Catholic Church and with what admiration she regarded, in particular, the Catholic Sisterhoods. The letters will be found in the latest issue of the Dublin Review. In June, 1852, she thus wrote to the great English Cardinal who helped to shape her vocation as a nurse:

> You think the defect is in the will; all Catholics do. You think it would be a sacrifice to me to join the Catholic Church, a temptation to remain where I am. If you knew what a home the Catholic Church would be to me! All that I want I should find in her. All my difficulties would be removed. I have laboriously to pick up here and there crumbs by which to live. She would give me "daily bread." The Daughters of St. Vincent would open their arms to me, they have already done so; and what should I find there? My work already laid out for me, instead of seeking it to and fro and finding none, my home, sympathy human and Divine. I dislike and I despise the Church of England. She received me into her bosom. But what has she ever done for me? She never gave me work to do for her, nor training to do if I found it for myself. I say, if you knew. But you do know now, with all its faults, what a home the Catholic Church is. And yet what is she to you compared with what she would be to me? No one can tell, no man can tell, what she is to women, their training, their discipline, their hopes, their home; to women because they are left wholly uneducated by the Church of England, almost wholly uncared for, while men are not. For what training is there compared to that of the Catholic nun?

Would that Catholics themselves realized so keenly the treasure they possess in their holy Church! Would that they all appreciated as fully the great vocation of our Catholic Sisterhoods! No one understood better than Florence Nightingale the superiority of the Catholic Sisters over every other class of educators or social workers. Thus she makes her comparison:

> Those ladies, who are not Sisters, have not the chastened temper, the Christian grace, the accomplished loveliness and energy, of the regular nun. I have seen something of different kinds of nun, am no longer young, and do not speak from enthusiasm, but from experience. There is nothing like the training (in these days) which the Sacred Heart or the Order of St. Vincent gives to women.

She longed to find her home within the Catholic Church, but that home, unfortunately, she never reached. The Church of England, she said, "proclaims out of the Prayer Book what we are to believe, but she does not care whether we do (and we don't), while the Catholic Church examines into the fact." She was not prepared to stand that scrutiny of the Church, which requires in the convert as in all her children an absolute belief in every article of Faith committed by Christ to the Church's sacred and inviolable care. But the testimony given by her is none the less highly interesting and valuable, though she failed to enter into the fullness of God's light.

The War.—On the western front the battle for Cambrai has been raging all the week. Practically the entire struggle has centered about the Bourlon Wood and the villages of Bourlon and Fontaine. Bourlon Wood is the key of the situation, for placed as it is on a crest, it overlooks the valley of the Scheldt in which Cambrai lies, and the German lines to the west beyond Quéant and Bullecourt. The crest of the hill is about a mile and a half long and a half-mile broad at the widest point, the southern slopes being gentle, the northern rather abrupt. To the advance of the British up these slopes the Germans have offered desperate resistance, and Bourlon and its wood changed hands many times. At the end of the week the Germans delivered two great attacks against the British lines, one extending from Moeuvres to Bourlon Wood, the other along a 12,000-yard front southwest of Cambrai, between Vendhuile and Crèvecoeur. In the northern assault the Germans pushed down between Moeuvres and Bourlon Wood, but according to British accounts lost later on much of the ground thus gained; in the southern attack they broke through the British front south of Villers-Guislain and by a turning movement to the north temporarily enveloped Gauche Wood, Gouzeaucourt, Gonnelieu and La Vacquerie. British reports of December 1 stated that General Byng's troops had again driven the enemy back to the Gonnelieu-Villers-Guislain line. Berlin announced that in the attack of November 30, 4,000 British prisoners were taken. Haig's dispatches make no mention of this loss. Reports of December 3 from both sides speak of furious fighting at Gonnelieu and La Vacquerie and state that the British had to withdraw from Masnières on the Crèvecoeur-Rumilly-Cantaing line. On the Italian front all the activity has been in the mountains between the Brenta and the Piave Rivers. Although the fighting has been incessant and at times of the bitterest character, especially in the entire Monte Grappa sector, no important change has taken place, the Italian armies almost everyhere holding the enemy in check.

Bulletin, Nov. 26, p.m.-Dec. 3, a.m.

By a proclamation issued November 28 placing under license the import of many articles, President Wilson put into the hands of the War-Trade Board drastic powers to be used against firms controlled by German capital. Prominent in the South American countries named in the proclamation is Venezuela, where German capital is in full command, and where pro-German propaganda has one of its most important centers. German-controlled firms in Mexico, Brazil, Argentina, Chile will also be made to realize the full power of the United States to control its commercial relations. It is probable that within a short time the terms of the import proclamation will be extended to include many other articles, as it is the determination of the Administration, through the War-Trade Board, to use all its prerogatives. The proclamation affects European as well as South American countries, thus making it possible for the Government to cut off relations with firms in the northern neutral countries of Europe and in Spain, if it sees fit.

The Embargo Extended

The sensation of the week in political circles all over the world has been the peace-letter written by the Marquis of Lansdowne to the London Daily Telegraph. The Marquis was Foreign Minister in the Cabinets of Lord Salisbury and Mr. Balfour, and Minister without portfolio in Mr. Asquith's Coalition Ministry, and has been Viceroy of India and Governor-General of Canada. The general scope of the letter is to urge upon the Allies a restatement in general terms, of their war aims, in an attempt to bring about peace before "the prolongation of the war leads to the ruin of the civilized world." The writer tabulates his suggestions of a restatement of the Allies' aims, as follows:

The Lansdowne Letter

> That we [Allies] do not desire the annihilation of Germany as a great Power; that we [Allies] do not intend to impose upon the people of Germany any form of government other than that of her own choice; that, except as a legitimate war measure, we [Allies] have no desire to deny to Germany her place among the great commercial communities of the world; that we are prepared, when the war is over, to examine in concert with other Powers a group of international problems, some of them of recent origin, which are connected with the freedom of the seas; that we are prepared to enter into an international pact under which ample opportunities would be afforded for the settlement of international disputes by peaceful means.

Some of the most striking passages of the letter are the following. In the introduction the writer says:

> We are now in the fourth year of the most dreadful war the world has ever known—a war in which, as Sir W. Robertson lately informed us, the number of the killed alone can be counted by the million, while the total number of men engaged amounts to nearly 24,000,000. Ministers continue to tell us that they scan the horizon in vain for a prospect of a lasting peace, and without a lasting peace we all feel that the task we have set ourselves will remain unaccomplished.
> But those who look forward with horror to the prolongation of the war, who believe that its wanton prolongation would be a crime differing only in degree from that of the criminals who provoked it, may be excused if they, too, scan the horizon anxiously in the hope of discovering their indications that the outlook may, after all, not be so hopeless as is supposed. The obstacles are indeed formidable enough. We are constantly reminded of one of them.
> It is pointed out with force that, while we have not hesitated to put forward a general description of our war aims, the enemy have, though repeatedly challenged, refused to formulate theirs and have limited themselves to vague and apparently insincere professions of readiness to negotiate with us. The force of the argument cannot be gainsaid, but it is directed mainly to show that we are still far from agreement as to the territorial questions which must come up for settlement in connection with the terms of peace.

Answering the question: "What are we fighting for?" Lord Lansdowne says that it is to beat the Germans, but that this is not an end in itself, and that England wants to inflict a signal defeat upon the Central Powers, not out of vindictiveness, but in the hope of saving the world from the recurrence of the present tragedy. With Mr. Asquith he believes that England is waging war to obtain reparation and security, that both are essential, but of the two security is perhaps more indispensable.

> In the way of reparation much can no doubt be accomplished, but the utmost effort to make good all the ravages of this war must fall short of completeness and will fail to undo the grievous wrong which has been done to humanity. It may, however, be possible to make some amends for the inevitable incompleteness of reparation if the security afforded is, humanly speaking, complete. To end the war honorably would be a great achievement. To prevent the same curse falling upon our children would be a greater achievement still. This is our avowed aim, and the magnitude of the issue cannot be exaggerated; for, just as this war has been more dreadful than any war in history, so, we may be sure, would the next war be even more dreadful than this. The prostitution of science for purposes of pure destruction is not likely to stop short.
> Most of us, however, believe that it should be possible to secure posterity against a repetition of such an outrage as that of 1914, if the Powers will, under a solemn pact, bind themselves to submit future disputes to arbitration. If they will undertake to outlaw politically and economically any one of their number which refuses to enter into such a pact, or to use their joint military and naval forces for the purpose of coercing the Power which breaks away from the rest, they will indeed have traveled far along the road which leads to security. We are, at any rate, right to put security in the front line of our peace demands, and it is not unsatisfactory to note that, in principle, there seems to be complete unanimity upon this point.

Lord Lansdowne then refers to pronouncements made by President Wilson, von Bethmann-Hollweg, the Pope, and Mr. Balfour confirmatory of this last view. With regard to territorial claims, the Marquis says:

> Some of our original desiderata have probably become unattainable; others would probably now be given a less prominent place than when they were first put forward; others again, notably the reparation due to Belgium, remain and must always remain in the front rank; but when it comes to a wholesale rearrangement of the map of Southeastern Europe we may well ask for a suspension of judgment and for the elucidation which a frank exchange of views between the allied Powers can alone afford.

The letter has been praised in some quarters, in others bitterly criticised. The London Star says:

> Lansdowne's letter is nothing short of a thunderbolt dropped into the camp of those who want the war to last forever and who bully and browbeat everybody who dares think for himself about the problem of peace. He is no fool and no pacifist but he has more practical wisdom in his little finger than Milner, Curzon, Carson, and Lloyd George have in their four heads.

Lord Lansdowne stated that he consulted no one about the letter and that it is entirely his. Lord Robert Cecil, Minister of Blockade, also stated that the Marquis did not represent the views of the Cabinet. Mr. A. Bonar Law, Chancellor of the Exchequer, disagrees "not only with the arguments but with the whole tone of the letter" and thinks it "nothing less than a national misfortune that it should have been published now of all times." The Manchester Guardian and the Yorkshire Post, two of the most influential provincial journals, agree with Lord Lansdowne's main proposals. The London Times calls the letter "unfortunate" and "mischievous." The London Daily News approves it, saying that it "is as conspicuous for its courage as for its largeness and sanity of vision." It says that the writer does "immeasurable service" to humanity in setting before all the nations "the duty of a will to peace." It adds:

> The way to which Lord Lansdowne points, to which President Wilson has pointed, and which Asquith, von Bethman-Hollweg, Czernin, Briand and Smuts have approved, is a way to restore to the shattered world the security and stability of peace.

The London Daily Mail heads its editorial with the words "The White Flag" and declares that Lord Lansdowne is alone in his surrender. The Daily Express fears that the letter will harden Germany's resolve to conquer. Lord Northcliffe says that "the old gentleman" who wrote the letter is "suffering from paranoia." The Evening Standard deplores the hysteria with which the letter has been received, acquits the writer of any suspicion of pacifism in the narrow sense of the word, and thinks that his letter properly interpreted is not a stepping stone towards an inconclusive peace, "but a weapon during the war and a safeguard afterward." Official views from Washington have been so far lacking. The same might be said of the Supreme War Council of the Allies which met on December 1 at Versailles, though it is known that privately the members of the Council have condemned the letter. The Council was attended by Premier Lloyd George and General Wilson for England, Colonel House and General Bliss for the United States. Premier Clemenceau and Foch for France, and Premier Orlando and General Cadorna for Italy.

Mexico.—During the week press dispatches announced that while Villa was hammering at the gates of Chihuahua, Carranza was engaged in his favorite sport of bagging priests. As usual his victims were exiled, whereupon the Boston Evening Transcript of November 28 remarked:

More Savagery

The recognition of Carranza's Government by the United States seems to have encouraged him to renew his warfare against the Church. The Mexican Government has begun the deportation of foreign-born priests, under the interesting constitutional provision, which permits only Mexican-born priests to exercise the religious function. Italian, Spanish and French priests are being bundled to Vera Cruz to be shipped out of the country.

The Church in Mexico, or in any other Latin-American country, would be an extremely incapable religious instrument with only native clergy, and the expulsion of all foreign priests by Carranza will come pretty near to the suppression of religion altogether. Perhaps this is what he is after.

Incidentally his action favors the Protestant missions, for these are already largely in the hands of native preachers or laymen, and depend much less upon the direction of ordained clergy than the Catholic Church does.

Despite this atrocious tyranny some Americans are still anxious for the canonization of the First Chief. The New York World for November 30 contains this item of interesting information:

WASHINGTON, Nov. 29.—Mexico welcomes a proposed investigation of conditions in that country under the auspices of American universities, according to a statement issued today by the official Mexican News Bureau, which says:

"It has been announced by the officials of the University of California that a fund of $100,000 has been created for the purpose of instituting a careful investigation of actual conditions in Mexico under the auspices of the institution named in conjunction with the Universities of Harvard, Princeton, Wisconsin, Minnesota and others. What Mexico desires above all else is to have the truth told regarding it, and this investigation will be welcomed on these grounds."

In view of the recent revelations made in the Mexican Chamber of Deputies this investigation seems scarcely necessary. The statements presented in the last issue of AMERICA are upheld by these further words of Colonel Myguel Peralta, spoken in the aforesaid debate:

"Among those who have risen in arms," continued the chairman of the "Bloc" of the Liberal Constitutionalist Party, "there are many individuals against whom I do not wish that the law of the suspension of guarantees should be enforced. I refer to those in which men have risen to arms in those States where the elections have been a mockery and a fraud, as in Vera Cruz, Coahuila and San Luis" (States where the Liberal Constitutionalist has triumphed), "for those men," continued the speaker, "have the right to rebel.

"But the main factor in the present situation is the army." (Cries of "No!") "Yes," answered the chairman of the Liberal Constitutionalist Party, "for, tell me what has the army done? Ever since the triumph of the revolution it has been guilty of the greatest crimes. Its leader is the butcher and executioner of the people; it is he who prevents the circulation of merchandise and seizes the harvests." Señor Peralta then related several criminal acts which he attributed to members of the army . . .

As these paragraphs are taken from El Universal, a Carranzista organ, their authority is beyond doubt.

Rome.—Not long since the London Morning Post basely calumniated the Holy Father by printing a list of his supposed machinations against the Allies. To add effect to the accusation the paper called upon the English Government "to demand that the Pope state definitely on which side he stood." Four days after, Cardinal Gasparri met these charges and those printed in the more shabby New York papers by the following statement:

The Pope and Peace

The Holy Father is not preparing any new appeal looking toward peace. His earnest desire, many times manifested, for a just, Christian, and durable peace is unchanged and cannot change. Who can crave anything else and call himself a Christian? To say that his Holiness favors, or has favored, or will favor an unjust, un-Christian and temporary peace is not only false, but also absurd. Any propaganda for such a peace, alleged to be conducted at the Vatican's inspiration, especially in certain nations, is the product of pure malice. A "chain of prayer" has always been reprobated by the Holy See, and bishops and priests in the United States of America and elsewhere are warned against them, particularly those having any such propaganda behind them. Also, American Catholics and others are cautioned that such prayers are a species of superstition.

The Catholic Church has always regarded true patriotism as a Christian duty and a Christian virtue, and still so teaches. The fact that the Italian Parliament has had warm eulogies for the clergy should be sufficient to refute the calumnies which irresponsible persons have circulated and are circulating in the foreign world. Malicious insinuations propagated in America and the tendency to attribute in great part to the Italian clergy responsibility for the recent situation must be denounced. In Italy no fair-minded person is attributing the situation to the clergy.

When the disruptive propaganda began to affect the morale of the Italian army, the clergy in general, and also the army chaplains, following the instructions and the example of the Chaplain-in-Chief, labored to counteract it and elevate the morale of the troops. More than once the army chaplains informed the Chaplain-in-Chief, who informed the supreme civil authorities, of the disruptive movement that was creeping in—and all that long before the publication of the Papal note. The true causes of the recent Italian reverses are perfectly well understood in Italy, and the shoulders on which rests the responsibility for the reverses are well know, a responsibility which certainly does not touch Catholics, the clergy, and, least of all, the august person of the sovereign Pontiff. In one case the Holy See ordered the suppression of a newspaper containing imprudent observations.

Finally, is it necessary to repeat that the Pontifical appeal, which some have ignorantly criticized, was addressed to the chiefs of the Governments for consideration in the official Chancelleries? The governmental authorities first gave it to the press, and the public. The Holy See published and commented on it in the Osservatore Romano, the Vatican's official organ, only when the false interpretations of others, whether innocent or wilful, made such action necessary.

It is to be hoped that this frank, manly statement will bring about a temporary cessation of the calumnies uttered against the Holy Father.

Russia.—During the past week the Bolshevik Government has made further progress in its peace negotiations with the Central Powers. On November 27 the news came that a number of German staff-officers had arrived at Petrograd to act as advisers to Premier Lenine, and Ambassador Francis reported that Petrograd and Berlin were communicating by wireless. The Fifth army of Russia with but one dissenting voice voted to choose peace delegates who should go to Germany, and they have followed the recent example of the Second army, which made this announcement:

Peace Negotiations

> The Second army, with arms in its hands, will defend the authority of the Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates and the national committee. At the first order of the military revolutionary committee of the Second army, which is clothed with full power, we will advance as one man against counter-revolutionists in the rear as well as at the front. On our part, we are taking all measures for the removal of counter-revolutionary elements from the commanding personnel of the army, for the immediate democratization of the army, and in particular for the transfer of the higher authority in the army to elective bodies.

At Trotsky's request the Swedish legation at Petrograd has agreed to act as intermediaries between Russia and Germany. On November 27 three representatives from Ensign Krylenko, the Bolshevik Commander-in-Chief, were received within the German lines and informed that Germany had officially consented to immediate negotiations for an armistice on all fronts of the belligerent countries. The Austro-Hungary Government has had similar proposals from the Bolsheviki, and Foreign Minister Czernin has written a letter saying: "The Austro-Hungarian Government therefore declares that it is ready to enter upon negotiations as proposed by the Russian Government regarding an immediate armistice and a general peace."

Foreign Minister Trotsky has warned the agents of the Allies not to "interfere in the internal affairs" of Russia, saying, "Further steps in this direction will bring the gravest complications, responsibility for which the Government now disclaims." Ambassador Francis and the Entente Embassies at Petrograd have protested against the armistice negotiations. The report of Ensign Krylenko's peace representatives has been published. They were received within the German lines by General von Hoffmeister, who made the following statement:

> The chief of the German eastern front is prepared to enter into negotiations with the Russian chief command. The chief of the German eastern front is authorized by the German Commander-in-Chief to carry on negotiations for an armistice. The chief of the Russian armies is requested to appoint a commission with written authority to be sent to the headquarters of the commander of the German eastern front. On his side, the German commander likewise will name a commission with special authorization.

The time appointed for the conference was December 2 and the place the junction of the Dvinsk-Vilna line, where the Russian representatives were to be conducted to the German Commander's headquarters.

The internal state of Russia grows worse and worse. There are latent signs of disintegration. A long list of the employees of the Ministry of Finance, including M. Shipoff, manager of the State Bank, have been dismissed; a proclamation issued November 26 declared that all titles, distinctions and privileges are abolished, all persons now being merely "citizens of the Russian Republic"; the corporate property of nobles, merchants and burgesses has been ordered to be handed over to the State; another proclamation signed by Lenine and Trotsky charge the bourgeoisie with blocking efforts to feed the army and to provide funds for the support of the Government; soldiers were ordered to disband committees opposing the Bolsheviki program, but the Committee on the Salvation of Russia issued a proclamation accusing the Bolsheviki of bringing Russia to ruin and advising the army to refuse to carry out the armistice proposals; the Bolsheviki took over the State Bank of Moscow containing 700,000,000 rubles; the commanders at the front continue to send ominous reports about the exhaustion of supplies and fear is felt that famished soldiers will invade and pillage the centers of population, for troops are dying of cold and hunger on the northern front and food riots have broken out there; the Military Revolutionary Committee has seized the customs department; the Bolsheviki after a four days' battle took Tashkent, capital of Russian Turkestan; large numbers of the troops seem to be supporting the Lenine Government, and extremists are steadily gaining ground in the army.

Internal Chaos

The publication by the Bolshevik Government of some of the secret treaties the Allies entered into make interesting reading. It seems that the price Italy exacted before she would join the Allies was the promise of help from the French and British naval forces till Austria's sea power was destroyed, and when peace came Italy was to receive the Trentino, the Southern Tyrol to the Brenner Pass, Trieste and Istria and Dalmatia, with additional geographical boundaries outlined in great detail. Article XV of the treaty is reported to read as follows:

The Secret Treaties

> France, Great Britain, and Russia take upon themselves to support Italy in her disallowing representatives of the Holy See to take any diplomatic steps for the conclusion of peace, or regarding matters pertaining to the present war."

In the hope of inducing Greece to assist Serbia, the Allies offered the former Southern Albania and territory in Asia Minor. Bulgaria, provided she joined the Allies, was to receive Kavala, and Great Britain suggested that Greece should accept Cyprus as a reward for assisting Serbia. The publication of the secret treaties has caused great indignation in the Allies' diplomatic circles. But the documents throw considerable light on how diplomats make war nowadays.

Salvation Outside the Church

J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

NO dogma of the Faith, perhaps, has been subjected to more caustic criticism by those not of the Fold than that which is enshrined in the classic saying: "Extra ecclesiam nulla salus." Outside the Church there is no salvation." To this doctrine, properly understood, the Church is irrevocably committed.

It is laid down in Holy Scripture, it runs like a refrain through the writings of the Fathers, it is an essential part of Catholic theology, it is realized and unhesitatingly believed by the laity, learned and ignorant, it has the official sanction of Councils and Popes. Pope Pius IX, for example, in his allocution of December 9, 1854, says very clearly: "It must be held as a matter of Faith that no one can be saved outside the Apostolic Roman Church; this is the one ark of salvation, he who does not enter it, will perish in the flood." These words of the Holy Father, in their uncompromising honesty, are proof positive that the doctrine in question is an article of Faith, the denial of which is heresy.

The statement of the doctrine offers no difficulty. It is clear, positive, universal. A child may grasp it; and once it is grasped, it has a tremendous power for stimulating private and corporate effort. That Christ died for all men, that God wishes all men to be saved, and that no man can be saved outside the Church, is a trilogy of truths which has been the fountain-head of centuries of unflagging zeal, driving missionaries to every corner of the world with a restless, hungering desire to bring souls into the Church, and furnishing overpowering motives for heroic sacrifices to preserve the priceless treasure of the Faith.

On its positive side the formula means that the Catholic Apostolic Church, by the institution of Christ, is the only true Church, into which—because by Divine ordinance it has supplanted all other forms of religion—all men are commanded to enter if they would have part with Christ in time and eternity; it means that in the Church, and in the Church alone, is to be found the ordinary way of salvation, that the Church is the custodian of Divine revelation, that she alone has a Divine commission to teach what Christ has taught and to apply to souls the fruits of redemption, and that through her flow, directly or indirectly, all the graces which, through the merits of Jesus Christ, are bestowed by God on the souls of men for their sanctification.

On its negative side the formula is in direct contradiction to the religious indifferentism which teaches that it makes no difference what one believes, provided he endeavors to lead a good life; it denies succinctly but emphatically the theory, so popular today, that creeds and dogmas are only symbols without significance or force except in so far as they prove helpful to individual souls; and it rejects as false and pernicious the doctrine that God looks with equal favor on all forms of worship and that He is ready to dispense His Divine blessings with equal bounty irrespective of religious affiliations.

The formula, though negative in form, is essentially constructive. The Church maintains and has always maintained that salvation comes to all who are saved through the Church and in the Church. It has never, however, restricted the hope of salvation to those who are visible members of her communion. She does indeed exclude from the hope of salvation those who knowingly and willingly, that is, with full knowledge of their obligation to become Catholics, remain outside her visible communion; but as for others who through no fault of their own are not, as far as outward appearances go, members of her communion, she freely admits that they may possess the theological virtues of faith, hope and charity, and be friends of God. Such souls she leaves to their Creator, knowing that His mercy is above all His works, and that, appearances notwithstanding, He may have united them, for all she knows, by invisible bonds to His mystical body, that is, to the Catholic Church.

No one is lost, of this we are certain, except through his own fault. If men are saved, it is certain that they have belonged to the Church; if they are excluded from the Kingdom of Heaven because they have not belonged to the Church, the responsibility for their not belonging to it, and consequently for their exclusion from Heaven, rests with themselves. In theory this principle is perfectly plain. Its application, also, is clear in the case of those who knowing the Church for the one ark of salvation, nevertheless wilfully and deliberately refuse to obey Christ's command to enter it; in the words of Pope Pius IX, they " will perish in the flood."

But the application of the doctrine to those who are ignorant of the fact that the Church is the one ark of salvation is not always easy; it depends on whether that ignorance is culpable or inculpable. That such ignorance may be blameless is obvious from the words of the Pope, who, after insisting on the necessity of belonging to the Church, goes on to say: " Nevertheless we must likewise hold it for certain that in the eyes of the Lord no blame for their ignorance attaches to those who do not know the true religion, provided their ignorance is invincible."

There is, then, an ignorance of the true religion, which is invincible, that is, an ignorance which the person concerned has had no opportunity to overcome, or which persists after reasonable efforts have been made by him to overcome it. The Holy Father warns Catholics not to presume to set limits to this invincible ignorance, but rather to leave its determination to God, to the Divine mercy and justice, content in the meantime to await the fulness of knowledge that will come with the beatific vision for the understanding of how close and beautiful is the connection between the Divine mercy and justice. For Catholics, during the period of their mortal existence, it is sufficient, in the words of the Supreme Pontiff, to "hold firmly to the Catholic doctrine that there is one God, one Faith, one Baptism; to push our inquiries further were wrong."

The Catholic's part therefore is to abstain from passing judgment on any particular case. Yet he is often asked to give a reason for the faith that is in him and to explain the Church's attitude on this much misunderstood dogma. Undoubtedly many who do not enjoy visible communion with the Church are saved; in some way or other therefore these must belong to the Church. They must be in invisible communion with it. And it is not only not blameworthy but commendable for Catholics to endeavor to get clear notions as to how this invisible communion is possible and what is its nature. The opportunity to do so has again been put within their easy reach by a recent translation of the very lucid explanation of the matter given by J. V. Bainvel, S.J., in his work "Hors de l'Eglise pas de Salut." The original was published in 1903, but it has only lately appeared in an English version by the Rev. J. L. Weidenhan, S.T.L. with the title, "Is There Salvation Outside the Catholic Church?" (Herder). The theological explanation dates back to the early days of the Church, and Father Bainvel in his little volume has carefully followed the beaten track.

There are two forms of union with the Church: one in act, and the other in desire. Of the former nothing need be said, for it is manifested by actual acceptance of the truths the Church teaches, actual reception of the Sacraments she administers, and actual submission to the authority she exercises, especially to that of the Pope, Christ's Vicar on earth.

That the Church has also recognized a union which consists of desire might be proved by many citations, but a classic passage from St. Ambrose will suffice. The great Doctor declares that no one is crowned with glory who is not initiated into the Church, but in the same place he states that Valentinian had been initiated into the Church, although he died before being actually baptized; and the reason he gives for his statement is that the Emperor had the wish and the will to be baptized. St. Ambrose assumes it as undoubted that both martyrs and catechumens, properly so-called, are crowned with glory, and from this he argues that both martyrdom and the proper desire for baptism effect a sort of union with the Church. The Church has always recognized that such a Baptism of desire supplies for Baptism with water. When this desire is explicit, there is no difficulty whatever, for catechumens have always been counted members of the Church, though in a restricted and imperfect sense.

There is a difficulty, however, about the case of those who have at most an implicit desire to enter the Church. Such a desire may exist, paradoxical as at first sight may appear, in those who either have never heard of the Church, or, if they are acquainted with the Church do not recognize her for what she really is, namely, the mystical body of Christ. Such persons, so far from explicitly desiring to enter the Church, may actually hold the Church in abomination; and yet, in spite of their abhorrence and because of their ignorance, they may entertain and often, more often perhaps than is commonly thought, actually do entertain an implicit desire to join the Church.

A soul that sincerely loves God with perfect love, unites its intelligence to the Divine intelligence and its will to the Divine will; it accepts whatever of truth has been manifested to it; it wills whatever God wills, it desires to fulfil the Divine commands, its wish is to know the Divine pleasure and to live according to it; it excludes nothing, it is disposed to do everything that God would have it do. It may be ignorant of certain of the Divine truths and commands, but its habitual and prevailing attitude of soul is to accept whatever God has revealed and to do whatever He commands. In this general explicit desire there is contained an implicit desire to enter the Church, for entrance into the Church is one of the things Christ commands.

If the dominant wish of such persons were analyzed, it would be found that they have a resolute determination to serve God to the best of their knowledge and ability in the way He has prescribed. Were they asked if they were desirous of taking the step necessary to secure that perfect service, undoubtedly they would answer in the affirmative. That step, in the concrete, is entrance into the Catholic Church. They desire, therefore, vaguely it is true but none the less really, to enter her communion. The blindness arising from prejudice and ignorance holds their eyes, so that, seeing, they do not see either the true character of the Church or the necessity of entering it; but the desire to become sheep in the true Fold is nevertheless latent in their souls, and would become explicit if the mists were cleared away from their darkened mental vision.

The Church can only judge by external manifestations, and, as such persons are not bound to her by visible ties, she does not call them her members. But God searcheth the hearts of men, He knows how to discount human statements, He acts on the desire of the soul rather than on the words of the lips. Accepting the will for the deed, therefore, God counts them as invisible members of His Church. The meaning of the formula, therefore, "Outside the Church there is no salvation," is this: The ordinary way of salvation is to be found only in visible union with the Church; nevertheless Divine Providence has extraordinary means of providing salvation for sincere and upright souls that do what in them lies; such souls will be given grace by God to unite themselves invisibly to the Church, and to die in union with it. This grace, if accepted, gives them membership in the Communion of Saints, real though invisible membership in the Church Militant, and glorious, visible membership in the Church Triumphant.

Said of the Jesuits

JOHN WILTBYE

ON the twenty-second day of the blithesome month of May, in the year 1917, a sudden hush fell upon the neighborhood of 73 Dey Street. In the elaboration of a great thought, the editor of the New York Globe had paused to scurry about for a simile. With expectant finger poised in air, he sought the most emphatic letters on his key-board. For he was writing a denunciation of the Germans, or, more precisely, of "The German Mind." It was a solemn pause; in fact, momentous.

Now I have no particular love for the German mind. I can never regard with anything but resentment the mind that indexes the sun as a lady, catalogues the moon as a gentleman, and calmly accords to a dull and dingy cotton-gin the impassioned feminine pronouns that rose from the lips of Romeo to his Juliet, "beauty for earth too dear," framed in the silver of the moon-lit balcony. By their very etymology do the Germans stand condemned; but the editor sought a yet deeper ground for his indictment, and found it in the likeness between the German mind and St. Ignatius Loyola. Why in the name of Ollendorf and all his tribe, the editor did not stay in Dey Street, but went thus far afield, no one, not even the editor himself, seems to know. The usual din revived in the vicinage of 73 Dey Street, as with a crash his eager fingers, reluctantes dracones, fell upon the suffering key-board. "It is said," he thumped out, "that Loyola was wont sophistically to argue . . . that the end justifies the means," and from this great man the Germans have ever since drawn counsel and inspiration.

I confess that the pause enabled the mind of the editor to gather itself together, like Micawber, for a tremendous spring, and bring up in new pastures. True, ignoramuses have been repeating these many years that to the ordinary Jesuit this immoral maxim has been food, light and air; but so far as my knowledge goes, the editor of the Globe, a man of high honor, learned in historical lore, is the first to present with a careless "it is said," the assertion that St. Ignatius was wont to teach immorality. By general consent, the founder of the Jesuits is conceded an unusually large share of common-sense. Hence it would seem that, even had he acted on this infamous principle, he would never have given his case away by publishing his program. That he had done so seemed a claim so startling, that on May 22 an associate editor of AMERICA wrote to ask upon what authority it rested. A second letter enclosing a copy of the first was sent by registered mail on May 28, but it was not until June 12 that Mr. H. J. Wright, after pleading "absence from his desk," girded himself for the following exposition of honor and common-sense, as understood by the New York Globe:

> The debate you suggest seems a profitless one. If injustice was done to the memory of Loyola by repeating a remark we did not originate we are of course sorry and would gladly in that event make amends if there were any practical way of doing so.

Of course, no "debate" was "suggested." On the contrary, a straightforward request was made for the authority on which so grave a charge had been brought against a Saint venerated by the whole Catholic Church. Mr. Wright gives none. Worse, he takes refuge in the position that no responsibility attaches to him, if he merely repeats accusations which he did not "originate." It seems to me, and is, I believe, a common persuasion in civilized society, that to repeat charges of immorality, without certainty of their truth, is dishonorable; and that to disclaim responsibility when asked for proof, is cowardice of an exceedingly low and mean type. It will not do to take refuge in an "if." Honor demands, and self-respect will be content with nothing less than, proof or apology with full reparation. I am not trying to set a standard for Mr. Wright, but it is quite within bounds to observe that the New York Globe is one of several excellent reasons why the press has so little influence in New York.

The survival of this calumny against the Society of Jesus, usually uttered by those who wish to attack the Church through one of its institutions, may be counted among the curiosities of literature. True, no scholar urges it, and it is noteworthy that some of the Society's most bitter critics have refused to take it seriously. Pascal was "not the man to neglect" such an argument, had it been available, but he was too shrewd to make so easily refuted an accusation. Doellinger and Reusch, in the nineteenth century, attacked the moral teaching of the Jesuits sharply and in detail, but since they knew something of what they were talking about, they left this charge severely alone. Nevertheless with rude fellows of the baser sort the calumny is still in favor. Picking up the Chicago Tribune for November 25, some days ago, the first words on which my eye fell were "This sounds Jesuitical; the end justifies the means." So often indeed during the last few months has this and similar statements appeared in newspapers and magazines, that I sometimes suspect the working of an organization whose purpose is to discredit all things Catholic, by associating them with German ideals and activities. A great deal of publicity, for instance, was given the words taken from an address by Major-General Bell at the Fort Niagara training camp: "The Germans, like the Jesuits, believe that the end justifies the means," a remark peculiarly out of place at a time when Jesuit-trained boys had already given their lives for their country, and thousands of others were defending the colors as officers and privates in the Governmental forces. On the other hand, very little publicity was given the distinctly mild disclaimer, yet a disclaimer, written by the Secretary of War to the Rev. George A. Crimmen who had protested the offensive words: "I agree with you that such a statement, if made, was an unfortunate one." There is little reason to believe that the Major-General wished to calumniate the Jesuits. He simply read his words in the great book of Protestant tradition. General Bell himself has recently called to task a busybody who had been spreading frightful stories of crime at Camp Upton. He can realize, therefore, the annoyance of being obliged to refute charges based on the untutored imaginations of meddlesome old women.

Of a variety differing somewhat from the Major-General and the New York editor, is the Rev. Middleton S. Barnwell, who although "a priest of the Catholic Church in England," dwells at 1049 Cherry Street, Birmingham, Alabama. Like Doctors Reisner and Sheldon, Mr. Barnwell in attempting to state an argument, hangs himself in a noose of tangled logic. Germany, said this reverend gentleman, in a sermon reported by the Birmingham Age-Herald for April 23, "has instilled into the hearts of her people in the realm of politics, that same falsehood that the Jesuits have made infamous in the realm of religion: the doctrine that the end justifies the means." On May 1, Mr. Barnwell was asked by the editor of AMERICA to cite passage or passages from approved works in proof of this statement. On May 18, the worthy clergyman replied:

> I did not say that any Jesuit writer had ever written the maxim in an authoritative treatise on theology, though they may have done so for all I know. I said that they made the doctrine infamous, which is a different matter entirely. You ask me for a teaching by word of mouth, when I referred to a teaching by deed.

Taking him on his own terms, Mr. Barnwell now says: "The Jesuit authors were evil enough to set down the maxim in cold print, and they may have done so for all I know; but I make no accusations. My thesis is simply this: The Jesuits taught the doctrine by their deeds." To note how this priest of the Catholic Church in England and Birmingham, Alabama, proves his thesis, after assuming its truth, by five "ifs" and two "thens," is a revelation of the power latent in these simple English vocables. I trust that my insertion of occasional italics will not interrupt the irresistible flow of the argument.

> If you grant, as I suppose you must, that "heretics" were racked and torn and tortured and burned for the glory of God and the Church, then you will have granted the truth of my statement and it's [sic] full implication. I do not think we make a bad doctrine "infamous" by teaching it, but by acting it. While I am not in a position to say how far this same principle in modified form actuates the Church of Rome today, if in your communion the sins of your clergy are hushed "for the good of the Church;" if you countenance political deals; if you seek removal from office of deserving Protestants; if you work hidden and underhandedly in any way for the advancement of truth as you Roman brethren see it, then you appear to me to be making this same doctrine infamous even though it may never be written or spoken by a single member of your Church.

This is seriously offered in proof of the thesis: "By their deeds the Jesuits teach that the end justifies the means." To point out that suppositions and hypotheses prove nothing, and that since "the Catholic Church" and "the Jesuits" are by no means synonymous terms, one may go scot free even if the other be condemned, would be lessons in logic far beyond the mental grasp of the Rev. Middleton S. Barnwell. Father James Coyle of Birmingham, with a cruelty unworthy of him, pushed the matter one step farther, by asking the names of the unholy Jesuits whose deeds proved the maxim, but Mr. Barnwell has not thus far obliged his "Roman" brother. He may be left, therefore, babbling with glee, surrounded by his five valiant "ifs" and his two doughty "thens." But it is only charitable to advise Mr. Barnwell never to make any such charges against a "Roman" brother, or anyone else, designating him specifically by name. In the ensuing legal action, Mr. Barnwell's child-like reliance on "ifs" and "thens" would certainly bring him to grief.

Meanwhile, may I present to the New York editor, the Major-General, and the Alabama dominie, with my compliments, the following lines, written of the historian Robertson, by that inimitable worthy, "Father Prout."

> What could have possessed the professor? Did he ever go through the course of "spiritual exercises"? Did he ever eat a peck of salt with Loyola's intellectual and highly-disciplined sons? Had he ever "manifested his conscience"? Was he deeply versed in the "ratio studiorum"? No! Then why the deuce did he sit down to write about the Jesuits? Had he not the Brahmins of India at his service? Could he not take up the dervishes of Persia? or the bonzes of Japan? or the illustrious brotherhood of Bohemian gypsies? or the ancient order of Druids? or all of them together? But in the name of Cornelius à Lapide why did he undertake to write about the Jesuits?

The settled conviction with which I close this quotation is that within the next week public announcement will be made that the Jesuits teach the maxim and act on the principle that the end justifies the means. What Newman called "the Protestant tradition," a curious combination of ignorance and ill-will, dies hard.

The New Youth of France

COMTESSE DE COURSON

IT has been noticed many times by those who study France from within that the younger generation of her soldiers, lads between nineteen and twenty-five years of age, face the ordeal of the war in a spirit that recalls the crusaders of medieval times, rather than the generation that immediately preceded the one of today. This comes from the religious and social evolution that, even before the war, was clearly perceptible among these boys. M. Henry Bordeaux, in his last book, "La Jeunesse Nouvelle," notices and illustrates this mental attitude of many young soldiers, whose ardent and solid religious faith seemed to carry them to the austere heights of renunciation. Of course, he alludes to an élite; it would be absurd to pretend that all our young soldiers are like those whose story he tells us, but we may safely assert that these boy-heroes are not exceptions and that the characteristics we admire in them are common to many of their comrades. These characteristics are absolute self-sacrifice, a keen sense of responsibility, an enlightened and practical religious faith, that expresses itself by acts rather than by words.

The first of the young friends of M. Bordeaux was Camille Violand, who, before the war, was a poet, somewhat dreamy and sentimental, but at the same time full of noble thoughts and aspirations. Three days after the declaration of war, he writes that he is happier than he ever was before and immediately this young lieutenant de réserve rises to the occasion. At Virton, he led his men forward in dangerous circumstances and, though only twenty-three, he exercised his command with great success, until a wound in the head laid him low. On leaving the hospital he returned to his regiment without taking the leave that was offered to him, because, he writes, "my men want me," was again wounded, this time in the shoulder, and removed to another hospital, that he again succeeded in leaving before he was cured. He was cité by his chiefs and given the Legion of Honor. His letters are delightful; even the monotonous life of the trenches is glorified by his patriotic wish to do his best; he is at once proud and humble, when he speaks of his responsibility; and he voices the feeling of his contemporaries when he writes:

> How I understand and love life now that I am so near losing it, now that I have seen close to me so many deaths, magnificent in their simplicity . . . But although I love a life full of action I am, of course, ready to make all the sacrifices that it may please God to demand of me for the glory of my country.

Then he goes on to beg for warm garments for his men, of whom this chief of twenty-three speaks paternally as my good territoriaux and my dear young ones.

He spent the winter in Argonne, whence his letters continue to speak proudly of his men's "magnificent tenacity"; on Christmas night, his sergeant, standing upright on the parapet of the trench sang the Christmas hymn Minuit Chrétiens; during the two first verses, absolute silence reigned, then a shot was fired from the enemy's trenches, the French responded and the spell was broken!

In another letter, he relates that his corporal, a Breton réserviste, being mortally wounded, sent for him. "In his eyes, I was the chief, at once priest and father," writes the lieutenant, who owns that he shed tears over his faithful Breton soldier.

In another letter, written in February, 1915, to M. Henry Bordeaux himself, Camille Violand owns that the terrible winter campaign is a > Rough and valuable school . . . but I thank God for a trial that has trained and deepened me. . . . If I am alive when the war ends, I will devote all my energies to the greatness and beauty of my country, with the same energy with which, in a small measure, I once defended its soil.

He was killed on March 4, of the same year, and on his body was found a letter addressed to his father—his mother was dead—in which he says: "If I die, know that I die content, without a regret . . . if it pleases God, as a good Christian and a good Frenchman."

This dreamy lad, who had been as a youth, supersensitive, inclined to quarrel with life, to criticize its gifts and to yearn after the impossible, was transformed by a supreme ordeal into a manly young chief, strong and self-contained, who could without an effort, recognize the ennobling influence of a tremendous trial, fraught with pain and crowned by death.

Another lieutenant, whose story is told us by M. Henry Bordeaux, was the son of an engineer and was himself a pupil of the military school of St. Cyr, when the war broke out—four days later, he was close to the frontier and appointed to command, as sub-lieutenant, a section of eighty men. "It is a delightful impression," he writes, "to feel that the enemy is in front of us," and the enthusiasm of his men finds an echo in this lad of twenty. During an engagement, he stood on the parapet of his trench, quietly directing the aim of his soldiers and, by his boldness, he kept up their courage In spite of his youth, he had extraordinary self-command. "A man must retain his calmness and presence of mind in front of the men," he writes, "and even to say with an indifferent air: 'Thank you,' when in their presence, news is brought that the captain has been killed." And again; "You have no idea of the pleasure it is to be under fire; the heart swells under the influence of something grand and sublime."

From the eastern frontier, our lieutenant was sent north; near Longwy, he commanded a charge, but only three men followed him, the rest being held back by the enemy's terrific fire. Our young officer stood up and called out: "Look at your officers; do the bullets hurt them? They make a hole, but do not hurt; up now and come on." He owns that he laughed as he made the speech, the men laughed back and got up to follow him.

There is a pathetic contrast between the boyish spirit of this very young soldier, who went to battle, like all the St. Cyriens, as to a feast, and his death. In spite of his years he was looked up to and obeyed by his men who were proud of his brilliant courage. Their last vision of him was near Ypres; severely wounded, deadly pale, holding his revolver, he was facing a group of Germans. Many months of suspense followed, then, one day, René Decheys' parents were informed through diplomatic channels, that his death was certain.

Three years older than this boy, was M. Bordeaux's third hero, Ferdinand Belmont, who, when the war broke out, was a medical student at Lyons, his native city. He belonged to an excellent family and had been carefully trained. Two of his brothers, Jean and Joseph, the latter of whom was a seminarist, were killed in 1914 and 1915. Ferdinand, who at the age of twenty-three was already a captain, received the Legion of Honor for his distinguished service. The three were cast in the same mold as regards the more important things of life, though their temperaments differed. Jean, a passionate mountaineer, was a bright boy, who, when he bade his mother goodbye, said to her as a matter of course: "I have nothing to fear; the worst that can happen to me is that I may be killed and it would be a great happiness to die young for so grand a cause." In August, 1914, he fell in Lorraine. Joseph, the future priest, wrote home: "To live close to danger and to death means living closer to God, why then complain? Nothing can happen but what is willed by God and all that is willed by Him is the best that can happen."

Ferdinand was perhaps the most brilliant of the three; his was a thoughtful nature and through his frequent letters to his parents, it is easy to trace his moral progress. At first, there is a note of anxiety in his letters, he almosts doubts his own capacity to face the tremendous ordeal worthily, but, even in those early days, he calms his eager questionings by the thought that "God does all things well." He had the gifts of a letter-writer and his vivid description of men and things are charming. On August 28, he took part in his first battle, after which he was sent to the north. He owns that, at times, he is very near being dangerously shaken by thoughts of home and that the uncertain results of the first engagements of the war naturally made him anxious. "Often in those moments, I take up my rosary and confidence returns. . . . I try to live one minute at a time, day by day, as God wills it." As time goes on he becomes mentally stronger and calmer, the note of sadness, so apparent in his first letters, the natural clinging to home and all that makes life sweet, gradually diminishes and it is easy to trace the progress of detachment in this eager, sensitive soul. In December, 1914, (he was a captain) he took part in several severe engagements near Arras and his men's attitude delighted him. "I abandon myself as well as I can to the will of God," he writes at the beginning of 1915.

From Arras, Captain Belmont was sent back to the Vosges, on the frontier of Alsace where, during several months, the fighting was incessant. By this time, he seems to have made such progress in serenity that death no longer saddened him: "Death is like a departure, the saddest are not those who go, but those who are left behind," he writes. His two brothers, Jean and Joseph, had gone: "Do not be anxious about me," he adds. "Try to accept, without trembling, the idea that it is possible we may all meet in another world." His parents, who had lost two sons, insisted on coming to spend three days near him; he notes the happiness and peace of this meeting and writes solemn words on the strength of family ties, that death cannot sever, but only transform.

In November, 1915, he was given the Legion of Honor and he describes the scene. It took place in a valley of the Vosges, in presence of his men, whom he calls his children. For his parents' sake, he welcomed the honor, but his own thoughts went out to the thousands of unknown heroes, whose sacrifice was unrecognized by men, and the enamel cross of his decoration seemed to him commonplace, "by the side of the rough crosses made of two pine branches that open their arms over the graves." His soldiers' delight at the honor done him went to his heart. "The men's gratitude and affection are my best reward, it is beyond price." A month later, Captain Belmont was killed on the slopes of the Hartmansweilerkopf. For the third time, his parents received the news that a son had fallen for his country; a fourth son, the only one left and the youngest, had just left his home to join the ranks. In one of his last letters, Ferdinand Belmont wrote words that seemed the expression of his dying wishes: "May God give you above all else a supreme gift, the peace that leads us to accept all burdens and sacrifices with equal serenity."

Among the countless war-books that have been published, the letters of Ferdinand Belmont have won a distinguished place. They are marvelously noble in spirit and very charming in their vivid word-pictures of military life; they reveal too the progression of a soul that was deeply religious, even at starting, but whom the daily sacrifices and duties of a soldier's life brought to a high level of detachment and serenity. Captain Belmont's family has, as he had, a horror of vulgar publicity; for a long time, his parents hesitated before making his letters public; they did so, only when persuaded that their son's example might thus be continued, and carry on his work for his country.

M. Henry Bordeaux concludes his book on the "New Youth of France" by the delightful sketch of a boy of sixteen, who, not without difficulty, obtained his parent's consent to enter the army on his seventeenth birthday. His letters on the subject are cool, well-reasoned, methodical; he puts his arguments in order, discusses every point and at the end says as a supreme argument: "From the moment that I enlist, I sacrifice my life." This spirited little lad won the day; he passed the examinations that crown the college life of all French boys and then enlisted in the Chasseurs Alpins, because having met many of them, he liked their spirit. "They spoke of their country and of their family as I know I shall speak of mine," he writes to explain his choice.

This mere child fitly closes a gallery of young soldier's portraits, described by one who knows the generation of which he writes, a generation, at once idealistic and practical, that has faced a terrific ordeal with a quiet heroism.

The Pilot of the Soul

DANIEL A. LORD, S.J.

CONSISTENCY may be a jewel, but unfortunately jewelry is regarded as frivolous ornamentation in certain philosophical circles. It is, of course, as ridiculous for philosophers who deny a personal soul to talk of free-will as it is for a turtle to brag of its wings. Yet some of them do it. When, at the cloakroom of the philosophical halls, they checked their souls, they renounced all right to any real freedom of choice; for chemical and physical forces, beyond which, according to their theory, there is nothing else, are governed by laws as fixed as the courses of the stars. The loose boulder on the mountain top is not free to whip itself suddenly toward the sun. The early crocus is not free to withhold its bloom, as a woman withholds her spring hat, until exactly Easter morning. Man, if he has no soul, is, like the boulder or the crocus, made up simply of chemical and physical forces which know no freedom of choice.

There are, however, many materialists who recognize that their philosophy has left no breathing space for free-will. Matter is not free; man is but soulless matter; and so, when brought face to face with the fact of free-will, like Tito Melema and his unwelcome father, they simply deny the fact. Man is not free, they say; the glorious power of choosing one's own course is simple illusion, a vain flattery with which man has salved his own self-conceit. Like the lightning and the wind, the plough-horse and the gasoline engine, man has not the slightest power over his own actions.

Consequently, if we prove that man has a free will, we prove that there is something in him besides mere chemical and physical forces, a something which is not governed by the laws of matter, and which we call the soul.

Dogberry to the contrary notwithstanding, comparisons have their use, and we can get an idea of our free-will by comparing it with the action of our intellect. A class in geometry sits fidgeting before an unsolved problem on the blackboard. Step by step the instructor leads them through a labyrinth of parallel lines and acute angles and hypotenuses until at length he sets before them a completely satisfactory answer. A sigh from the class, and they settle back calmly in satisfied acquiescence. Brought face to face with any truth clearly and evidently proposed, the intellect is simply forced to accept it.

But suppose we take a business man at his desk in the late morning of a summery Saturday. An afternoon in the office will mean clinching the good-will of a rather desirable buyer; yet through the window comes a delicious breeze elusively suggestive of greens and bunkers and long stretches of undulating sward. Here are two things, either of which he knows to be desirable; and he vacillates to the rhythm of his swaying desk-chair. Then with a sudden gesture he piles his correspondence in a heap, bangs down his desk cover, swings the golf bag from its place in the corner over his shoulder, and heads whither the breezes call. Brought face to face with two attractive possibilities, he deliberately chooses one and rejects the other simply because he wishes for golf more than he does for the good-will of this particular customer.

That faculty which freely determines to select out of a number of possible attractions one particular thing, we call the free-will. Calmly and quietly, a man considers a certain plan; he weighs motives for its accomplishment and dwells on those motives which militate against it; he recognizes that it will be a good thing for him, and yet that it has its disadvantages; and in the end, with all this before him, he is free to choose or reject it, to act or to remain inert just as he wishes and because he wishes.

Our commonest conscious actions are proof positive of this freedom of choice. The alarm-clock rings in the morning; the sleeper knows that he ought to rise promptly; yet instead, he flings a shoe at the clock and rolls over for another quarter of an hour. At last he rises, rubbing his chin regretfully. Really, he ought to shave; still—"Oh, let's get it done during lunch hour." "Journal or Herald?" queries the newsboy. The purchaser hesitates; the Journal has a "bully" sporting page, but the war news in the Herald is always—"Give me a Journal," and he bolts for the L train. Freedom? Why in the simplest conscious actions, from the selection of a cigarette or a necktie to the choice of a candidate for President, man is aware of this sovereignty of choice, this power to cast a thing aside or to take it to his innermost heart.

By way of contrast there are plenty of facts over which we know that we have no control. A man blessed with a normal appetite does not worry whether he can digest his dinner or not; he has nothing to say about it. He does not fuss because his beard grows in spite of his dislike of shaving; all the worry in the world will not stop the growth of a tough beard. We know quite clearly the facts in life that depend on our choice and those we are incapable of touching, and incidentally we recognize there the difference between actions dominated by free-will and those which we cannot influence.

How explain, if man is not free, the elaborate machinery he has built up for his guidance when he has to settle on a choice in affairs of real import? Does the man about to embark on a new business enterprise feel himself physically forced into it as a root is forced willy-nilly through the hard soil? If so, the careful counting of possible expenses and receipts, the consultation with Bradstreet and Dun, the anxious hours with lawyers and banking agents are all parts of an elaborate self-deception. The same necessity which drags the thrown rock downward toward the earth, forces the man without free-will into a particular business.

One striking difference between man and his animal servants is the fact of remorse. A chicken through some hennish freak pecks to death all the yellow chicks in her brood. Still, not the most sentimental humanizer of animals fancies Mistress Hen haunted through long nights by terror-inspiring phantoms of the chicks she has slain. But the world is never without its Gretchens.

Indeed, looking back over his life, a man becomes conscious of the thousand things he could have done and did not do, and of the thousand other things he did in the face of outraged conscience. A denial of free-will makes the fact of remorse another of those unsolved mysteries. Why should Trynan in Eliot's tremendous sketch feel the sword turn in his soul when he looked into the painted face of the dying girl he had ruined? In that very agony of remorse, he was admitting the fact that he might have saved that girl's soul, and instead he had deliberately flung it down to destruction.

In our past lives we recognize two distinct classes of actions: those for which we are responsible and those over which we have had no control. Two friends on a hunting excursion leap from a canoe, gun in hand; one of them slips, his gun spits lead, and his companion falls face downward. There is agony of soul in the survivor, dread of facing the relatives of the slain man, but withal a saving sense of innocence. He has not lost the right to look even the mother of the dead man in the eye. But suppose as he stepped from that canoe he had shot down his companion coolly and deliberately. In that case precisely the same effect would have followed, his companion would have dropped lifeless to the earth. Between that and the death we call accidental there would have been one only difference: in the second case the shot would have been intended, and freely, deliberately fired. Free-will had entered in.

As for the elaborate system of medals and awards with which civilized men recompense their heroes, they are simply another contribution to the gayety of nations unless the actions which they reward are freely done. Medals are not hung on a tree because it served as a shelter for a daring sharpshooter; a drunkard is not treated as a hero, because he fell from an upper window and killed the general of the enemy's army as he passes through the streets below. A hero is rewarded for a brave act, simply because he was not obliged to do it. He shares in some slight degree in the praise St. Paul tendered to Christ: having death set before Him, He chose the cross despising the shame.

The defenders of free-will by no means maintain that the will acts without adequate motive. But most emphatically we maintain that the object which furnishes a motive for a choice is not necessarily the best presented for consideration, has not, objectively considerated, qualities preëminent over those of other objects. Put a bit of iron between two magnets, and it flies inevitably toward the magnet which has the greater attractive force. Put a man between two objects, and the object which he chooses will not necessarily be the better; it will be the one which he wants. A man will refuse a fortune to spite a relative he hates; like Cyrano he will fling his whole month's income on the stage for the sake of a fine gesture. The ultimate reason for his action will be because his free-will has chosen so to act.

Readers of Joseph Conrad will remember how Captain MacWhirr guided the Nan-Shan through the terrors of the Typhoon on the China Sea. Conrad, in one of those gripping descriptions, sums up the taciturn skipper's battle with the elements.

> Jukes could no longer see his captain distinctly. The darkness was absolutely piling itself up upon the ship. At most he made out movements, a hint of elbows spread out, of a head thrown up. Captain MacWhirr was trying to do up the top button of his coat with unwonted haste. The hurricane that has the power to madden the seas, to sink ships, to uproot trees, to overturn strong walls, and dash the very birds of the air to the ground, had found this taciturn man in its path, and, doing its utmost, had managed to make him loquacious. Before the renewed wrath of the winds swooped on the ship Captain MacWhirr found time to declare, in a tone of vexation as it were: "I wouldn't like to lose her."

For the hurricane had hurled its force against the strongest power in the created world, a man's free-will; and material force fell helpless before the power of that spiritual faculty.

Our First Army and Navy Chaplains

THOMAS F. MEEHAN

CHAPLAINS who are either on their way or who are already "over there" will find a very entertaining chapter in the record of their earliest predecessors in the naval and military establishments of the Republic. At the time of the Revolution Catholics formed but a small proportion of the population of the country, about 25,000 out of a total of 3,000,000. The Catholic representation in the ranks of any one command of the Continental armies was not strong enough to warrant the appointment of chaplain priests except for the two regiments, "Congress' Own," which were recruited in Canada. The contingents that came from abroad to help Washington had chaplains provided for them by their own Government.

In 1903 the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs had an official report compiled under the title "Les Combattants Français de la Guerre Américaine, 1778-1783." It gave the roster of the officers and enlisted men of the French regiments and warships participating in our Revolutionary conflict. Every French vessel, except two small cutters, had a chaplain. For the fleets of Comtes D'Estaing, De Guichen, De Grasse and De Ternay there were ninety priest chaplains, of whom seventeen were Capuchins; thirteen Recollects, three Carmelites, two Premonstratensians and four secular priests. There is no mention in the list of any chaplains for the several regiments of Rochambeau's forces, but as some of the larger ships had from three to five chaplains assigned them it may be presumed these ships were transports and that the extra priests served afterward with the troops in the field. There are numerous records of priests, who were with Rochambeau's troops, officiating in New England during the march from Newport, R. I., to Yorktown. Dillon's and Walsh's regiments of the famous Irish Brigade were a part of these forces. Twelve chaplains attended the funeral of Admiral De Ternay at Newport. Among these chaplains was the Abbé Robin, who later made a tour of the country. In 1782 he wrote an account of it and of his experiences in the army. This is the oft-referred to "Nouveau Voyage dans l'Amérique Septentrionale en l' Armée 1781; et du Compte de Rochambeau." Other chaplains were Abbé Colin de Sepvigny, Abbé Bertholet, Abbé Glesnon, Abbé Lacy, and Father Paul of St. Peter, a German Carmelite, who was in Virginia in 1783, whence he went to Philadelphia, from there in 1785 to Illinois, from which station the restless St. Peter's congregation of New York tried to coax him, and finally he was at Iberville, Louisiana, where he died, aged eighty-one years, October 25, 1826. St. Peter's, New York, had as its first pastor the Franciscan, Charles Whelan, who was one of Rochambeau's chaplains. He could not get along with the trustees and left in 1790. Later he attended the missions in Kentucky, Maryland, Delaware and Pennsylvania. He died at Little Bohemia, Maryland, March 21, 1806. Father John Rossiter, who was at St. Mary's, Philadelphia, for a number of years, is also mentioned as a Rochambeau chaplain, and another was the apostate Abbé Raynal.

General Benedict Arnold on January 26, 1776, appointed a Recollect, Father Louis Lotbiniere, chaplain of Colonel James Livingston's regiment of Canadians, and a Sulpician, Father Pierre Huet de la Valiniere, chaplain for the Second Canadian Regiment, of which Moses Hazen was the colonel. They were to be paid £14 10s. a month and rations. Congress enacted, on May 27, 1777, that "There be only one chaplain allowed to each brigade of the army and that such chaplain be appointed by Congress, with same pay, rations and forage as a colonel." Both priests were censured by Bishop Briand of Quebec for espousing the cause of "the Bostonaise."

Lotbiniere died in poverty and neglect at Burlington, N. J., in 1786 after vainly petitioning Congress to recognize his services. Complaining of his treatment he wrote:

> Would to God that i had never known either the general montgomery or arrived in Canada; i would not now starve with hunger and cold for not being payd according to the convention made between general arnold and me the 26 Januarii 1776 and ratified in Congress assembly the 12 August 1776 for long my Life; to indemnify me for having lost my parish.

In 1785 Father de la Valiniere was in New York ministering to the French colony and the following year he became pastor and vicar general at Kaskaskia, Illinois. Here he had as friend and associate the Carmelite ex-chaplain, Father Paul, mentioned above, but the former's restless disposition impelled him to wander through several Western and Southern States during the succeeding years. In 1798 he made his peace with the Canadian ecclesiastical authorities and was allowed to return to his diocese. He spent his last years quietly in the parish of St. Sulpice, where he died on June 29, 1806, aged seventy-four years.

A volunteer chaplain to the Clark Expedition was Father Peter Gibault, whose influence saved Vincennes and that territory to the American cause. "Mr. Gibault, the priest to whom this country owes many thanks for his zeal and services," was the way Governor Patrick Henry of Virginia spoke of him in his instructions to Colonel Clark.

Of the naval chaplains the most notable perhaps was the Recollect Seraphin Bandol, who was on D'Estaing's flag-ship, Le Languedoc. He remained here about ten years and was chaplain in Philadelphia to the French Ministers Gerard and Luzerne. He was in New York in 1784 and said Mass in a private chapel at the French Minister's house, the McComb mansion, on Broadway, near Bowling Green. In Philadelphia he frequently officiated at old St. Joseph's and he was the preacher at St. Mary's Church on July 4, 1779, the first distinctively Catholic celebration of the national fête-day. Congress attended and had the sermon printed as an official document. He was also the preacher at the Te Deum for the victory at Yorktown, on November 4, 1781, and again he officiated at the requiem at St. Mary's, May 8, 1780, for the soul of Don Juan de Miralles, the Spanish agent who died in the camp at Morristown, N. J. It was this ceremony that prompted the traitor Arnold to write to his former associates in Washington's army: "The eye which guides this pen lately saw your mean and profligate Congress at Mass for the soul of a Roman Catholic in Purgatory, and participating in the rites of a Church against whose anti-Christian corruption your pious ancestors would be as witness with their blood."

Father Sebastien De Rosey, a Capuchin, chaplain on L'Indien, after the war served as a missionary for years in Maryland, where he had charge of St. Nicholas' Church, St. Mary's County, and where he died December 27, 1813. The small estate he left went to the State as he had no heirs, and was devoted to help the founding of Charlotte Hall School in St. Mary's County, which is described as not very Catholic in its atmosphere.

As in New York, the founder of the first Catholic church in Boston (Holy Cross, November 1, 1788), was an ex-chaplain, the Abbê Poterie of l'Hector. He was an unworthy priest and was suspended by Bishop Carroll. He had also served on Le Neptune of De Ternay's fleet, which ship had four other chaplains. Of these four, two, Fathers John Wanton (or Watkins) and Francis Hobdai, are each set down in the official list as "American Priest," but so far there has been found nothing to amplify this designation.

Another notable feature of the list are these Irish names: Abbé Maccabe, Abbé Roger Morrison, Abbé Bartholeme Omahony, Abbé John Machuney and Abbé Dowd. In the light of subsequent events it seems strange that none of these remained or returned. To the Capuchin, Father Charles Whelan, founder of St. Peter's, New York's mother church, alone belongs that distinction among the Irish chaplains.

The St. Vincent de Paul Society

To the Editor of AMERICA:

There has been a good deal of pungent criticism in Catholic quarters concerning the Society of St. Vincent de Paul as a relief organization, and comparisons, not always flattering to Catholics, have been made between its methods and those of non-Catholic charitable societies. Its chief shortcomings appear to be its failure to give "adequate" relief, "to keep full and complete records" and "to cooperate with the confidential exchange" by listing the names of the families relieved by the conferences. That there is room for improvement in our system of giving relief in their own homes to Catholic families is true enough; but the installation of a card-catalogue would not mend matters, the views of a few students of the "School of Philanthrophy" to the contrary notwithstanding.

The tremendous immigration during the past twenty-five years from the Catholic countries of Europe has brought with it great problems for the diocesan authorities in the territories where the immigrants have settled in large numbers, problems which could not be settled offhand. There is not only the difficulty of providing religious instruction for the children of these people but there is also the task of organizing some system of relief for them in times of poverty. It must not be forgotten that until very recently "workmen's compensation laws" and widows' pensions were unknown. The writer was a member of a parish conference of the St. Vincent de Paul Society about twenty-five years ago, in a district into which came an immense number of Italian immigrants, who drove out many of the old parishioners. The conference had about a dozen active members and a weekly income of about thirty dollars. With the best of intentions we could do little for our new brethren when poverty came to their doors, and no doubt many of them found their way to the offices of the non-Catholic relief societies. The priest who had charge of the new arrivals had to struggle for years before a church and rectory were provided, and to aid the poor of his flock was beyond his means.

Perhaps if the members of that conference and others similarly circumstanced had been "trained workers" they could have grappled successfully with this and any of the social problems they encountered. I have noticed during the past four years in this city, however, that the trained social worker can deal with any problem on paper, and with the aid of a good press agent can solve it to his own apparent satisfaction; but I have also noticed that when the case is finally "closed with improvement," the poverty and delinquency often remain just as they were before. The branches have been trimmed but the roots remain, and the work must be done all over again without the blare of trumpets.

Our critics should not forget that the members of the parish conferences are only the rank and file of the army of charity. They do not plan campaigns; their business is to "hold on" until they are relieved. The officers of the conferences are for the most part "non-coms," who after long service have risen from the ranks. They have not had the advantage of a West Point or even a Plattsburg training. As a matter of fact, how seldom one meets a Catholic college graduate in the St. Vincent de Paul Society. Is it that the task of counting pennies and dealing out groceries and teaching neglected children their prayers is beneath the dignity of these young men, or is it that the work in the St. Vincent de Paul Society is a sort of "blind alley" job, leading nowhere, not even to mention in the newspapers? Of course, being Catholic college men, they have been instructed in their social obligations.

In the meantime, awaiting the arrival of the reinforcements trained in modern charity warfare, but still with faith unimpaired, we are "holding on."

The Society of the Green Cross

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am begging your indulgence for a little space in your columns to present to your readers a suggestion which I am hoping may accomplish good from the discussion that it may provoke. Day after day the papers are full of the work of the Red Cross, the Knights of Columbus, the Y. M. C. A., and of this and that war-activity committee. Also, I understand there is in formation an organization to be known as the Purple Cross, whose duty it will be to bring back the bodies of our fallen soldiers for burial in this country. Again, there are organizations to care for wounded horses and dogs.

These are all laudable works and deserve full sympathy. But the pertinent thought that strikes me is that they deal mainly with the present. I sometimes wonder if in the excitement of the present we are not apt to overlook the problems of the future. And that they will be serious ones no one can deny.

What we shall do for our soldiers and sailors after the war is to my mind as pertinent and surely more serious and difficult than the problems that confront us at present. The present soon becomes but a memory, the future is always before us.

What I would suggest is the formation now of an organization to study and prepare for the great difficulties that are before us. The need for organization and preparedness for future problems is great and must be met today.

A society organized along the lines of the Red Cross, bringing together the heart and brains of the country for this work could do incalculable good.

Just as nature has made of green the promise of new life, just as we look upon it as a symbol of hope and memory, so, I venture to hope, that in the near future we shall see under Catholic auspices the formation of the Society of the Green Cross.

Dr. Reisner's Own Doctrine

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In connection with Dr. Reisner's absurd charge that the Jesuits of former days, in which our moral standards were lower, "did argue that the end justifies the means," it is amusing to note that the worthy doctor himself actually taught that doctrine as late as 1917! On page 55 of "Church Advertising," published by Lippincott, I come across the statement:

> The Church has a right to use any method to draw people in as long as it remains a church delivering a straight-from-the-shoulder message warmed with human love, vitalized with human conviction, and coming direct from the fountain of truth.

Dr. Reisner writes "any method," which vi vocis would justify the Church in using a sand-bag or a club, to persuade reluctant heretics to be drawn within the magic circle of her influence. No doubt Dr. Reisner will claim that he meant "any method" either good or at least indifferent, but it is amusing to picture what Dr. Reisner would have done, had he found his own passage in an approved Catholic book. And the "straight-from-the-shoulder" talk sounds a bit flat, considering that in his assault upon the Jesuits his methods were anything but straightforward. In this, however, he is but conforming to the tradition high in favor among calumniators of things Catholic.

Children and Peace

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Prayer is never without some kind of merit, therefore we know that the prayer crusade suggested in AMERICA's columns some time ago was not without some avail although it did not gain its definite aim, the cessation of the war. Will God remain deaf to our entreaties if, added to prayers, we offer up sacrifice? Could the Catholic children of the United States make a supreme sacrifice to give up candy from Advent until Christmas for this end? Was not sacrifice the greatest propitiation offered to God under the Old Law and is it not the greatest, too, under the New Law? Are not the greatest boons always obtained at the cost of some great sacrifice? Rather than see the slaughter of our brothers, fathers perhaps, and sons, the race itself threatened with extinction, could we not all unite, children and elders, in denying ourselves some luxury to bend our spirits more humbly in the spirit of prayer that must be heard before the throne of mercy? More than this, there are soldiers in the trenches who are undergoing the keenest privation and suffering for the lack of sugar, actually longing for the taste of sweets! Children abstaining from candy as their sacrifice for peace will be helping these soldiers in more ways than one; it will be an act of conservation, too. "Ye have yet many ways to forsake," writes the holy A Kempis, "and unless they are entirely given up to Me, you will not obtain what you seek."

If the children set the example by their simple act of sacrifice what may we not hope from the result and the example?

AMERICA's call for the public novena of the Immaculate Conception, and the prayers and pious sacrifices of innocent young hearts should be our "trumpet calls to rally to renewed attacks." We must pray harder than before and offer sacrifice to an outraged God for mercy and for an honorable peace to come about soon, if we earnestly desire to save our families from mourning and great sorrow.

The Justification (?) of "Vers Libre"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In a contribution entitled "The Justification of Vers Libre," contributed to the October 27 issue of America, poets are counseled: "If you must sin against accepted canons in literature . . . . . you must sin splendidly." The "Justification" should have followed this good advice. Instead of the sin splendid it dwindles to an apology anemic, thence to an attack acrimonious, and finally explodes in an exhortation. Two of the "benefits wrought by the vers libristes," according to their justifier, consist of the impetus they have given to the poets of the older school. This is fulsome flattery. The third justification declares that the vers libristes have produced "fine and meritorious work." To the critic that denies the fineness and meritoriousness of their work this is a most convincing justification.

There is surely something deeper, more vital and more positive in vers libre than the benefits enumerated. May it not better be justified by its suggestion (in the literary sense of course), by its vividness and its concentration—which are some of the characteristics pointed out by Miss Lowell? Is nothing to be said of its emotional intensity, that grips the soul, nor of the thought-content, presented in a way that impresses the mind indelibly? Nothing of the medium of expression, flexible and strong, artful but not artificial?

Free verse is not intended to supplant Victorian verse; it does not require any extension of the standard definitions of poetry. It is not a new discovery but merely a development of some of the fundamentals found in the older verse. Being unusual it evokes criticism. Its exponents may impress you as being pornographic; I confess that I have been impressed similarly by poets using the classic meters. Its rhythm, based on cadence and not on meter, may sound strange and inharmonious, but did not the critics of an earlier day excoriate the poets who based their meter on accent rather than on syllables? Free verse may be made ridiculous but so may the ridiculers. If the justifier of free verse must "sin against the accepted canons," "let him not sin drably, dully and unintelligibly." However, vers libre needs not justification so much as explanation.

Improve Our Sunday Schools

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Is it not a deplorable fact that Catholics in general, and the clergy in particular, do not take a more active and a deeper personal interest in promoting the efficiency of our Sunday schools? Much has been done, and is being done to make our parochial schools an important part of the educational machinery of the country, but out of 3,000,000 Catholic children of school age in the country, less than half that number are enrolled in the parochial schools. We all know that education can never complete its perfect work without the teaching of religion, and since there can be no teaching of religion in the public schools, it behooves us to do all we can to promote the efficiency of our Sunday schools. Then these Sunday schools will, in some measure, secure for the 1,500,000 and more Catholic children attending them, this absolutely indispensable element in education.

The souls of this vast army of children must be saved to the Catholic Faith. Every child has a right to a knowledge of his Faith, and if, through no fault of his own he is not numbered among those in attendance in a parochial school, his religious education must be obtained in an efficient Sunday school. Religious education is not only a need, but also a matter of absolute justice which the child has a right to expect, and which the parents have a right to demand from their Church. But what constitutes an efficient Sunday school?

The writer has in mind a Sunday school conducted by a priest who also was in charge of a large and well organized parochial school in his parish. In this Sunday school the duties of teachers were so assigned, and their responsibilities so clearly divided, that its operations proceeded with economy of effort, without waste of time or energy. The teachers believed that they were working for the greater honor and glory of God, and they made the effort to develop in themselves and in the children Christian character, based upon the knowledge of the supernatural virtues and teachings of Christ. This priest supervised the work done by his teaching staff; he held conferences from time to time; he provided suitable literature for his teachers, and bade them drink deep of spiritual truths so that like well-filled springs they could give out in abundance what their pupils needed. Written examinations for those in the "class of perseverance" were held each month, and graduation meant the completion of a course of study in Christian doctrine that was most creditable to all concerned.

We frequently hear the destructive criticism that our Sunday schools have failed; to offset this we hear nothing in the way of constructive suggestion for improving conditions. It is undoubtedly true that much time is wasted. Many teachers do little more than hear the lesson and mark the attendance; this being done, time hangs heavily on their hands till the school is dismissed. The teachers either do not or cannot explain what they are teaching, and consequently the children have no interest in the lesson. That priests may become the only teachers of Christian doctrine is a consummation devoutly to be dreamed of, however improbable of realization; but in each and every parish there is a fair percentage of men and women with trained minds, who, under the leadership of a zealous priest, could organize schools of efficiency such as has been described above, where these 1,500,000 and more children would be conserved for the future welfare of their country, by making of them better men and better citizens.

Let us face conditions as they are in many of our Sunday schools today. The vast majority of these 1,500,000 children are left untouched by religious instruction, because many adopt an attitude of irresponsibility for the eternal salvation of the souls of children who do not attend the parochial school; in other words they visit the sins of the parents on these innocent children, and they refuse to hearken to the admonitions of their Saviour who said: "Suffer the little children to come unto me and forbid them not." Let us, as practical Catholics and heirs of nineteen centuries of Christian traditions, understand that we have a special and a solemn obligation to promote the efficiency of our Sunday schools, for there can be no doubt that definitely, specifically, and not uncertainly, the Sunday school has an educational mission.

Our Immaculate Mother

IT is the solemn and consoling doctrine of the Catholic Church that the Mother of God was conceived without the stain of original sin. That teaching is embodied in the Bull "Ineffabilis Deus" of December 8, 1854, in which Pius IX thus defined the dogma:

> We define that the doctrine which declared that the Most Blessed Virgin Mary, in the first instant of her conception, by a singular grace and privilege granted to her by Almighty God, through the merits of Jesus Christ, Saviour of mankind, was preserved from all stain of original sin, is a doctrine revealed by God and therefore must be held firmly and constantly by all faithful Christians.

This definition of the extraordinary prerogative conferred upon the Mother of God was not a new dogma added to the deposit of Faith. It was the crystallization in a doctrinal pronouncement of what had been the belief of Christians for centuries. It was hailed by Catholics throughout the world with enthusiasm. Millions of hearts were thrilled as they saw the hands of the great Pius pointing to the Virgin-Mother of the Son of God and heard him solemnly defining the doctrine which for centuries they and their fathers had believed: that there was no stain and taint in her, that in her the plenitude of grace had ever dwelt, that not for a single moment had the enemy of mankind ever held her in bondage, that the mists and the vapors of the pit had never rested on her brow, that the shafts of concupiscence had been blunted against the heavenly armor of grace which encircled her form.

Mary was to become the Mother of the Creator. The Lord and Master of life, the God of sanctity, the Lover of chastity and the Inspirer of virginity was to abide for nine months in her womb. She was to hold Him in her arms, help Him in His helpless infancy and shield Him from danger. It would have been unworthy of the dignity of the Mother and of the love which her Son owed to her had she been for a single moment under the thraldom of the devil.

She alone then of all the children of men escaped the primeval curse. From the moment her pure soul was infused into her body in the very instant of her conception, she was full of grace, preserved by the power of God and through the merits of her Divine Son from the universal bane that makes us at the very source of our being heirs of wrath and enemies of God. It is no wonder that the Fathers and the Doctors of the Church tell us, in the Words of Scripture that Mary is that garden enclosed which none but the King may enter, the fountain sealed, reflecting in its crystal depths no shadow of earth but only the splendors of the unclouded heavens, the Ark of the New Covenant before which the Evil One stayed his darts, just as the waves of the Jordan poised in their flight before the Ark of the Old. She is the mystic fleece of Gideon drenched by the dews of God's grace while the earth around is languishing with a deadly drought. Like Debora she can sing her song of victory over a more deadly foe even that Sisera and his hosts. She is a more self-sacrificing Esther, a more chaste and a more valiant Judith. In her we hail the second Eve. For as St. Augustine says, if we have fallen in Eve, in Mary we stand. We were enslaved through Eve, through Mary we are made free. If Eve is the cause of our sorrow, Mary is the cause of our joy. Eve formed us, Mary strengthened us. She is a Virgin and a Mother, a creature, yet immaculate, sinless and stainless, a village maid, but a Queen. In her we behold God's masterpiece, the noblest being He has formed, "our tainted nature's solitary boast." Our lips tremble with joy, "our mouths are filled with gladness" as we pronounce her name. Sinners, stained with so many crimes, we dare to call her mother. Yet no marble is white enough to enshrine her virginal form, no gold or gem precious enough to be placed upon her brow. But we can give her our hearts and our love. We can ask her that the hearts of our children, the hearts of the future wives and mothers of the nation may be kept purer and fairer by the thought that their Queen is the Queen of innocence and purity. We have often fervently prayed to her, but never will our prayers be so fervent, so filial as on this Feast of the Immaculate Conception. We shall pray to her for our country, of which she is the official patroness and guardian, for our soldiers, their sorrowing mothers and wives. We shall pray to her for victory and peace, for justice, humanity and self-control. Above all we shall ask that we may be allowed to pay her the homage dearer to her heart than any other we can offer, that of the unceasing imitation of her virtues.

Catholic Women at the Polls

IT is true that on November 6, the constitutional amendment providing for woman suffrage was adopted in the State of New York, by a majority which leaves no room for quibbling. Yet later tabulations of the vote on this amendment, show that the measure was actually defeated in the State at large, and saved only by the voters in the city of New York. The claim has been made, and is at least plausible, that to the Socialistic and other radical elements in the city, is due the credit of turning the tide which ran so strongly against votes for women in the State. Certain it is, that however differing among themselves on other matters, these factions were organized with admirable skill in support of the amendment. It is not reasonable to suppose that the excellent political machine, the product of this organization, will be thrown forthwith upon the scrap-heap. It has proved its usefulness, and therein lies a danger.

Viewed upon theoretical grounds, the extension of the electorate, whether to men or to women, is a measure always fraught with peril. The presumption is, therefore, against extension, and it is incumbent upon the proponents to demonstrate that the advantages may be safely counted upon to outweigh the possible evils. Whether or not this procedure was followed in New York is now of small practical import; the consideration of real present worth is to plan for the future. It is not pessimistic to say that only a wisdom something more than human will save our new voters, as a body, from political absurdities. For some years, the most notable results will probably be a larger and more bewildered electorate, election expenses considerably beyond those hitherto known, and the abuse of the public ear by proposed social legislation of the wildest and most shortsighted variety. Balance will come only with time and the wisdom gathered from experience.

But it would be folly to forget that the "radical wing of suffrage" has a definite program and a definite plan. Anything may happen on election day, unless good citizens do their duty. It is not likely that our Catholic women will be tempted to neglect their homes, for service in the city as aldermen, or at Albany as senators. On the contrary, it is more probable that their temptation will be to let elections and the vote severely alone. That is a danger to be guarded against by prudent foresight. If our Catholic women stay at home, when radicals go to the polls, the worst results prophesied of votes for women will be realized.

Truthfulness and Mathematics

"MATHEMATICS aside from being a utilitarian subject, has a definite moral significance in the development of character" urges a Michigan professor in a plea that the public schools should pay more attention to arithmetic. He maintains that as a rule poor mathematicians are highly accomplished liars. Are far too many of little Mildred's statements found on examination to rest less on fact than on fancy? The cause of the discrepancy can doubtless be unerringly traced to her imperfect mastery of the multiplication table. Does her brother Gerald's accounts of his daily exploits smack too much of the palmy days of chivalry? That is because the solemn truth that the angles of every self-respecting triangle are equal to two right-angles has not yet been brought intimately home to him. In commercial circles is his father's word sometimes justly doubted? The unhappy man was never taught ratio and proportion. Is his gossip-loving wife a render of her neighbor's fair name? The seeds of that grave weakness were sown during her school days when sheer indolence kept her from learning how to find the value of plus in indeterminate quadratic equations.

According to the Michigan professor's theory, children who are forced to realize daily that five times five are twenty-five, not only in this country, but even in Korea, and that the proposition "All right-angles are equal," will forever remain true, even though the Grand Lama of Tibet, backed by his entire hierarchy, should persistently deny it, ought to be filled with such a practical love for truth-speaking that fibs of even the whitest kind will never fall from their lips. The true Catholics of this country, however, have in some way convinced themselves that mathematics alone, though it be as pure as one of the widely advertised baking-powders, cannot make children truthful. Therefore these perverse Papists not only help support with their taxes the public schools but also build and maintain throughout the land at the cost of heroic sacrifices innumerable parochial schools in which their boys and girls are taught indeed a tender love for all the strengthening truths of mathematics, but also learn the infinitely more important truths that "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor" is one of God's Commandments, that "Lying lips are an abomination to the Lord," that Christ is not only the "Life" and the "Way" but the "Truth" as well, and that human veracity is an indispensable bond of civilized society. The children therefore who attend the Church's parish schools are more likely than any others to grow up both staunch Christians and loyal citizens.

Divorce and the Establishment

IN a recent letter to the Living Church, Mr. J. G. Hall indignantly repudiates the "aggressive campaign" led by Sir A. Conan Doyle and others for the grant of larger facilities for divorce. Mr. Hall's words are a plea for the suppression of an evil tolerated in high places, yet an avowed enemy of the Anglican Church could scarcely have framed a sharper indictment of that department of the English Government, known as the Church by law established. Mr. Hall rightly criticizes the campaign as an attempt to substitute immorality for "God's ordinance of marriage," and quotes with approval the strong words of the Bishop of Chelmsford. Not only is divorce anti-social, thinks the Bishop, but it is something essentially evil. It practically destroys marriage and glorifies license. It is contrary to the law of God, and is a scandal to all right-thinking men. Far better disestablishment, is the opinion of the prelate, than that the Anglican Church "should forever be covered with shame for having sold her birthright for a mess of pottage."

The good Bishop is needlessly alarmed. The Church of England has no birthright to sell. What seems her birthright is in reality the property of the State. Furthermore, considering the characteristically vacillating policy of the Anglican Church on matters of such importance in the Christian economy as Baptism and Matrimony, to cover her with any "shame" with which she has not long been familiar, would be a task of supreme difficulty. If divorce be the summation of evil which the Bishop and Mr. Hall, with many other Anglicans, think it is, why does not the Church which claims God's commission to lead the people, anathematize divorce? "God forbid," writes Mr. Hall, "that our natural leaders, the Bishops, should now act as did their predecessors at the time of the first Divorce act in 1857!" There is the answer. The Anglican Bishops, made and unmade at the pleasure of the secular power, will move along the precise lines laid down by the State, and along no others, because they are merely the official administrators of the State's "Department of Religion." If the State wishes to extend divorce, it will extend divorce, and that will be the end of the matter. Grumbling there will be for a time, but no serious opposition on the part of the Bishops. What at first they denounced as disaster, will at last be approved by a safe majority of these loyal servants of the State first and God next, the Bishops. History has few new pages. St. Thomas a Becket has never been a favorite in the Establishment, nor have Anglican Bishops been wont to reckon the shedding of their blood in defense of faith and morals, a possibility of the episcopal career.

Teach Them What to Read

THERE is a diverting story told about a cub reporter on a New York newspaper who enjoyed so keenly a novel of Thackeray's he had been given to read that on the advice of a mischievous friend he journeyed to Yonkers to secure an interview with that well-known author. For he was quite unaware that Thackeray had died in England fifty-four years ago. However weak that young reporter's grasp may have been on the details of the great Victorian novelist's career, nevertheless he was capable of enthusiastically enjoying a good book when he chanced upon one. Can as much be said of the average lad or lassie who is graduated nowadays from our Catholic high schools, or academies or colleges? Close observers sadly shake their heads. Most of these boys and girls can tell you, perhaps, when Thackeray "flourished," for they were forced to "get up" some biographical data concerning him in order to pass an examination, but as for reading his chief works, and particularly with enjoyment,—that they have never done and in all probability never will do. Cannot the grave indictment which the late Canon Sheehan drew up against the secondary schools of Ireland be justly applied to many of our American institutions of learning: For the Canon writes:

> The beauties of English literature, the vast treasures that have been accumulated for centuries by the rich and prolific authorship of great and enlightened men, the hoard of precious thoughts that lie hidden there beneath the covers of books which modern competition has made available for the slenderest purse—all are unknown and concealed from eager and inquiring spirits, who then go out into the world to feed their minds on the only pabulum of which they have ever heard—the garbage of London [New York] flimsies, or the poison of party political organs, where there is neither "truth, justice or judgment." A taste for reading—I mean reading anything wholesome or elevating—is almost unknown in this country. A young Englishman, or a young Scotchman, will be found to have a pretty fair idea of the English classics—a pretty fair idea of what books are worth reading and what books are worthless. And, considering the fact that really half the joy and pleasure of most lives is to be found in books, is it not pitiable that our children's minds should be so starved that, in after life, they cannot distinguish food from poison—the great thoughts that elevate and refine from the pitiable trivialities that weaken the intellect, lower the standards of ethical and moral worth, and create an effeminate and thoughtless people, swayed by passion, and regardless, because ignorant, of the higher principles of reason and public morality?

Catholics employed in our public libraries complain that it is hardly worth while buying Catholic books, they are read by so few, and those few, in many instances, are non-Catholics. As for the great authors of past times, that Canon Sheehan refers to, they seem to be rarely taken out by Catholics, and it is much to be feared that the graduates of our Catholic schools, if they read anything at all, find in the latest worthless or dangerous best-seller all the mental pabulum they desire.

How richly deserving therefore of praise and commendation are those Catholic teachers who succeed in filling their pupils with a love for good books. If our boys and girls were taught during their high-school days what authors to like and why they should like them their education would be half accomplished. If in the beginning their taste in literature is carefully trained, in after years it will continue to be formed and developed by the books they delight in reading. Catholic teachers who can inspire with an enthusiastic love of good reading the boys and girls entrusted to their care have probably won for them a blessing which next to that of the Catholic Faith will prove to the end of life their greatest comfort and safeguard.

The Holy Father's Calumniators

MAD with hatred of the Catholic Church, a faction utterly lost to truth and justice has conducted since the opening of the war a calumny against the Holy Father. The latest calumny was given circulation by the London Morning Post, on November 22. "The Vatican," according to that journal, "is implicated in a conspiracy largely responsible for the recent Italian disasters." No attempt is made to cite facts in proof; nevertheless the Post invites the Government to call the Holy Father to account for this breach of neutrality. In a dignified letter, recorded elsewhere in this issue, Cardinal Gasparri, the Papal Secretary of State, shows that this infamous accusation is nothing but the product of "pure malice."

Despite this, on November 28, the London Daily Mail reprinted a clause, said to be the fifteenth article of a secret treaty signed by France, Italy, Great Britain and Russia. The sole authority for this report was alleged to be a telegram from the Bolshevik Government at Petrograd, a circumstance which makes its value more than doubtful. The clause in question, however, was an admirable step forward in the campaign to discredit the Holy Father.

France, Great Britain, and Russia take upon themselves to support Italy in her disallowing representatives of the Holy See to take any diplomatic steps for the conclusion of peace, or regarding matters pertaining to the present war.

What the Holy Father has done, for more than three weary years, places beyond question, save in the minds of the malicious, his unswerving devotion to justice, his sincere desire for peace, and his absolute impartiality. On September 8, 1914, two days after his coronation, Benedict XV issued his first letter to the world. In terms reflecting his apostolic zeal and the tenderness of his fatherly heart, the Holy Father asked all Catholics to pray fervently that Almighty God might soon restore peace to a blood-stained world. On November 1, he appealed to the warring nations in an Encyclical "Ad Beatissimi," and in his Christmas allocution to the Cardinals, spoke of his efforts to obtain a truce for Christmas Day, and his labors in arranging a plan for the exchange of prisoners.

The work of charity and mercy thus begun at the opening of his pontificate, was continued with renewed fervor in 1915. On January 10, the Holy Father appointed February 7 and March 21 as days on which his children, through prayer and penance were to strive to appease the anger of God. On January 22, he condemned the violations of justice which had marked the war, and reaffirmed his strict impartiality, as Father of all, toward the conflicting parties. On May 25, he implored the Catholic world to beg our Blessed Mother to obtain from her Divine Son a speedy return of peace and tranquillity. On the first anniversary of the outbreak of the war, he again expressed his deep desire that, by adopting the principles of justice, and laying aside the sword, all nations might arrive at peace. On September 6, he exhorted all Catholics to work for the triumph of justice and the restoration of peace, allowing at the same time, the Bishops to sanction for their dioceses, the insertion of the invocation "Queen of Peace, pray for us," into the Litany. At the close of the year, again pleading for peace, he declared that the way to international concord consisted in a clear statement by the warring countries of their respective purposes, followed by conference to fix compensation for all injustice, and to determine, in the spirit of equity, mutual concessions and compensations.

In 1916, by letter dated March 4, the Holy Father again recommended prayer and penance, urging his children to beg the Queen of Martyrs for fortitude and resignation, and for the return of peace. Some months later, he designated July 30 as a general Communion day for the children whose intention was to be the restoration of peace. On September 8, he repudiated the charges made against his impartiality, affirming that he was guided by concern for the common good, since it was his duty to labor not for any set of men or nations, but for all. On December 4, he expressed his hope that society might soon find lasting concord, based on the principles of right and justice. Before the third year of the war had closed, the Pontiff had once more lifted his voice for peace, in documents issued on January 11 and May 5. On August 1, he addressed his famous peace note to the heads of the belligerent nations, a note which, as has been said, "is a monument at once to the universal affection and to the strict impartiality of the Vicar of the Prince of Peace."

Thus the record of the unselfish and heroic work of Benedict XV is clear, open, definite. Nothing but malice can detect in it the faintest trace of injustice or partiality. Against this record, clear, open, definite, we have the unsupported assertion of individuals of the dark-lantern variety, men undeniably partisan, distinguished neither for clear-headedness, charity, nor a keen sense of justice.

The English and American calumniators of the Holy Father have merely begun their nefarious work. It will not last long in this country, unless Americans are ready to substitute calumny for charity, and to accept unsupported accusation for proof.

Literature

AUGUSTIN DALY

AS I was reading "The Life of Augustin Daly" (Macmillan), by Joseph Francis Daly, and was wondering why in the midst of all its interest, the pleasure of its romantic story, the inspiration of its chronicle of achievements, I should feel a sadness that clung to it all, and accompanied its brilliant pageantry like melancholy music off-stage, I chanced to be walking on Broadway. And from a darkened, mournful building there hung a sign, "Daly's," and with it another sign, even more prominent, which said that Moneybaum & Goldstein—or some such firm—advertised the place for sale. And far uptown along Broadway the white lights, and the scarlet, and the yellow, flashed and whirled, and flared, and imitated the jerkings of epilepsy as they advertised the frothy, frenetic, or morbid "drama"—God save the mark!—which, with a few honorable exceptions, seems to prevail today. Then I understood the sadness which accompanied the reading of this book. It is the day of Moneybaum & Goldstein, and the Show Business. Augustin Daly belongs to a past that already seems as ancient as, well, let us say the Elizabethans'.

What a story! And, like all good biographies, like the lives of all men and women who count, it is the story of an epoch, the history of the art, the literature, the society of the long, crowded, brilliant era spanned by Augustin Daly, from his first youthful adventure in play production, in 1856, in Brooklyn (of all places in the world! Brooklyn, the city of churches, New York's bedroom; Brooklyn, of which Maurice Barrymore exclaimed, happening one day by accident to visit it: "In the midst of life, I am in Brooklyn!"), to the end, in 1899.

As a general rule, in this day when commercialism not only rules in Broadway, but in most things mundane, including literature, it is not safe to quote publishers' announcements or any other part of the "canned criticism and comment," manufactured by publishers' press-agents and advertisements, and so cannily circulated through the press and elsewhere; but the pithy statement on the paper jacket of this notable volume is a rare exception to the rule: "This is the story," it says, "of America's greatest theatrical manager—of a man who, without money or influence, struggled through early adventures as journalist, playwright and manager, made and lost fortunes, established theaters in New York and London, took the first American companies to Germany and France, and at last acquired fame on two continents. It is also a record of the New York stage in the middle nineteenth century by one who had an intimate knowledge of its personages and history."

It is this, and more, much more. It is not only the life of a great man; it is the life of a man who was morally great. It is the story of a man who believed and demonstrated, without any preaching on the subject, that honesty and cleanness and soundness and high ideals are essentially the most worth-while factors in art, and in the business of purveying art to the public, as they are in other matters. This is really a revolutionary doctrine, nowadays, when the contrary dogma, which would except all art from all consideration of morality save those dictated by the practical necessity of looking out for the police, is the fashionable one. Instances of Daly's fundamental moral soundness abound in the book. Thus, when at last, after multitudinous set-backs and disappointments, he at last made a success of his first Fifth Avenue theater, his brother, who is his biographer, writes: "The ambition of the manager had been fulfilled. He had established a theater where plays new and old could be fittingly presented and to which young and old could resort with confidence. The home-like atmosphere remained with Daly's Theater throughout his career." Again, when the marriage tie was made legally soluble, dramatic writers vied with one another in treating the subject, chiefly in the humorous way. They have gone on doing so, with increasing boldness, ever since. Daly's "Divorce" was the first American play upon the subject—but he did not see the joke and he did not strive to spread the infection. He did his most serious best, acting through the vastly powerful suggestive agency of drama, to "show that marital disagreements usually begin with self-love and pride, and that they grow out of unions where each party marries for his or her own happiness and forgets the other's." Once more, when he revived Wycherly's comedy, "The Country Wife," for the sake of the wonderfully realized attraction of one of its characters, he so adapted it as to make it a genuine success with the elimination of the odious indecency of the original. This is "bowdlerizing" I suppose. Well, when an expert like Augustin Daly does the "bowdlerizing" it becomes a fine art in itself; like great surgery, it cuts away that which is foul and diseased without injuring the body from which the excrescences are removed. An unskilful surgeon would make a butchery of the same job.

If ever there was a true vocation to follow a particular calling in life, Augustin Daly's was that one. The theater drew him from his earliest boyhood days, in Norfolk, Virginia, where his parents, who were born in Ireland, settled after their marriage. Daly's father was a sea captain, and after his death, which occurred when the future dramatist-manager was a young boy, the widow removed to New York, where Augustin Daly and his brother, Joseph Francis Daly, began at once to haunt the playhouses. Then, while still a youth, Daly plunged into theatrical journalism, becoming critic for no fewer than five newspapers simultaneously!

But he had not been born to write about what he could do as few others were capable of doing, and with "Leah the Forsaken," his first play, produced in 1863, in Niblo's Garden, with Kate Bateman in the lead, he was launched with a great success as a dramatist, in a play which has remained one of the most popular of modern dramas. Many other productions from his pen followed through the long years of his career, with varying fortunes, but Daly as a dramatist would never have been the Augustin Daly whose place is so deservedly high, indeed unique, in the history of American and English drama. He was a creator in the difficult and exasperating art of play management, play production; he was a great interpreter of the dramatic values that escaped the scrutiny of other managers in plays accessible to all. Moreover, he was a master in the even more difficult art of managing artists. He could divine talent or genius in raw recruits passed over by others. Nay, more, and an even more notable evidence of his clairvoyant capacity, he could see in old and seasoned artists, men and women habituated to certain parts and certain customary manners, hidden abilities for doing other and better things, which sometimes they themselves were the last to suspect they possessed. To crown all, he understood, and could convey to others, artists and public alike, his understanding and appreciation of Shakespeare.

The record of his immense labors, as set forth in this stout volume, is perfectly astonishing. That one man could work like this is an inspiration to all readers. And through it all; through all these detailed chronicles of innumerable productions, involving the most exasperating conflicts and differences with sensitive artists, and rivals, and business reverses—what a serenity of good temper did not Daly maintain; what a beautiful ability to make and keep friends in all the ranks of life. His biographer quietly records in one place, very inconspicuously, the fact that in one season alone, in addition to all his own enterprises, he personally supervised or donated five charitable performances. The scores of letters—from great celebrities like Tennyson, and Irving, and Bret Harte, and Mark Twain, and Howells, down to eccentric characters of Broadway—bear witness to the wealth of love which belonged to Augustin Daly. The few words with which the brother-biographer, whose own pride and affection though never obtruded make his work sweet-toned throughout, records the sudden deaths of Augustin's two boys, Austin and Leonard, aged eleven and fourteen years, make beautiful reading. "After this dreadful blow, my brother's heart was filled with a great love and solicitude for all children. He seemed to behold now in all the young, and especially in little wanderers, his own. I have seen him stop a crying child in the street to inquire its trouble, take it by the hand, and restore it to its home. In countless ways he sought to help the helpless." And when, after his death, in Paris, in 1899, and St. Patrick's Cathedral had witnessed the last solemn scene in the master-dramatist's earthly career, his will was opened, it began with a characteristic passage which seems to me to reveal the well-springs of spiritual life which explains the influence and the true success of Augustin Daly: "In making this my last will and testament I ask the forgiveness and prayers of any whom I have injured at any time and freely forgive any and all who have injured me in any way whatever; and I pray that Almighty God may be merciful to us all."

So, even although the sign of Moneybaum & Goldstein, or whosoever it is, now hangs above the darkened and desolated Daly's Theater, and the epileptic advertisements of the commercial stage meretriciously dominate Broadway, the work and the influence of Augustin Daly cannot be in vain.

REVIEWS

A Social History of the American Family. By ARTHUR W. CALHOUN, Ph. D. Vol. I. Colonial Period. Cleveland: The Arthur W. Clark Co. $5.00.

In the preparation of this, the first of three volumes on the American family, "the true claims of the dispassionate historical spirit," writes Dr. Clark, "have been steadily held in view." Yet he rightly fears that to lay aside "prepossessions" for which our earlier historians and novelists are responsible, will be found impossible by many, and these will confound "the disclosures of science with the product of the muck-raker." It should be said at once that Dr. Calhoun is far removed from the mire of the muck-raker. A serious historian, and brave enough to undertake a task from which many have shrunk, he has written a book which cannot be neglected by the student of social science. Dr. Calhoun faced "an absolute dearth of connected and systematic material on the general history of the American family," and if he has not given us that history, he has at least gathered and arranged a mass of fact which brings the work much nearer accomplishment.

With this granted, it seems fairly clear that on more than one point, Dr. Calhoun himself has allowed "prepossession" to obscure the reality of sober fact. In medieval days, he writes (p. 13), "women were regarded sometimes as perils, again as objects of worship." This is frightfully loose writing, embodying a thesis quite incapable of proof. The author, indeed, does not attempt a proof, and it is rather surprising to note, in a work of this character, the guileless reliance placed upon a production so obviously partisan and unreliable as Bebel's "Woman and Socialism." Again, without shadow of proof, or even reference to authority, Dr. Calhoun allows himself to inveigh against that "medieval ecclesiastical jugglery which sold divorces while pretending to forbid them," and to remark that in those days, "chastity was not incumbent upon men." Statements such as these naturally throw suspicion upon the historian's ability to see clearly and judge fairly. As to Luther, Dr. Calhoun has not taken counsel of the panegyrists. That "reformer," he thinks, "looked at morals in a superficial way, as scarcely more than a department of politics belonging to the care of the State"; consequently, he "followed the secular theory of marriage," regarding it as "a worldly, extrinsic thing." It was not strange, therefore, that "the reformers did not always avoid immorality in their loose handling of marriage" (p. 25), that they favored divorce, and "even sanctioned bigamy" (p. 26). Dr. Calhoun paints a dark and unwelcome picture of Colonial life and manners. Yet it is certainly true that "laxity of opinion and teaching on the sacredness of the marriage bond . . . goes back to Continental Protestants of the sixteenth century" (p. 44), and that this laxity soon wrought, not only in Europe, but in New England "horrible moral deterioration among the people" (p. 44). In other words, it is in the "holy reformers," whose fourth centenary now attracts attention, that the main source of sexual sin and matrimonial irregularities in the Colonies is to be found. Dr. Calhoun does not clearly indicate this connection; possibly we may look for a completer and more philosophical summing-up in the final volume, which should by all means contain a copious index. Various Discourses. By the REV. T. J. CAMPBELL, S.J. New York: Joseph F. Wagner, Inc., $2.00.

To mark appropriately and fittingly the fiftieth anniversary of Father Campbell's entrance into the Society of Jesus, which was observed this fall, his many friends persuaded him to collect in this volume some of the more notable discourses bearing on historical, sociological, ecclesiastical and educational topics which he has delivered during the last thirty-five years or more. A mere glance at the titles of the twenty-six addresses in the book and at the subheads which explain on what occasion each discourse was given indicates how wide the range is of this distinguished Jesuit's powers and in what high regard he has been held when an important event demanded a forceful and eloquent speaker. He was chosen to preach, for example, at the obsequies of Father Hecker in 1888, and again at the Paulist Jubilee of 1910. By a very remarkable chain of circumstances Father Campbell is the one who gave the discourse both at Bishop McDonnell's consecration in 1892 and at his silver jubilee last spring. In 1898 Father Campbell explained to the Baptists of Colgate University the Church's teaching on marriage; the following year he told the United States Catholic Historical Society "Who Delayed the Establishment of the American Hierarchy"; while "Jesuit Education," "The Higher Education of Women," "The Only True American School System" and "The Genesis of Socialism" are other papers of permanent value which are included in the volume. Father Campbell's renown as an authority on the history of the Church in North America makes such discourses as "The Reconsecration of the Father Rasle Monument," "The Eucharist in the Early Missions of North America" and "The Unveiling of the Tablet in Honor of Jean Nicolet" particularly interesting and informing. The Ladies of Dante's Lyrics. By CHARLES H. GRANDGENT, A.B., L.H.D., Professor of Romance Languages in Harvard University. Cambridge: Harvard University Press. $1.35.

From among "the sixty most beautiful ladies of the city," mentioned in the poet's "Vita Nuova," the lecturer seeks to segregate and identify the few who have won special tribute in Dante's verse; but without success. His appraisal, however, of the various allusions to fair women in the lyrics makes its learned appeal to the student and lover of Dante, who will not let the least grain of a new revelation about their favorite escape them. To such a one the book will be full of interest. Pietra is a "creature of flesh and blood, the object of a transient and belated infatuation," Matilda and the "Beauteous Lady" are one and the same, Lisetta is "Lady Philosophy," and Beatrice "The Gentle Lady." Three other ladies are occasionally referred to, the same probably behind whom Dante attempted to hide his devotion to Beatrice. Professor Grandgent draws the following conclusion from his study of "The Ladies of Dante's Lyrics":

> First Dante's fancy is stirred by a real person; then having come to regard this person as a symbol of something abstract, he little by little loses consciousness of the reality and consecrates himself to the cult of the symbol. Having reached this last stage, he believes, or tries to persuade himself, that his whole experience has been an allegory. Thus the sympathetic little creature who, looking down from a window, inspired in the poet a sentimental affection, was transformed into Lady Philosophy, "daughter of God, queen of the universe."

The lectures in the volume were given last February in the city of Cleveland, according to the provisions of the McBride Lecture Fund of Western Reserve University. W. T. T.

Russia as I Know It. By HARRY DE WINDT, F. R. G. S. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co. $3.00.

The author of this interesting book, who tells us that he has lived four years in Russia and traversed about 50,000 miles of its territory, describes for English-speaking readers the city and village life the Russians of today lead, tells what curious customs they have and what a vast empire they inhabit. Russian Asia, it must be remembered, covers an area of nearly 6,000,000 square miles, a region big enough to hold the entire United States, including Alaska, and all the countries of Europe besides except Russia, whose 200,000 square miles would not fit in. The population of Russia is now about 180,000,000, and is increasing so rapidly that the author computes that in fifty years it will number 300,000,000 souls. The country, moreover, will easily support them, for Russia's resources are practically unlimited. Of especial interest are Mr. De Windt's chapters on "My Friend the Moujik," on "The Cossack in Peace and War," "Darker Siberia" and "Frozen Asia." The town of Yakutsk, which is situated in Northern Siberia on the Lena River, enjoys the reputation, he tells us, of being perhaps the most isolated, uncomfortable and depressing town in the country. It is credited with being "the coldest place in winter and the hottest in summer in the world." The soil is frozen to a depth of 700 feet, forty inches of which thaw out during the warm season. The author also assures us that the Siberian Tchuktchis are "without exception the filthiest race" in creation, and that their favorite amusement is drinking heavy potations of cheap American whisky and then merrily shooting at one another. Though many of Mr. De Windt's pages will make readers suspect that he is whitewashing the Russians considerably, the volume seems to be full of accurate, first-hand information about that little understood race and their country.

Great Possessions. A New Series of Adventures. By DAVID GRAYSON. Illustrated by THOMAS FOGARTY. Garden City, N. Y.: Doubleday, Page & Co. $1.30.

It may be safe to say that when many of David Grayson's contemporaries are not even a name, a book like "Great Possessions" will still appeal; it has the human touch that will make it do so. And yet it seems equally safe to assert that the book will never have a large circle of readers. What friends it will have must be few and fit. Graysonianism is fast becoming a cult, and supposedly connotes limitation of membership. If you have ever enjoyed such simple things as biting the twig of a birch tree, smelling the sweet white violet, reading in the open fields, whiffing the odors of a coming meal, seeing May coloring the wild-grape leaves along country walls, inhaling the despairing fragrance of grass freshly cut, trudging through snowdrifts, caring for a garden, doing a bit of farm work: then you are among the chosen few. You will read appreciatively and interestedly, wondering the while, all through this book of such experiences and adventures as come to one who is alert for them, who realizes that eye and ear can be trained to see and hear as well as that the nose and tongue can be made to enlarge our researches magnificent. Only if you have found and studied and loved for yourself the wild flowers of our Eastern fields—buttercup, chickweed, wild rose, geranium, hepatica, laurel, trailing arbutus, aster, goldenrod, daisy, boneset, Solomon's seal, blue flags, five-fingers—you will feelingly understand David Grayson's claim that these are "Great Possessions." Only if you can pierce below the surfaces of men, auctioneers, line-men, soap-box orators, millionaires, stone-masons, farmers, herb-gatherers, and can see there prospects that thrill and delight, will you understandingly feel what David Grayson's allusions to these several classes mean. But not enough is made of all these wonderful things spread out for our daily enjoyment to cause thanks to well up in our bosoms to the Giver, God, and to lead to the reflection of the more transcendently wonderful beyond. Too much insistence is placed upon our life here, and in this lies danger to the permanency of the book. "On any terms life is good. The only woe, the only Great Woe, is the woe of never having been born. Sorrow, yes; failure, yes; weakness, yes; the sad loss of dear friends, yes! But oh! the good God: I still live!" The book is very well written, and finely illustrated in color and black and white by Thomas Fogarty, whose pictures are appropriately of the field, fieldy.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The six best-selling novels during October, according to the Bookman, were these: "Christine," Cholmondeley; "The Dwelling Place of Light," Churchill; "Long Live the King," Rinehart; "The Soul of a Bishop," Wells; "Extricating Obadiah," Lincoln, and "The Salt of the Earth," Sidgwick. All but the last two have already been reviewed in these columns. "Extricating Obadiah" (Appleton, $1.50) is another wholesome story of Cape-Cod folk by the creator of "Mary-'Gusta," but it is not so interesting and well-constructed a story as the latter. It tells how the resourceful Captain Noah Newcomb extricates Obadiah Burgess, his former cabin-boy, from the difficulties and embarrassments in which the sudden acquisition of wealth involves him. "The Salt of the Earth" is a war-novel which professes to interpret the German mind and stimulate American patriotism.

"Great French Sermons" (Herder, $1.90) is a reprint of translations from the sermons of Bossuet, Bourdaloue and Masillon, edited by the Rev. D. O'Mahony, B. D., B. C. L. The versions are well done and preserve the spirit of the original, and the selection is to be commended. The book makes accessible to English readers some of the greatest masterpieces of the art of preaching.——"The Boyhood of a Priest," by Armel O'Connor, and "Devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus," by the Rev. R. Ratcliffe, S.J. (Benziger, $0.50 each), are two little books of solid piety. The author of the first is a layman, but gives good counsels to lads who are nursing a Divine vocation. Modesty he well calls "the soul's appreciation of the body's dignity."

"Lucky Bob," by Francis J. Finn, S.J., and "At the Foot of the Sand Hills," by Henry S. Spalding, S.J. (Benzinger, $1.00 each), are new stories for boys. The first tells of the varied adventures of a lad who is cast off by his father, takes to the flowing road, and meets such original characters as Tom Temple and such amiable people as the Reade family. Bob's cheerful disposition wins him his way everywhere. Father Spalding's hero is Walter Blakestone, a Chicago youngster whom his friend, Dr. Murt, teaches how to shoot wild ducks and other small game. There is a good description of a sand-storm in the book and a plot winds in and out.——"Müvver and Me" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.00), by Robert Livingston is well described as "a little book of old-fashioned rhymes for new-fangled kiddies," and contains two dozen sets of verses which relate the daily doings of a little boy, a little girl and their mother. Milo Winter's numerous pictures are real illustrations.——It is much to be feared that Catholic readers will find that Florence Converse's "The Blessed Birthday, a Christmas Miracle Play" (Dutton, $0.75), deals too familiarly with the Christ-Child to be acceptable.

"Charred Wood, a Mystery Story" (Reilly & Britton, $1.25), by "Myles Muredach" (Rt. Rev. Francis C. Kelley), is a healthy, better-for-the-reading mystery story which is commendable in every phase and will be thoroughly enjoyed by every reader of taste. Mark Griffin falls in love with Ruth, the pretty and winsome heroine, only to find that a mystery is connected with her life. He is loved in turn and then discovers an accepted rival. The solution of this maze forms the plot of the story, introducing in its solution an absorbing affair of international consequences. One of the chief characters of the story is Father Murray, a priest, artistically drawn and giving, in an unobtrusive way, a splendid portrayal of the Catholic church. The book deserves a large circulation and the author sincere congratulation.——The scene of "In Spite of All" (Benziger, $1.00), by Edith Staniforth, is the romantic English north country at the time of the Boer War. It is a story, Catholic in tone, with a good plot and interest sufficiently sustained. The rapidity with which hearts appear as trumps near the close of the book is somewhat bewildering. The character of Charlie is true to life and winning.—— Abbie Farwell Brown's "Surprise House" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.00), is an instructive and amusing story for boys and girls, centering on an eccentric aunt's legacy of a library filled with all sorts of surprises. Mary, twelve years old, the lucky heiress, is led by the Shakespeare-quotation process not only to a love of the great poets, but to the several hiding places of treasure Aunt Nan has contrived.——Kentucky has suffered much at the hands of nightriders and novelists, but "Kildares of Storm" (Century, $1.40), by Eleanor Mercein Kelly, is a cruel and unmerited blow. "People might do such things," says one of the characters, "but they wouldn't sit around and talk about them." The criticism aptly applies to this prosy book, which tries to be naughty but succeeds only in being vulgar and stupid.

"For France" (Doubleday, $1.50) is a handsome volume made up of stories, poems, music, drawings, etc., which more than a hundred of America's best-known men and women offer as tributes of admiration to our sister-republic. Cardinal Gibbons reminds the reader what the Church in this country owes to France; Gertrude Atherton describes what "Two Heroines of France" did, John McCormick writes a page on "Ireland and France," and the allusions to Joan of Arc as typifying her country's spirit are quite frequent. Some of the passages submitted by their authors are not particularly appropriate, and others appear to have been unfortunately rescued from the waste-basket. We could well have spared, for instance, Mr. Huneker's contribution. The following poem, "France," by Percy Mackaye, is of a higher quality than most of the verses appearing in the volume:

Half-artist and half-anchorite,
  Part siren and part Socrates,
Her face—alluring faïr, yet recondite—
  Smiled through her salons and academies.

Lightly she wore her double mask,
  Till sudden, at War's kindling spark,
Her inmost self, in shining mail and casque,
  Blazed to the world her single soul—Jeanne d'Arc!

The Christmas note is sounded in the December Catholic World by Charles Phillips' excellent paper on "The Drama of the Nativity," in which he describes the wealth of literature we have on the subject, and by the following poem of Franklin C. Keyes, entitled "Christmas":

The great folk of the little town
  They turned their Lord away
"There is no room within!" they heard
  The gruff inn-keeper say,—
And morning came, and no one knew
  That it was Christmas day.

Upon the pinnacle of time
  Those careless people stood,
The centuries had met that night
  In Bethlehem the good,
And from the dawn each claimed its name.
  Yet no one understood.

O Bethlehem, the ages pass
  And leave that night behind,
And still the inn is full of mirth
  Where many men go blind,—
But some have gone into the night
  Thy little Child to find.

EDUCATION

The Saving Sense

OF all Shakespeare's exquisite comedies "As You Like It" should be reckoned the teacher's own. Not so much that we "comates and brothers in exile" are quite free from the "peril of the envious court," and find sweet "the uses of adversity" nor that "This our life exempt from public haunt Finds tongues in trees, books in running brooks, Sermons in stones and good in everything," but therein is depicted in varied forms a quality most indispensable to the successful pedagogue: the saving sense of humor. Neither morbidity nor mawkishness is his fit colaborer; it is the virtuous mean of humor that puts to flight the one and the other. It is an excellent antiseptic as the years plod along, and an efficient prophylactic against professorial eccentricities and pedagogic excesses. Being nothing more than a well-developed sense of proportion it can grasp the incongruous, laugh at the ludicrous, diffusing all the while brightness on blue Mondays and sunshine on rainy Fridays.

An Indefinable Something

The writer will not attempt here to define the saving sense of humor. For he recalls the lamentable end that overtook that professor who never used a term, the definition of which he could not give according to its proximate genus and specific difference. Having made this his proud boast, the word "humor" one day escaped from his lips, whereupon a pupil promptly asked for a definition of the word. The professor was distraught, insisted that the time for questions had not yet come, but promised a full reply at the weekly repetition. On the morrow something unheard of occurred, the professor was excused from lecture. He had hid himself among the tomes of the college's spacious library, in secret consultation with all commentaries, glossaries and dictionaries marked "H," but his search was in vain. Waiving then the definition of humor let us study it in the threefold aspect so delightfully portrayed by the great dramatist.

Touchstone

THE "clownish fool" makes an early appearance. The chiding he receives for his first quip makes him bemoan the fact "That fools may not speak wisely what wise men do foolishly." He is perhaps Shakespeare's most delectable fool, but a fool all the same. "Thou speakest wiser than thou are aware of." His retorts are not all courteous nor his reproofs all valiant. Professional humor surfeits soon. It has a rather doubtful place in any classroom. Pleasantries carefully set in a notebook, learned and conned by rote may serve to liven a dull hour, but that real spontaneity so essential to humor is lacking. The professor's prepared facetiae are usually greeted by that insincerest of laughters, the forced chuckle of the tactful subordinate. Above all is it against all canons of up-to-date pedagogy to keep a stock in trade wherefrom are drawn at set intervals witticisms of questionable age, none the better for their careful preservation on the margin of the lecturer's manuscript. However, though professional humor is apt to be awkward and inartistic, it were better to be preparedly pleasant than not pleasant at all.

Jacques

THE humor of Jacques is not so obvious. He is called "Monsieur Melancholy" and herein is his great glory. But meeting with Touchstone he is enraptured and craves as his fit apparel the fool's motley.

"O that I were a fool!
  I am ambitious for a motley coat."

We have always felt greatly consoled at the play's end when Jacques will not join in the dancing melodies and true delights of the nuptial festivity, but hies him off to meet Duke Frederick that with him he may embrace the religious life and forswear the pompous court. How fortunate that he did not go to some teaching Order! Such cynical humor as his should not find a place in the classroom. He is a self-absorbed individual ever craving to give vent to his satirical inspirations. His wit is that of the fault-finder, his sententiousness that of the misanthrope. No matter where, in forest or at court, he never lacks material for censure. Ever ready to chide or satirize others, he frequently cuts with that bitterest and cheapest of weapons, the sharp tongue of sarcasm. The potion of his humor is rarely served well-seasoned; his fun must be mixed with gall. His supply of cold water would chill those less gifted with a sense of humor, but he meets his match in Orlando.

Jacques: I thank you for your company; but good faith I had as lief have been myself alone.
Orlando: And so had I: but for fashion's sake I thank you too for your society.
Jacques: God b' wi' you! let's meet as little as we can.
Orlando: I do desire that we may be better strangers.

How too he repines at the chase's cruelty and heaves forth groans and moans for a wounded stag; yet at the service of venison we doubt if Jacques was the most thoughtful of others. Sarcasm often has as its inseparable companion a churlish conceit which always rejoices that its owner is not like the rest of men, though the rest of men might most sincerely thank God for the same. For Jacques observes:

> I have neither the scholar's melancholy which is emulation; nor the musician's which is fantastical; nor the courtier's which is proud; nor the lawyer's which is politic; nor the lady's which is nice; nor the lover's which is all of these: but it is a melancholy of mine own, compounded of many simples, extracted from many objects, and, indeed, the sundry contemplation of my travels, on which my often rumination wraps me in a most humorous sadness.

A most humorous sadness! Rather a most sad specimen of humor. Jacques is a most attractive creation of Shakespeare's dramatic genius. He looks well on the stage and his sayings are often quoted; but on the real stage of life where real men and real women are the players and have real entrances and real exits, no Jacques is wanted at any one of our seven ages, least of all before that of the "whining schoolboy, creeping like snail unwillingly to school."

Rosalind

OUR third type is the happiest and healthiest of all:

"Let no face be kept in mind
But the face of Rosalind."

Her sportive nature sheds a radiance over everything. To many others besides Orlando her sweet gaiety and delicious freshness make her, "The fair, the chaste, and unexpressive she." Her sense of humor is surely saving; when she appears the weather indications are: Fair and continued moderate temperature. Her perfect grasp of what will please and of what will not, makes her roguish merriment drop "like the gentle rain from heaven upon the place beneath." All seems so natural we could not have imagined her acting otherwise. She is consistently merry and inoffensively jocose. What a pleasant jest that she is the confidante of Orlando in his ecstacies over her undisguised self, and becomes substitute for herself when he practises love-making to his Rosalind. What marvelous inventiveness she displays, what delicious persiflage she indulges in. Thus she recounts, for instance, the marks of a man in love: "A lean cheek . . . a blue eye and sunken . . . an unquestionable spirit . . . a beard neglected . . . and everything demonstrating a careless desolation." Her quick, bright retorts, unmixed with the dross of bitterness or sarcasm betray a sense of humor which if realized in the classroom would go a great way towards making the long hours less weary, stale, flat and unprofitable. It is easy to be ponderous, for unabridged dictionaries and encyclopedias, however convenient for reference, rarely stimulate and inspire. They are rather dull substitutes for the viva-voce explanation that falls from the lips of one who can view a subject in a happy pleasant way and drive home a lesson by a brisk up-to-date illustration. In the classroom mistakes are of course made, but not always by the pupils. Without a sense of humor the foibles and follies of our charges, their intellectual eccentricities and incessant vagaries render the teacher's life a martyrdom of monotony. This work-a-day world is indeed full of briers, but to Rosalind they are burs thrown upon her in holiday foolery which she simply "hems" away. Granted a keen perception of incongruities with a happy gift for discovering their bright side, and the still happier grace of always choosing the kindlier, more sympathetic view, the pedagogue ceases to be the traditional bespectacled fanatic in frowns and becomes the elder brother who takes pride in each forward step made by his pupils. He will not marvel that the younger members of the family do not grasp fully and faithfully in five short minutes what has taken him five long hours and more to master. The saving sense of humor sees another's point of view; it can sympathize as well with those in joy as with those in sorrow. "Well, I will forget the present condition of my estate to rejoice in yours." A keen perception of the humorous drives away the fault-finder; it is proof against carping criticism and is the touchstone of character, for it finds good in everything. It makes teaching "as you like it."

SOCIOLOGY

Into the Temple

IT has always seemed to me that one of the most witheringly scornful passages in the New Testament is that from which the caption of this article is taken: "Two men went up into the temple to pray." Quite aside from the purely Scriptural interpretation of the passage, a contemplative reading of the parable will reveal a world, or even an eternity, of scorn intended for the proud head of the man or woman who avoids the issue.

It will not be difficult to find a modern application. Those who avoid the issue are as numerous in our day as in the olden time though their ways may be different. Often we do not draw near enough to home when we grow pensive on modern problems; we are apt to wander far from the direct path to apply some right principle, which exactly fits our own laxity, to a fallen brother. When one hears an exceptionally sharp sermon, to seek to fit what one has heard to an openly careless brother or sister, is human nature. Somehow or other it is an exceedingly rigorous thing to get into a disposition which will lead us up to the grill for a roasting. It is the beam and the mote: we can see the one because distance gives perspective and because weak human nature prefers to pass by the too closely personal. And so, as I am showing, even as I write of it, the defect in one's own makeup goes unnoticed.

"Something Must Be Done"

WHEN I hear business men discussing practical economics in the form of better wages, improved working conditions, and shorter hours, I sometimes get a mental renewal of that Scriptural word-picture of the men who went into the temple to pray. Often in such discussions there is great bandying of words; arguments based on "overhead expense," "the necessity for helping the worker," "the ideality of being a real man," and similar sonorous, though unpractised, sentiments are perplexingly plentiful. Generally there is in these symposia a deep-seated conviction that thousands of workers are not being given a chance to lead a decent life; that many men are dragged into twentieth-century paganism because their hours of work make church attendance impossible; that many women are being forced out of the home by economic necessity. There is as often a feeling expressed that "something" should be done to remedy conditions. Time after time I have watched the discussion wax warm and wrathful; I have marveled at the dexterity with which the debaters threw plan after plan into the hopper of talk; and I have marveled even more when I watched the inconsiderable grist of social legislation that was sometimes the result. The consensus of opinion was that this and that and the other should be legislated into helpfulness.

I do not care to enumerate the number of these gatherings it has been my misfortune to attend. In the capacity of journalist, and not as one who has power to employ another, I have been present at a goodly number. Invariably these gatherings have eventuated in the manner which I suggested a moment ago; legislation. It appeared to be the only "sure cure" for the problems which have arisen between him who labors and him who pays for the labor.

Moneybags and Efficiency

THE ironic part of business men's legislative methods of industrial salvation becomes apparent when one is introduced to the speakers. Let us make the acquaintance of several. In a recent gathering a capitalist was the leader of the discussion, as became his forcefulness. Now, let it be known that in his office he employs seventy-five girls. Their average weekly wage is $5.50. During the monthly discounting periods, these young ladies have to report for evening work which stretches out its weary length until it breaks into the semi-gloom of the following morning. There is a State law which prohibits the employment of female workers for a longer period than eight hours a day. Yet the capitalist would seek to curb the rapacity of employers by legislation. Poor fellow, he simply lacks the power of bringing the application home to himself.

Another vociferous pleader at this ensemble was an efficiency engineer. He might be pictured as the highest type of driving, twentieth-century, business man. He can grade blood-pressure in terms of work down to the last foot-pound. Working conditions, he argued, should make it possible for employees to discharge their duties with ease and pleasure. I have been in his office. It is a blank wall on three sides; the open side faces an alley which is unpaved and collects water from a foundry across the way. Winter and summer a cloud of ill-smelling steam ascends to the windows of that office, enters and is breathed by the workers. The office, the brain of the corporation, is in the least desirable portion of the building. There is no fire-escape, and in spite of the fact that breathers of such air could not develop athletically, in case of fire they would be expected to go unaided from their third-story shelf safely to the ground. A State law requires that all three-story buildings housing many people, shall be provided with fire-escapes.

Business is Business

I HAVE reserved Mr. Business-is-Business because he is the least agreeable of the conferees to meet. Once upon a time I worked for him. He tried to drive every human sentiment out of me by drilling me in his favorite motto, "Business is business." In his counting-room it was taboo to indulge the slightest thought for others. Courtesy was knocked into the corner by a brutal, official "Get to work!" Women received the same uncompromising treatment as men. To display a picture or a flower on desk-top was placing a match to a magazine. Gossip, chat, greetings, the little nameless courtesies of daily life that do so much to drive out the gloom and bring in the joy, were indulged sub rosa, if they were indulged at all. Mr. B. had a way of lifting his eyes suddenly from his work to dagger any offender back to his task in discomfiture, and it never failed to quell the bravest. There was no cessation, no easing-up, no comradeship, no humanity in that office. We could not even admire Mr. B. because he drove himself hardest of all; but now and then, when the occasion was favorable, we would whisper wonderingly to one another about his powers of endurance and ask: "How does he do it?"

Yet Mr. B. suggested legislation as a remedy for economic problems. What possible good would legislation do for the workers in Scrooge's office? Here an employer had within his reach a number of men and women who were actually beggared of companionship during their working day. Their business life was a congealing process; cold, stark misery. Kindness would have changed it all. But Mr. B., as I look back on our experiences with him, was not once kind to me, save when he dismissed me.

Yes, many men go up into the temple to pray; those who hypocritically pray and prey are the worst.

NOTE AND COMMENT

A Test of American Democracy

PERHAPS the most hopeful sign of American democracy is the fact made manifest in the aftermath of the New York elections, that neither newspaper influence nor the power of money was able to corrupt the voters. Alluding to this exhibition of inherent vigor in our national institutions, the new York American writes:

> It is to the everlasting credit of the three-quarter million voters of New York that they refused to be corrupted in the last municipal campaign by the expenditure of one million two hundred and twenty nine thousand six hundred and ninety-five dollars by the Mitchel Fusion Committee. It is a significant and inspiring commentary upon the integrity and independence of the vast body of the men who make up the voters of this world metropolis that they preserved their civic character and their individual concept of popular government in the face of this colossal slush fund, which big business and the selfish corporations had massed and marshaled to control the election.

If the election had done nothing more than to break down "blind faith in the sheer insolent power of money to do anything" we might well be grateful for its results.

Interesting Letters from Little Folk

INTERESTING reading are the letters from the little folk who so heroically save their pennies, until they can send them for the purchase of a heathen baby, when at last the necessary five dollars have gathered in the home bank or in the class mission-savings establishment. "The babies must be awfully cheap in your country," reads one class-letter to the director of the Holy Childhood, "you couldn't buy them around here for five dollars." The boys, who apparently had indulged in romantic literature, wanted the baby named either "Cassabianca" or "Gwendolin," but the girls voted to give her the more glorious name of Our Lady, "because we want the Blessed Virgin to watch over our god-child." The motto of one little financier, doing successful business for the Kingdom of Heaven, was: "Save your pennies and buy a ticket for a poor dying baby's entrance into Heaven." Encouraged at home and aided by his sisters, he had placed some fifty Holy Childhood mission banks in the hands of generous friends. In one year the little circle gathered forty dollars for the noble cause. "We have enough money to buy sixteen little heathen babies," write the pupils of St. Kilian's school, Hartford, Wis., in an outburst of enthusiasm. "We are sending eighty dollars and the enclosed list of names of which we are very proud. Whenever we had five dollars the Rev. Father came over in school and then we named our baby, and drew little slips of paper to see who would be sponsors." The sending of five dollars to secure the Baptism of a pagan child is a custom evidently not to be restricted to children. It is a beautiful way of winning God's favors for ourselves and in particular for our own little ones, and of remembering the departed. "Today is the birthday of our little Marie, who departed this life for Heaven several weeks ago," a friend of the dear child angel writes. "She cares naught now for the presents we could give her; and yet there is one gift which we will send her and which will please her. It is the souls of two little heathen children." They were to bear the name of Marie and of the friend who had ransomed them for her. Surely the Christ Child will be pleased even far more greatly with the same sweet birthday gift.

A Jewish Judgment on the National Teachers' Agency

THE American Israelite does not find AMERICA severe enough in its exposure of the unwarranted action of the National Teachers' Agency in asking for Protestant teachers to fill certain vacancies in our public schools. The recent correspondence upon this subject, printed in our columns, may make plain that humor is no less effective a weapon than denunciation. The Israelite writes:

> AMERICA, a leading Catholic journal, in a humorous editorial calls attention to a circular issued by the National Teachers' Agency, Inc., asking for teachers to fill vacancies in a number of schools in the smaller towns in each of which it is specified that the applicant must be Protestant. AMERICA is inclined to treat this matter lightly, but it is far from being a trivial thing. It is a symptom of a growing desire on the part of a certain class of Protestant churchmen to exclude as far as possible from all the higher employments those who are not adherents of their particular church. It is a mild form of persecution, which can be followed because it is not absolutely unlawful, however contrary to American ideals. "The end justifies the means," it has been claimed, is the motto of the Jesuits. The fact is, that to a very large degree, it is the rule of action of most religious denominations where the interest of their church or the winning of followers is concerned.

Thus the fire into which the poor Jesuits, like the three Hebrew youths, are cast, breaks forth quite unexpectedly to devour their tormentors.

The Pro and Con of Evolution

AN enlightened disquisition upon the subject of "Evolution: Pro and Con" is offered in the pages of the Presbyterian. A speaker is introduced as addressing a local society for the study of science, and his discourse is thus briefly summarized:

> In the opening of his address he said that he felt there was a good deal to be said for the Darwinian theory, but he regretted that it was presented in popular lectures and college classrooms from one point of view only. The theory that all the heterogeneous universe was evolved from one primordial homogeneous "world-stuff" was attractive until one learned that new, irresolvable elements are being discovered every day. Tyndall's theory that "matter contains in itself all the powers and potencies of life" has lost some of its luster since fifty years of continuous research and experiment still fails to produce organized from non-living matter. The theory that all the various forms of animal life are developed from simple origins is quite taking until we learn that, many as are the variations of species, the lines that divide orders of life have never been crossed in historic or geologic times. The exhibits made of ptarmigans changing their colors with the advance of snowy weather as due to nature's "protective colorization," seemed almost conclusive until we note that the crows never get white, and crows multiply faster than ptarmigans. And when he reminded his auditors that Huxley said the skeleton of a ten-pound dog, and the skeleton of a cat of like size were almost identical, but that there were fifty or more differences of structure to be accounted for before we could ascribe cat and dog to a common ancestry, the speaker rested his case.
> The society promptly proceeded to elect him an honorary member.

A Caution for Christmas

A CORRESPONDENT who writes to us that he has three children in a parochial school, but does not want to see them participating in any festivities in which "tinsel, toys and flimsy dresses are banked against lighted candles," believes that the following Christmas recommendation from the State Fire Marshal Department of the State of Kansas might well be taken to heart by Catholic parents and the heads of Catholic institutions in charge of children:

> Christmas trees at home should be decorated with metal tinsel and white asbestos fiber. Cotton, paper and other inflammable material never should be placed on a Christmas tree anywhere, and especially at this time, cotton, so necessary in the manufacture of clothing and war munitions, should not be wasted in unnecessary decorations. Set the tree securely so that there may be no possibility of the children tipping it over. Avoid the use of candles on trees. If you think you must have candles, see that the children do not light them. Children and matches are a combination that frequently results in an untimely death. When Christmas is over clean up the trash and haul the tree away at once or burn it in some safe place. A dry Christmas tree is tinder ready for the spark. Don't let a tragedy occur this year that will spoil all your future Christmases.

Prudent advice is welcome, even when given, as the correspondent somewhat timorously observes, by "a man from Kansas." Yet who would be heartless enough to suggest the entire elimination of candles from the Christmas tree in the home itself! Such sentiment, however, should not dispense us from the caution wisely recommended by the Kansas fire marshal.

Small-Farming System for Soldiers

THE building up of a small-farming system after the war is urged by Senator Harding of Ohio. The 2,000,000 soldiers returning from the front, he argues, will be weaned away from their former tasks and associates. If canvasses are undertaken months ahead of the disbanding of the armies, and due preparations made, a great proportion of these young men, he believes, could be induced to establish a farm home.

> The Government should see to it that land is available at fair prices. There are great tracts of idle land throughout the country. Much of it is for sale at a fair price. There is plenty of capital available that is ready for investment in that land if proper arrangement is made for its development and sale. It probably will not be necessary that the Government should actually handle the land. It should be handled under Government supervision, with a guarantee of certain maximum profits.

One obvious difficulty will be that these young men are without any experience in farming. At all events, however, some at least may be induced to avail themselves of the opportunities the Government is able to offer them. Various measures, all looking towards the accomplishment of this same end, have been introduced into Congress during recent sessions. The plan itself is doubtless commendable, and, if successful, would greatly benefit the nation. If any such measures are taken Catholics should see that the young men of their own Faith are placed in locations where opportunities for church attendance will not be wanting to them. Senator Harding advises that the experiment be begun now by placing dependents of soldiers upon such small farms.

Chronicle

The War.—Continued pressure from the Germans on the British lines around Cambrai has forced Field Marshal Haig's troops to yield more of the ground won under General Byng's advance of November 20. The pressure this week was first felt between Gonnelieu and Marcoing, and except at La Vacquerie and east of Marcoing where the British line had to be withdrawn, the German attack was at first withstood. By December 6, however, the London War Office announced officially that the British troops holding the salient in the neighborhood of Noyelles-sur-l'Escaut and Bourlon Wood had to be withdrawn some distance to positions to the southwest of these locations and that the withdrawal was made successfully without attacks from the enemy. The Berlin office announced on the same date that as a result of the successful German pressure from the north and east the British had evacuated their forward positions between Moeuvres and Marcoing, had withdrawn to the heights north and east of Flesquières, had given up the villages of Graincourt, Anneux, Cantaing and Noyelles, together with the wooded heights north of Marcoing, and that the enemy lines had been penetrated to the depth of two miles and a half. Since their counter-attack began the Germans claim to have captured about 11,000 prisoners and 160 guns.

Bulletin, Dec. 3, p.m.-Dec. 10, a.m.

On the Asiago plateau the Austro-German forces are slowly but perceptibly grinding their way forward, the center of their attack lying between the upper horns of the Brenta and the Astico Rivers. The Italians were obliged to withdraw from some of their more advanced positions between Monte Tondarechar and Monte Badenecche, northwest of Asiago. Using the advantage thus gained the Germans carried the Monte Castelgomberto-Meletta di Gallo lines, the fighting being especially heavy from the slopes south of Castelgomberto to the Foza spur. By December 8 Monte Sisemol, a little south of Asiago, had fallen before the enemy. Berlin claimed at that date the capture of sixty guns and 15,000 prisoners, taken since December 4. In this sector Field Marshal von Hoetzendorf is in command of the Austro-German forces.

The American destroyer Jacob Jones, one of the fleetest and newest of her class, was torpedoed and sunk on the night of December 6 by a German submarine. When attacked the destroyer was on patrol duty in foreign waters 500 miles from land, under the command of Lieutenant-Commander David Worth Bagley, a brother of Ensign Worth Bagley, killed off Cardenas on the Winslow during the Spanish-American war. She sank almost immediately. Forty-four of her crew of 110 are reported saved. This is the second American destroyer sunk since the war began, the first being the Chauncey.

Torpedoing of the Jacob Jones

"Our present and immediate task is to win the war, and nothing shall turn us aside from it until it is accomplished," President Wilson, on December 4, told the Sixty-fifth Congress as it began its second war session. In furtherance of this aim he called for a declaration of war against Austria. In his address the President dismissed the possibility of a premature peace, which, he declared, was sought by German intrigue and debated here by men who understood neither its nature nor the way in which it was to be attained. "With victory an accomplished fact," he said, "peace will be evolved, based upon mercy and justice to enemy and friend, with the hope of a partnership of nations to guarantee future world peace." The President emphasized the purpose of the United States not to interfere in the internal affairs of any nation, declared that no wrong against the German Empire was intended, and that there was likewise no desire to rearrange the internal affairs of Austria-Hungary. When the German people shall prove to the American people, through properly accredited representatives, that they are ready to agree to a settlement based upon justice and reparation, then, said the President, the war will be deemed won. Terms of peace, he added, would not include dismemberment, robbery or punishment of the enemy, but would be based upon justice, defined as follows: Freedom of nations and their peoples from autocratic domination, reparation to Belgium, relinquishment of German power over the people of Austria, Turkey and the free Balkan States, as well as of Prussian territorial conquests in Belgium and Northern France. The President urged the immediate declaration of a state of war between the United States and Austria-Hungary, Germany's vassal and tool. As to Turkey and Bulgaria, also tools of Germany, he counseled delay because "they do not stand in the direct path of our necessary action."

The Presidential Message

The President believes that he is speaking for the American people when he states:

> First, that this intolerable thing of which the masters of Germany have shown us the ugly face, this menace of combined intrigue and force, which we now see so clearly as the German power, a thing without conscience or honor or capacity for covenanted peace, must be crushed, and if it be not utterly brought to an end, at least shut out from the friendly intercourse of the nations; and, second, that when this thing and its power are indeed defeated and the time comes that we can discuss peace—when the German people have spokesmen whose word we can believe, and when those spokesmen are ready in the name of their people to accept the common judgment of the nations as to what shall henceforth be the bases of law and of covenant for the life of the world—we shall be willing and glad to pay the full price for peace, and pay it ungrudgingly. We know what that price will be. It will be full, impartial justice—justice done at every point and to every nation that the final settlement must affect our enemies as well as our friends.

The President insists that autocracy must be shown the futility of its claims to power:

> It is impossible to apply any standard of justice so long as such forces are unchecked and undefeated as the present masters of Germany command. Not until that has been done can right be set up as arbiter and peacemaker among the nations. But when that has been done—as, God willing, it assuredly will be—we shall at last be free to do an unprecendented thing, and this is the time to avow our purpose to do it. We shall be free to base peace on generosity and justice, to the exclusion of all selfish claims to advantage, even on the part of the victors.
> Let there be no misunderstanding. Our present and immediate task is to win the war, and nothing shall turn us aside from it until it is accomplished. Every power and resource we possess, whether of men, of money or of material, is being devoted, and will continue to be devoted, to that purpose until it is achieved. Those who desire to bring peace about before that purpose is achieved, I counsel to carry their advice elsewhere. We will not entertain it. We shall regard the war only as won when the German people say to us, through properly accredited representatives, that they are ready to agree to a settlement based upon justice and the reparation of the wrongs their rulers have done. They have done a wrong to Belgium, which must be repaired. They have established a power over other lands and peoples than their own—over the great empire of Austria-Hungary, over hitherto free Balkan states, over Turkey, and within Asia, which must be relinquished.

After declaring that peace must deliver the lands now overrun by the enemy from the control of Prussia, and solemnly stating that we intend no wrong against the German people, the President adds:

> The wrongs, the very deep wrongs, committed in this war will have to be righted. That, of course. But they cannot and must not be righted by the commission of similar wrongs against Germany and her allies. The world will not permit the commission of similar wrongs as a means of reparation and settlement. Statesmen must by this time have learned that the opinion of the world is everywhere wide awake and fully comprehends the issues involved. No representative of any self-governed nation will dare disregard it by attempting any such covenants of selfishness and compromise as were entered into at the Congress of Vienna. The thought of the plain people here and everywhere throughout the world, the people who enjoy no privilege and have very simple and unsophisticated standards of right and wrong, is the air all governments must henceforth breathe if they would live. It is in the full disclosing light of that thought that all policies must be conceived and executed in this midday hour of the world's life.

According to the President the declaration of a state of war between the United States and Austria-Hungary is the logical conclusion of his argument, for Austria-Hungary, he declared, is for the time being not her own mistress but the vassal of Germany. In entering the war the President declares we are not debased by selfish ambition of conquest. Our cause is just and holy, "the settlement must be of like motive and quality." A supreme moment of history, says the President in closing, has come. "The hand of God is upon the nations. He will show them favor . . . only if they rise to the clear heights of His own justice and mercy."

On the afternoon of Friday, December 7, the United States went to war against Austria-Hungary, when the President approved a joint resolution adopted by Congress, declaring a state of war to exist. The President under the resolution was empowered "to direct and employ the entire naval and military forces of the Government to carry on the war to a successful termination." The war resolution was the one drafted by the Senate and was passed by that body without opposition, Senator La Follette abstaining from voting. In the House there was only one dissenting voice, that of the Socialist member from New York, Meyer London. The text of the resolution is as follows:

War with Austria-Hungary

> Whereas, the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government has committed repeated acts of war against the Government and the people of the United States of America; therefore be it
> Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, that a state of war is hereby declared to exist between the United States of America and the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government; and the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and resources of the Government to carry on war against the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government; and to bring the conflict to a successful termination all the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States.

The day following our break with Austria, it was announced from Guayaquil that the Government of Ecuador had severed diplomatic relations with Germany, and from Buenos Ayres that the Brazilian Cabinet had made still more stringent its regulations affecting German residents in Brazil. To add to the general confusion, revolution has broken out in Portugal and the Government has been overthrown. The former Premier, Dr. Affonso Costa, has undertaken to form a Provisional Government. In the harbor of Halifax, N. S., 1,000 tons of munitions on board the French steamship Mt. Blanc exploded on the morning of December 6, as a result of a collision with the relief ship Imo. Both by the shock, the subsequent collapse of buildings and the fires thus caused, in addition to hundreds of wounded, 4,000 are reported to have been killed. A fierce blizzard added to the horrors of the disaster, one of the worst that has happened on the North American continent. Relief has been rushed from all sides to the stricken city.

Canada.—In his testimony given before the Parliamentary Committee on Returned Soldiers, Mr. J. W. Borden, Paymaster General of the Militia Department, stated that he had never been at liberty to select competent men for the Separation Allowance and Assigned Pay Branch, but was limited to the list sent him by the local Tory members. The interests of soldiers and their families, he claimed, were secondary to political influence. Of an even more serious nature were the accusations brought by the Auditor General, Mr. John Fraser, who gave evidence that "hundreds of thousands of dollars" had been overpaid to persons who were not entitled to receive the money. A large class of these persons were later asked for a refund, but much of the money never reached the Receiver General. The explanation is given that it was appropriated by the clerks. He further described the Pay and Record Office in London, which he had visited last December, as containing 2,500 able-bodied men, many of whom were incompetents, so that it would have been cheaper for Canada to have paid them their salary "to sit out on the sidewalk and leave the books alone." A host of them had received the rank of Colonel, and thus, he said, by the existing military system, gave instruction to expert accountants in matters of which they might be entirely ignorant. "I am told that some of those chartered accountants, brought from the front because they were experts, became so disgusted with conditions that they purposely put their accounts wrong that they might be discharged and sent to the front again." He further gave evidence of the defalcations of "quite a lot of paymasters, some of them from Overseas." He specified one in particular who had stolen $3,500. The man, he said, was discharged and returned to Canada, but being a good Tory was promptly given the rank of Colonel by the Borden Government and placed in command of a new regiment. As Auditor General, Mr. Fraser adds, he then asked the Militia Department to deduct from the man's pay the amount he had stolen. "The Department replied that they had no authority to do so, as they could not deduct from a Colonel's pay any money that he might owe as paymaster." The taxpayers of Canada, the writer of the account suggests, "will appreciate the nicety of this distinction." The temper of the people has been further provoked by a most riotous election campaign.

Military Department and the Campaign

Ireland.—Under the title "Priests and Freedom" the Leader of November 17 discusses the relation of the Irish priests to Ireland's greatest problem, self-government. After paying his respects to those who represent the people "as in a peculiarly swinish state, incapable of thought and initiative and led like animals in halters whithersoever the interests of the priests dictate," the writer says:

Priests and Freedom

> For a long time our rulers did not believe the priests wanted Irish freedom. The priests, they said, support the demand half-heartedly because they know that with the advent of freedom the Church will lose its hold on the people, but they (the priests) must make a show of supporting the claim. Look at the experience of the Church under the free French Government, was the cry; its experience under the Austrian Government was not mentioned.
> Nearly a century ago Mazzini attributed the decay of the French people to their slavish adoption of English materialistic ideas, and predicted that these ideas would be the ruin of the nation. Time has proved that his vision was inspired. With the English people materialism is not a conscious philosophy—not in the same way, for instance, that the Germans adopt the idea of "living dangerously"—but a matter of mere common-sense and expediency. The French tried to make a philosophy of materialism, and it made something of them instead. Consequently, the assertion that French freedom brought disaster to the Catholic Church in France is erroneous.
> Ireland has adhered to the Church throughout the ages in persecution and misery. Some, a very few, have fallen away, but the overwhelming mass of the people has remained faithful. But it is a well-recognized fact that the human will does not yield to force and persecution, or, at least, none but the weaker components of society do. Where force fails more insidious influences often succeed, and the coming time in Ireland may be one of greater trial for the fathers of the Church, and their path, which hitherto has been difficult indeed, but straightforward, may become more tortuous. This is possible, and even probable, say the enemies of the Church.
> But it is not probable by any means. In France atheism was the great enemy of the Church, but it is universally admitted that atheism is now as dead as a door nail. Spiritualism—which may be a ridiculous cult, if you like, but how much more ridiculous than the ideas generated by the theory of the origin of species?—and Christian Science have had something to do in ending atheistic ideas. Those religions, if they can be so called, are wrong, but no one can deny that their final results are, in a large degree, beneficial to the cause of true religion.
> As far as Modernism is concerned, Ireland may possibly take, in the coming years, a faint interest in its tombstone. From the assaults of all these strange ideas which have taken hold of the minds of men, the Church emerges more powerful and secure than ever, and it would be a strange thing for any one to believe that the Catholic religion is likely to lose ground in Ireland when her people had pulled out into a clearer light.
> The Irish people are as intensely Catholic as the priests. The people are cynical, in some degree, and the priests are not, and this is a principal reason of the influence, apart from their calling, which they possess, and always will possess, for we have an inherent reverence for nobility of character and attainments.
> In the demand for liberty the priests are in the van, and without them the movement could never become as intense and powerful as it is, and no most far-seeing leader of a church could have consciously designed a policy so well-adapted to welding an indissoluble bond between priests and people as this generous rally of the priests beneath the banners of an Ireland resurgent.

This interesting opinion will be reassuring to those who love the Irish for their attachment to God.

Rome.—Last week attention was called to Cardinal Gasparri's splendid defense of the Pope; this week both the Papal Secretary of State and Cardinal Bourne answered the unfounded attacks of the London Post against his Holiness. On December 5 the former declared caluminous the statement of the British paper that the Vatican was partially responsible for the Italian defeat. Proceeding he pointed out that the Bishops and priests of Italy have given most generous help to their country and have received unstinted praise from the Italian Government. Long before the Pope's peace note was issued the clergy was working against the destructive propaganda which eventually broke down the morale of the army. The Cardinal reaffirmed the Pope's neutrality and declared that

Two Cardinals and The Popt

> If some nations seem to be more favored than others by the Papal note these certainly were not Germany and Austria-Hungary, but those of the Entente, particularly France and Belgium. The peace aimed at was not a German peace.

To this Cardinal Bourne added that his Holiness had been urged from each side to break with the Governments of the other side. Had such a request been granted, confusion would have been thrown into the religious life, now more precious than ever, of millions of people who would be punished on account of the mistakes of their leaders. In conclusion the Post was reminded that

> The Supreme Pontiff does not depend for instruction upon those who long before the war worked to diminish the authority which they are now invoking, nor does the Holy See shape its action by the flickering lights of human praise or blame.

The paper replied, virtually repeating the odious charge and on December 7 Cardinal Bourne responded clearly and logically. Amongst other things, he said:

> Just below your denunciation of the Sovereign Pontiff I read in large letters, "The Downfall of Russia." If what you tell us under that heading is true, I shall not hurt the cause of the Allies by saying that while our foes the Germans were persecuting Catholics in Belgium our allies the Russians were persecuting Catholics in Galicia. On the one hand Cardinal Mercier, although insulted, was free to speak and act, and he has done so to considerable purpose. On the other hand the Archbishop of Lemberg was exiled and thrown into prison and treated with contumely. The soldiers of the Protestant Kaiser and the soldiers of the Orthodox Czar alike have stained innumerable pages with their foul deeds. I personally brought these terrible events to the mind of representative Russians in England and they were deplored but not denied. Our own Government deprecated, nay, prevented, any allusion to them, and at no time uttered any public protest against them. I do not suggest that no diplomatic representations were made.

On Friday, December 7, Lord Robert Cecil, in answer to a hypothetical question about the alleged secret treaty entered into by Italy on the one hand and Great Britain, France and Russia on the other, for the frustration of all diplomatic steps taken by the Holy See to bring about peace, declared:

> The question seems to be based on a misapprehension. The clause referred to does not affect the spiritual interests of the Holy See, nor limit its liberty of action in endeavoring to bring hostilities to a close. The object of the provision is, as I understand it, to secure that the terms of peace shall be settled by the belligerents.

The fact is that the "clause referred to" did literally limit the Pope's liberty of action in endeavoring to bring hostilities to a close. The impression made on the Catholic world by all this nagging of the Holy Father is most painful, and that at a time when unity is essential.

Russia.—On Tuesday, December 4, an actual armistice began on certain portions of the Russo-German front, and a cessation of hostilities for forty-eight hours was signed on December 3 at the headquarters of Prince Leopold of Bavaria. On December 6 the news came that representatives of Germany, Austria-Hungary, Turkey and Bulgaria met Russian representatives at Brest-Litousk to discuss the terms of an armistice. The Russian delegates requested that all the belligerents be asked to stop fighting for a time, but the Teutonic delegates said they were not empowered to go that far. The Russians then stipulated that the Germans should retire from the Moon Sound islands, and promise not to send troops from the eastern to other fronts, but the proposal was rejected. On December 6, the German War Office announced the suspension of hostilities for ten days, beginning December 7, on the whole Russo-Teutonic front. The Germans agreed to make only such transfer of troops as had been ordered prior to December 5. But a wireless despatch dated December 6 brought London the news that Leon Trotsky, the Bolshevik Foreign Minister, had sent a note to the allied legations at Petrograd intimating that the armistice negotiations had been suspended for a week at the Russian delegates' initiative. The delay is intended to give the allied Governments time to define their attitude toward the peace negotiations. The Russians insist that the armistice shall be signed only on condition that German troops will not be transferred from one front to another and that the islands of Moon Sound will be cleared of Teutonic forces. The Germans make the following counter-proposals: The armistice to last twenty-eight days; to embrace only the Russian front; the transfer of units less than a division to be permitted; Moon Sound and Moon Island to remain in German occupation; the Russian troops to be removed from the Macedonian and French fronts; Russian and Turkish troops to evacuate Persia. In case the allied Governments refuse to participate in negotiations for an armistice and peace, Trotsky says: "They must declare clearly and definitely before all mankind the aims for which peoples of Europe may be called to shed their blood during the fourth year of the war." A dispatch that came via London, dated December 9, announced that "Kaledines and Korniloff, assisted by the Imperialists and Constitutional Democrats have raised a revolt and declared war against the people."

The Armistice Preliminaries

Dynamiting the Moral World

DANIEL A. LORD, S.J.

THE question of Shakespeare's religion will for all time delight the sophomoric debater. But whether Catholic or not, Shakespeare was heir of a Catholic principle which is the motif of his greatest tragedies, the principle of personal responsibility. It is a free step deliberately taken which starts his Macbeth and his Lear down the sharp incline toward destruction. In this he differs from the old Greek tragedians whose heroes were overshadowed by a compelling fate, a fearful and inexplicable Até which plunged them struggling and protesting into final ruin.

Our modern dramatists do not believe in the Greek fate; but, on the other hand, many of them write as if they did not believe in the power of free-will. In place of the traditional conflict of wills, we have among the moderns contests of the individual with environment, heredity, his own fierce passions, economic conditions, and the will is ultimately displayed as powerless in the face of the foes arrayed against it. When the hero, or more usually the heroine, falls, we do not blame or pity; we merely accept the inevitable.

The denial of free-will is not an unimportant bit of dramatic machinery nor a piece of fine philosophical cobweb spinning. It is one of those denials which, if logically followed out, would shake the foundations of the universe. For centuries men have been trained, when trained at all, to fight against the allurements of what under accepted morality was called sin. Youths were taught to stand firmly against their own personal wishes and inclinations where a higher duty to God or country or fellow-men was in question. The wishy-washy principle of our sentimental novelists that a man or woman must follow every whim and fancy, especially in matters of sex, never made any man lay down his life for his country or caused any woman to pluck from her heart a guilty passion. The line of least resistance has not been the road leading to heroic glory. Precisely by accepting the things that bring physical and mental anguish, precisely by resisting the attractions that almost tear the heart from the breast have heroes and saints attained their eminence. And all this is swept away in a denial of free-will.

For if a man has no free-will, he must of his very nature follow the line of least resistance. Chemical and physical forces cannot act otherwise. When Jack and Jill fell down the hill, they probably, in an unwritten sequel, picked themselves up and, broken crowns notwithstanding, went up for a second pail of water. But the spilled water, taking the line of least resistance, flowed with iron necessity to the foot of the hill and stayed there. It was not free to mount after the clumsy pair. Send an electrical current through an iron and a copper wire, and you can measure with mathematical accuracy the percentage of the charge that will flow through each; and the greater amount will always flow through the copper wire. Without free-will man can no more avoid the line of least resistance than can water or electricity.

The logical consequence of this denial of free-will would startle any but the most wilful dogmatist. There are moment's in each man's life when everything inside of him and outside of him seems to fight for an object he knows he must not touch. Every fiber of his nature cries aloud for it; a malignant chance has thrown it in his way; he can take it while avoiding the consequences which attend most wrong doing. Yet one faint, blurred, sometimes almost inconsequential factor—like Kitchner's picture in the "Unfinished Story"—holds him back; that and a sense that the power of choice is in his own hands. Suddenly some philosopher whispers that he is not free, that he must follow the line of least resistance. Who can doubt in such a case whither leads the line of least resistance? Who can blame him if the conviction that he is not free sends him whirling toward the longed-for object?

After all, why should he not? Without freedom of will, it is ludicrous nonsense to talk of responsibility for one's acts. The parrot is not responsible for its hair-raising profanities; the lightning is not blamed when it blasts a mother with her week-old baby nor praised when it brings the usurper's palace crashing about his throne. Unless a man who does evil is free to do good, unless the saint who lays down his life in a leper colony is free to stay at home with his feet in carpet slippers, the wife-beater and the savior of his country, the betrayer of innocence and the Sister of Charity, the murderer and the martyr, Nero and St. Paul, Lucrezia Borgia and Joan of Arc, Benedict Arnold and Washington differ in no moral essential. On the contrary, since the dawn of history, men have been sending to prison, the lash, and the gallows fellow-men for the thefts, the arsons, and the murders for which they were in no way responsible. Our whole criminal code from preamble to final clause is a vast and hideous hoax at the expense of human nature.

Just what the world would become were all men suddenly to throw over their sense of responsibility is a picture no imagination cares to attempt. Even were it true a thousand times that this free-will is a vain delusion, men would be forced in self-defense to use this delusion to build up in themselves and in others a sense of personal responsibility. Without it the sins of Sodom and the crimes of Caligula would write themselves with terrifying iteration into the ordinary history of the world.

It is pitiable beyond words to see philosophers teaching young people a doctrine which is applicable to life only in so far as from it one learns how not to live. It is hard enough for youth to fight back the hot surgings of passion, to close eager eyes to the fascinating sin which beckons so alluringly, even when he feels that should he consent he is personally responsible for the evil that will follow. If, on the contrary, he is told that wild oats are the necessary fruitage of life's springtime, that broken hearts and blighted hopes are the inevitable wreckage of passion's resistless flood, it is madness to blame him for flinging to the winds this hampering delusion of personal responsibility.

If the professors of such a philosophy really practised their creed, the jail not the classroom would be their proper habitat. Happily, if they are moral men, they really prove throughout their lives the truth that man is distinguished from soulless matter and from the brute creation precisely in this, that he deliberately chooses the things which are hard and rejects calmly and coolly the line of least resistance. A very large portion of their lives, like the life of every mortal, is spent in learning by sheer force of will to control the natural impulses banned by morality or by the necessary conventions of civilized society. Certainly the hard, patient life of a student is incomparably less attractive to young blood than a free, self-indulgent existence; yet they have chosen the student's life largely because, being so hard, it leads to the fame which they have set as the goal of their ambitions. They feel a thousand times in their lives the desire for rest and comfort and luxury; yet they set all aside because it impedes them on their way to their goal. And though man clings with an almost insuperable longing to his own life, few of them would hesitate, should their country call them, to lay down that precious life for the sake of a national peace and prosperity which they will never enjoy.

Free-will lies so deeply at the root of our moral life that its destruction would send our universe reeling. Good and evil, innocence and guilt—the burden of so much of our literature, the scales in which we weigh our associates—are terms which without it become as meaningless as the gibbering of apes. Deny it as he may, the philosopher of slave-will could not avoid the penitentiary, retain the friendship of a single individual, merit a line of praise from an educational journal or the warm handclasp from a grateful pupil, unless he was constantly giving the lie to his own doctrine by an incessant use of personal freedom. He never argues more strongly for free-will than when he employs it to dynamite the moral world.

In the matter of free-will as elsewhere, Shakespeare was writing out of the great heart of human kind. The modern dramatist bases his dramatic thesis on the morbid, the pathological, the neurotic individual; Shakespeare drew his men and women from all time. And Shakespeare was right. When the warning bell for the final curtain on each man's life is sounded, the protagonist, looking backward through his little play, will see that he it was who determined whether life should end as a comedy or a tragedy. Environment, heredity, passions were with him, acting on the stage; but it was his free-will that wove them into their fitting parts in his life's drama and wrote the final lines.

Professor Dwight's Prophecy

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., PH.D.

FOR the past two or three generations men have been so much taken up with the idea of evolution that they have rather lost sight of a most patent fact in history, namely, that there is in mankind a marked tendency to degeneration. While most peoples have made certain advances in civilization, all of those who had made noticeable progress have, without exception, subsequently descended in a noteworthy degree. Anthropologists and ethnologists are agreed that no nation has ever been found, no matter how low in the scale, that has not shown evidence of having been at some time or other in a higher stage of culture. The languages show the same truth, for the vocabularies of barbarous tribes possess the means of expressing ideas no longer common in the minds of people.

About six years ago Professor Dwight, who for some twenty-five years had been Parkman Professor of Anatomy at Harvard University, wrote his summary of opinions on the significance of modern biological science in its relation to man, and he emphasized the fact that the idea of possible and actual degeneration was not given its proper value in assigning a scientific meaning to certain anatomical specimens which had been the subject of ardent interest for a number of years. His opinion should have had considerable weight, for he was the recognized world-authority on anomalies and variations in human anatomy. Unfortunately the view he held was not very much in favor at the time with anatomists or with those especially interested in the biological sciences, although their attitude was due to prejudice, rather than to genuine rational considerations.

The book in which he set forth his views was called "Thoughts of a Catholic Anatomist," and by its conjunction of anatomy and Catholicism awakened in many scientists immediate opposition. For them religion and science were things entirely apart, if not in direct contradiction. There was a general feeling expressed smartly by a modern psychologist that where religion and science are in the same mind they must be kept in water-tight compartments, for if by any chance they should mingle, science would disappear in the precipitation that would inevitably take place. For Professor Dwight, however, the union of the terms Catholic and anatomist was the most natural thing in the world. He would not permit his deep underlying Catholic principles to be undermined in any way by mere opinion and theory in anatomy. He stood firmly on old conservative principles, but this habit of mind so far from keeping him in the rear of the procession of science, enabled him to formulate views that scientists, and particularly anatomists, were to adopt years after his death.

Probably the most striking instance of this anticipation of the researches of science had to do with the subject of degeneration which I mentioned at the beginning of this article. In the course of his discussion of low forms of human anatomy, which were supposed to represent links in the chain of the evolution of man and the lower animals, Professor Dwight said: "For my part I believe the Neanderthal man to be a specimen of a race, not arrested in its upward climb, but thrown down from a higher position."

To most of the anthropologists, ethnologists and anatomists of the end of the first decade of the twentieth century for whom Dwight was writing, any such proposition was felt to be a makeshift and an attempt to effect a compromise between science and religion. Arthur Keith who is looked upon as an authority in this special field, in the very year in which Professor Dwight's book appeared, 1911, stated emphatically: "The Neanderthal type represents the stock from which all modern races have arisen." Practically everybody who wrote on this subject expressed similar views. To deny it was considered heresy. Those who advanced the contrary theory risked their reputations. "I might attack Christianity as much as I chose," said Samuel Butler, "and nobody cared one straw, but when I attacked Darwin it was a different matter. For many years (my book), "Evolution Old and New," made a shipwreck of my literary prospects."

Professor Dwight ventured to express rather emphatically opinions quite contrary to the generally followed trend of modern science; so his book was either neglected or read with an indulgent feeling that such backwardness was the inevitable result of mingling faith and science. Not a few scientists resented even the title which Professor Dwight had chosen. A man may be an anatomist if he chooses and a Catholic if he desires, but a Catholic anatomist represented for a good many otherwise quite fair-minded people the association of utterly discrepant terms.

Nevertheless a scant six years have passed, and Professor Dwight's prophecy as to the real significance of some of the anatomical specimens which at the time of his writing were occupying so much attention, has come true. He said, for instance, that although "the Neanderthal race was an excessively old one, skeletons of a higher race, which according to the view I have offered must have existed at the same time as the degenerate ones, are still to be discovered." That seemed a very venturesome statement to make at that time, but it has been proved correct. In 1916 Professor Arthur Keith published his book, "The Antiquity of Man." In the chapter of Conclusions Professor Dwight is fully justified in his daring prophecy. Professor Keith makes admissions which confirm Professor Dwight's views. "We were compelled to admit," he says, "that men of the modern type had been in existence long before the Neanderthal type."

It has often been declared that the highest function of science is the power to forecast the discoveries to be made in the future. When Mendeleef's law of atomic weights led to the discovery of a series of elements having the qualities that had been anticipated for them, it was much easier to understand that here was a great underlying principle in the science of matter. Professor Dwight out of his knowledge of human anatomy and especially its variations and its relation to the anatomy of animals, ventured to suggest, in contradiction to the current science of his day, that discoveries would be made which would confirm his opinion. It was daring to venture his opinion, and its fulfilment has shown how sure and thorough was his grasp of his subject. Rational conservatism has scored another victory, as indeed it was bound to do.

Women and the Vote

JOHN A. RYAN, D.D.

IN two years the voters of New York State changed a majority of 190,000 against woman suffrage to a majority of 95,000 for it. No such reversal of sentiment, or victory for female enfranchisement, has occurred before in the United States. While it is not within the purpose of this article to attempt an explanation of this remarkable conversion of a State's electorate, it is worth while to point out that the majority for suffrage in the Empire State came entirely from the cities and almost entirely from the city of New York. At the same election, the Socialist candidate for mayor increased the vote of his party by some 115,000 ballots. Undoubtedly the great majority of these voters were moved by more or less radical considerations, by discontent with the existing political and economic conditions, and by a strong but undefined hope that Mr. Hillquit would be able to reduce the cost of living and remove other economic hardships. In such a discontented and radical mood men would be quite likely to support woman suffrage, especially since it has always been largely identified with radical movements in politics and industry. Probably the greater part of the suffrage majority in the recent New York election was provided by those who voted the Socialist ticket.

Nevertheless, there is very little danger that radical movements will attract the majority of the women voters. In the first place, no such outcome is visible in States where women already exercise the franchise. In the second place, women are, on the whole, more conservative than men, more fearful of sudden and great changes, more inclined to cling to the existing order, whether of the family, the State, or industry. In the third place, the extremist leaders in the suffrage movement are not representative. While a very large proportion of the women agitators for suffrage have been and are of the radical type, or the advanced feminist type, their theories and performances do not reflect the ideas and temper of women generally. Most of the leaders are exceptional rather than typical. Their dissatisfaction with male political rule and their desire that women should share the business of government arise mainly from facts and considerations peculiar to their special classes, and sometimes to their personal conditions. No doubt these leaders think that they represent their sex, but calm observation and analysis seem to show that their ideas and psychology are remote from the mental habits and attitudes of the majority of women.

What are the proofs of this assertion? There is none that amounts to a demonstration. Neither is there any conclusive argument for the contrary proposition. All the surface indications—and we have nothing better to go by—show that the majority of women have not asked for, indeed, do not want the privilege of voting. By far the greater number of the women acquaintances of any of us are either opposed or indifferent to political enfranchisement. In fact, the suffragist leaders have pretty generally rejected proposals to leave the decision of the question to the women themselves. They have preferred to entrust their cause to the men rather than to the members of their own sex as a whole.

Again, the position, antecedents and opinions of the most active leaders in the suffrage movement create a strong presumption in favor of the belief that their social and political views are not typically feminine. For the most part, they are either women of means, women of leisure, women in the professions, or women active in labor unions. Those in the first two of these categories have taken up suffrage agitation largely by way of reaction from lives of emptiness and aimlessness, and with the desire to be of some genuine service to their sisters. In the main, they are responding to essentially the same motives that impel other women of their class to go in for settlement work and works of philanthropy generally. Equally with the latter they are exceptions in their class. Professional women in the suffrage movement, particularly teachers, find therein scope for the exercise of their active and competent minds. They are in an exceptional position to see the great influence exerted by politics and government upon education and industry. They come to have some understanding of politics and they have the desire and the leisure to translate that understanding into action. While their motives are mainly unselfish, it is obvious that their circumstances and mental processes are not typical of their sex. The trade-union women have a very practical reason for their activity in the suffrage movement; for they see the industrial abuses and evils suffered by wage-earning women, and they know that most of these bad conditions can be removed by legislation. They realize that if women wage-earners had the franchise and would use it intelligently, the industrial position of the latter could be improved promptly and considerably. Nevertheless, it is fairly certain that the great majority of women workers do not grasp in any vital or tenacious way the reasoning or the convictions of the officials of the female trade unions; for the great majority are unorganized even industrially, have not acquired the industrial or political consciousness of the leaders, and are constantly hoping to abandon at an early date the position of wage-earner for that of housewife. Moreover, the whole number of female wage-earners constitutes only a small minority of the women of the United States.

The situation seems to be this: While the leadership of the suffrage movement in New York has been considerably tainted with excessive radicalism of various kinds, it does not adequately represent the great majority of the women, even on the question of the desirability of suffrage; therefore, the antecedents of female enfranchisement provide no solid reason for thinking that the masses of women voters will be found on the side of radical movements or measures.

In these circumstances, the proportion of the woman vote in New York that will support advanced feminist proposals, such as, easier divorce, legitimizing birth-control propaganda, the legal right to bear children outside of matrimony, etc., will depend entirely upon the extent to which the different classes of women accept their new political responsibilities. If only those women who believe in Socialism, feminism, and other forms of radicalism exercise the franchise, such movements will be strengthened politically. If the women who do not accept these radical theories take the trouble to vote, the political influence of the feminist group will be much more than counterbalanced. Indeed, if the women of each social and economic class of the community go to the polls in as large proportions as the men of the same class, unsound social proposals will probably receive a smaller share of the vote than they do today; for in every class the proportion of women extremists is smaller than that of men. Recent news despatches represent King Albert of Belgium as affirming his belief in woman suffrage as inevitable after the war. It is not generally known, perhaps, that before the war the Socialists of that country were mostly opposed to this policy; for they were afraid that their cause would suffer through the preponderance of conservative voters among the women. What the Socialists feared in Belgium, the friends of sound social policies may await calmly in the State of New York. Even in this land of greater freedom and opportunity for women, they are less attracted than men by revolutionary social doctrines, and our Catholic women, naturally, are the most conservative of all.

Revolutionary Food-Hoarders

GEORGE J. O'DWYER

THE efforts of our Government to check persistent food-hoarding by so-called Americans who are loath to curb their personal selfishness, finds a parallel in an incident that took place during the first two years of the Revolution. On November 26, 1776, specially chosen delegates from every town and community then existing in southern New Hampshire and northeastern Massachusetts, gathered in convention in the house on the farm of Mayor Joseph Varnum, in the little settlement of Dracut, Mass., and voiced their pent-up indignation against high prices and unscrupulous farmers and traders.

Forty-three towns in New Hampshire and northern Massachusetts sent fifty-three of their smartest townsmen to speak the feelings of the several communities. These indignant men came from places as far north as Enfield, New Hampshire, and as far south as Bedford, near Boston. They traveled in all sorts of ways—by horse, stage, boat and on foot. The preliminary meeting was held on November 5 and, after deliberating on the main object of the gathering, the delegates adjourned to November 26.

It was the general opinion of all "that the unhappy difficulties arising on account of the exorbitant prices that are demanded and taken for many of the necessaries of life is (sic) a matter worthy our consideration and that it (sic) be a subject of inquiry at this time." How very strikingly the language of the angry farmers of the Revolutionary period compares with the language that we are wont to use today in describing similar conditions!

Upon a fair inquiry, so reads the account of the convention, it has been made to appear to this convention that, such is the advantage taken by the merchant, farmer, trader and others of those who are obliged to purchase the necessaries of life from them, that, unless some speedy and effectual remedy take place, ... those unrighteous practices will prove the inevitable ruin of these States. It is voted, therefore, that this convention will petition the legislative authority of the States of New Hampshire and Massachusetts Bay, therein requesting that they will please take the premises under consideration, and so to (sic) regulate the purchases and sales of the necessaries of life as to obviate the evils we imagine will otherwise ensue.

In the petition it was said:

Many persons in the States of New Hampshire and Massachusetts, altogether disregarding the injunction of the Continental Congress—which intended that no unreasonable advantage should be taken in the purchase and sale, either of foreign commodities, the produce of our farms or our own manufactures, but that all should be sold on reasonable terms—have, from mercenary or worse views, augmented the price of by far the greater part of the necessaries of life to an enormous degree, many articles of which are more than double the usual prices they were respectively sold for before the commencement of the present war, . . . thereby endeavoring to depreciate the value of our paper currency. That the soldiers and others, not concerned in this unrighteous commerce, are groaning under their burdens and, we fear, cannot endure them much longer. . . . Signed by order and in behalf of the convention, John Bodwell, Chairman.

This unique convention lasted two days. On the afternoon of November 27 the delegates went back to their several factories and farms, with instructions to spread the news far and wide to other towns not represented. The surrounding country was soon in a state of excitement, and extemporaneous meetings were held at village stores and workshops and other gathering places for several weeks afterward. The House of Representatives of the State of Massachusetts was the first body to take heed of the petition. On January 6, 1777, at a session in Watertown, this and other prayers of like import were answered in the following resolution: "Ordered that Brigadier Palmer, Mr. Strong and Mr. Shute with such of the Honorable Board shall join a Committee to draw a bill for the regulating the necessary and convenient Articles of Life." Later, the Council of the State, in conjunction with the above-named House took radical measures to offset food-hoarding, especially of pork. In a session, on January 30, 1777, it was resolved:

That the Board of War be directed to make the Strictest Enquiry possible from time to time, and, if they shall obtain knowledge where quantities of Pork and other Provisions are deposited, that they have reason to believe were procured in this manner that they immediately secure said Provisions for the Public use.

All selectmen and committees of safety and correspondence in the several towns were also enjoined and directed to exercise the utmost vigilance to locate hoarded supplies and to give the names of those found secreting provisions to the Board of War of the State, which in turn was instructed to act immediately.

The law regulating the prices of "articles of life" went into effect June 15, 1777. It empowered selectmen of towns and committees of correspondence to > Settle and affix, once in two months, the price of farming and other labor; the price at which poultry, flour, either imported by land or water into the town or manufactured therein may be sold for, and cause the prices for the same to be posted up in some public place in their towns, six days before such prices are to take effect.

For instance, the price of rye flour was to be six shillings a bushel; fresh pork was to be sold at five pence per pound, delivered at market; butter was sold at ten pence per pound by the firkin and one shilling per pound by a single pound. No unusual method of sale was to be adopted in order to evade the purpose of the act; it was expressly stated that "notorious transgressors against the law were not allowed to purchase."

Retailers, inn-holders and others were forced to take this oath:

> You, in the presence of God, solemnly swear that you have not, wittingly or willingly, directly or indirectly, either by yourself, or, any, by, for, or under you, been concerned in selling any article enumerated in the "Act to prevent monopoly and oppression," at a higher price than is, by the said Act limited for such article or by the Selectmen or committees, in pursuance thereof. So help you God.

The history of the period makes note of the vigilance taken by the committees to enforce the new law and the food-hoarders were forced to come down to the normal standard set. Certain States and law-makers of these present troublesome times can derive much food for reflection and many practical ideas for alleviating present distress if they will devote one hour daily to the study of economic history, whether it be the period of the first years of the Revolution or of any other critical time. Practical and effective food laws are needed now and badly. Maybe, the aforesaid action of the House of Representatives of Massachusetts may give them the proper inspiration for action.

The Civic Christmas

CHARLES PHILLIPS

IN the "Bright Ages," as Father Bearne, the English Jesuit, so aptly calls the Middle Ages, Christmas was not only the chief religious festival of the year, but likewise the principal civic holiday on the calendar. It was a "Fourth of July," and more, to our forefathers of the eleventh, twelth and thirteenth centuries, a great public event, a holiday, in the celebration of which all the people joined, either as participants in the pageants and plays of the season or as auditors. According to extant records as many as 15,000 at a time witnessed a performance of the Nativity dramas which marked the observance of the feast.

The story of the Christmas celebrations of those ancient days is inspiring, so inspiring in fact that the world has never been quite able to forget it. We can still feel the thrill of the event, when after a great mass meeting had been held for the commencement of arrangements, and plans had been made for the annual celebration, the heralds of the city—let us say London or Rouen—went abroad through all the streets, from wall to wall, and even out into the adjoining countryside, with fanfare of trumpets and flutter of banners, announcing the forthcoming observance of Christ's Nativity. This was perhaps a month before Christmas Day. Followed then the brief full weeks of preparation, the assigning of parts, the learning of lines, the rehearsing, the gathering together of stage properties, the making or refurbishing of costumes, the building of new scenery or the revamping of the old; all the joyous activities of Christmastide. Everyone shared in them, not alone the actors and the expectant audiences but the merchants and traders as well. The last planned for the festive booths to be erected on the market square facing the stage, for the sale of food and holiday trinkets. What pride filled the heart of the comely stripling who, new come from his apprenticeship into the full seniority of a master stone-carver and now daily employed on the chancel of the new cathedral, is this year chosen to play the part of the Angel Gabriel! And there is his blue-eyed, golden-haired lad of a cousin, picked out by the dean to represent the Blessed Virgin herself! Happy days indeed, those days of preparation for Christmas in the olden time, when the celebration of the feast went straight and boldly to the heart of the holy occasion itself, making vivid with all the art at the people's command the glory and mystery of the Divine birth.

The Church guided and directed these old-time civic celebrations of Christmas. The pastors and clerics, with their schooling and knowledge of Scripture, history and Latin, were naturally the directors. They rehearsed the actors, acted themselves, superintended the whole production, designed the costumes, lent all the available treasures of the sacristy, pennons and banners, rich candelabra, laces, embroideries, copes for the Magi, surplices for the angelic choirs. All men were children of Mother Church in the "Bright Ages," and never more childlike or happier under her leadership than at the joyous Christmastide.

Inspiring indeed is the memory of those days, so inspiring in fact that we find ourselves today, here in the twentieth century, harking back to it for a fresh artistic impulse to cut the edge of the ennui of our super-sophistication, and discovering it most richly and most abundantly in the mystery plays and Nativity dramas of that Catholic period. For there are many signs in the world today of an ultimate revival of the civic Christmas of medieval days. The awakening interest in pageantry, which has been so marked a characteristic of the dramatic history of the last decade, has inevitably led people back to the origins of that graphic art. Already we have had civic pageants and community pageants till the idea is no longer a strange or unaccustomed one to the general public. And now the natural outcome is beginning to be seen, the civic Christmas is becoming an annual event.

First came the community Christmas tree, still with us and growing yearly in popularity, but only a precursor after all, I believe, of the true civic Christmas, which will be a whole-hearted return to the reverential dramatic celebration of olden times. Carols and hymns are sung around that civic gift-tree, songs of Christ's coming, of the tender beauty of His Blessed Mother, of His message of peace and good-will. The Gloria of the angels is repeated, the air is filled with echoes, however faint, of the celestial music of Bethlehem. Truly this is a good thing.

But we are not stopping at the Christmas tree. Already the next logical step is being taken, it was bound to come. We now have our Nativity dramas, our Christmas mysteries, just as our forefathers of old Rouen or London had—only occasional yet, it is true—few and far between, but beautifully, confidently and reverently done. In Los Angeles, for instance, two years ago an outdoor Nativity drama was given that might well in many of its externals at least, and perhaps in its intrinsic spirit, challenge the Christmas mystery play of the Middle Ages at its best. Over 400 actors and singers, largely gathered from local church choirs, participated, while the audience fully equaled the largest recorded in the ancient histories of such spectacles, numbering nearly 16,000 people.

This is but one example of the return of the Nativity drama. There are many others. Even New England, the New England that once proscribed the "Papistical festival of Christmas" and cut it off the calendar, has had its Christmas mystery plays performed in the open before large assemblages of people during recent years. At San Francisco, what began one year as a mere parochial celebration, the production of a Christmas mystery, quickly blossomed into practically a civic event, attracting thousands and filling for days what was at the time the largest theater in the city. In England and in Ireland too there has been this same revival. In Dublin and other Irish towns there was Douglas Hyde's "Nativity," in Manchester there was Laurence Housman's beautifully reverent and very Catholic play "Bethlehem"—Alas! stupidly taken off by the censor because it came under the head of the forbidden Biblical drama—and also at Cambridge and Westminster there has been Monsignor Benson's "A Mystery Play" successfully done, but in private, thus escaping the censor's hand.

The few facts cited here regarding the civic celebration of Christmas and the reawakening of interest in the Nativity drama are really straws in the wind, I believe, indicating a genuine impulse toward the revival of the old-time Christmas of our believing fathers. What then should be the attitude of Catholics in regard to such a movement? Can it be anything but one of hearty approval? Is it not good to encourage this marked inclination to celebrate Christ's Birthday as it should be celebrated, and as it was celebrated by our Catholic forefathers in the days of faith, even if for the present the movement be only tentative, formative, feeling its way toward larger things? Yet I have heard of an entire parish being set on edge at Christmas time on account of a civic Christmas, the pastor, misjudging the intention, forbidding his people to participate and keeping the children of the parochial school out of the celebration, in which they were invited to take part. "They are trying to paganize Christmas," hotly argued this zealous but shortsighted shepherd of souls. "Have we not our Christmas Crib?" he asked. "Is that not enough?" He could not see it the other way about, that paganism, the old, indifferent, turkey-eating pagan Christmas of recent times, the only Christmas that millions of Americans have known for years, was being Christianized at last, by slow degrees perhaps, but surely, nevertheless.

All things considered, opposition to the civic Christmas on the part of Catholics is unwise. Where the movement is fostered by non-Catholics their good intentions should be recognized and encouraged. Far better for us to join hands with them and lead them to our Christmas Crib than to drive them away. And to the Crib we can yet lead many, by the road of the civic Christmas, even though it may wind its devious way through a whole forest of community Christmas trees!

The Nativity drama for instance is the very altar-step to the Crib itself. Yet what chance will a Nativity drama have in a community where the Catholics frown upon, talk against and stay away from the innocent and well-meant civic Christmas tree, which may indeed prove but a stride toward the desired goal? If instead of opposition Catholics will give approval to this movement, take part, sing their hymns and carols too, introduce as time goes on a little more and a little more of the ancient beauty of the old-time religious observance of the feast, even have a Crib erected under the civic tree, or produce in the parish hall, following the function of the tree in the park or the town square, a Nativity drama, a pantomime or a series of tableaux, setting forth the story of Bethlehem as it was set forth in the ages of faith, if Catholics will do this, they will be helping materially to prepare the way for a great revival in the not remote future of the proper celebration of Christmas.

"Some Irish, Old and New"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The editorial, "Some Irish, Old and New," has a passage which, I think, should not be allowed to go by without protest:

> Seventy-five years ago, the Irish in this country built the roads, dug the trenches, filled the churches, blessed God when the little girl went off to the convent, and wondered why God was so good to them when the boy was called to the altar. Today an uncomfortable percentage of their descendants are doing none of these things.

The statement of exact numbers is vague and other parts of the editorial qualify its pessimism, but I do not think the general impression is at all fair to the descendants of Irish Catholics. Have all these Catholics who have ceased building roads and digging trenches, ceased also furnishing vocations to convent and clergy? I would be bold enough to say the opposite. In the late sixties, Father Thébaud, no blind observer of conditions, said in his diary that the Church in America would always have to depend upon Europe for Sisters and priests. What would he say today? The more Irish immigration has decreased, the more our priesthood and Sisterhood have filled up with the children of the Irish who, when they worked in the trenches, could not furnish vocations, but who, when they took up business, had the means to send their children to Catholic schools, and so have given us the wonderful sight we see today of large seminaries and novitiates and increased numbers in Catholic schools.

Canon Sheehan, with others, was anxious to dissuade the Irish from coming to America. Alarming statistics were marshaled and equally alarming conditions were imagined, but sober calculation had not upheld the alarmists. The Bishop of Pittsburgh has repeatedly shown the fallacy of the statistics.

I think that today fewer are ashamed of the Irish and Ireland than when I was a boy, when the arrivals from Ireland, "to an uncomfortable percentage" shamed their country by violence and drink. Where the courts were filled with Irish, when I was a boy, we now have Irish judges presiding, and the descendants of Irish-Americans in the professions and in business, and banded into societies which proudly celebrate St. Patrick's Day. Their children to an extraordinary percentage are priests and Sisters. I believe that the loss to the Church is just as great in Ireland as here, and one thing which has made me think so is the pessimistic tone of Canon Sheehan's stories. We enjoy "My New Curate" and "The Blindness of Dr. Gray" and his other novels, but what is the impression they leave about the background of Ireland? For me it was a sad and sordid spectacle, and I am grateful to Divine Providence that the Irish in America are in a condition to send their children to school and to the Church. In Ireland it would seem they are still in the trenches.

Worcester, Mass. P. F. D.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In a recent editorial in AMERICA it is noted that Canon Sheehan finds that the > wealthy Irish-American is raising a generation that learns not merely to forget the old land of their fathers, but to become ashamed of it; to imitate the manners and fashions and last of all the vices and infidelity of a great body of Americans who recognize no definite faith and who make civic virtue their sole religion, secular training their sole education, and worldly success the standard of all their attainments.

I have ventured to underscore a pregnant clause in this indictment, "and who make civic virtue their sole religion," because it leads me to wonder whether if Canon Sheehan had ever visited America he would not have recognized another deplorable thing about some "Irish-Americans," both wealthy and otherwise.

What about those "Irish-Americans" who have indeed not forgotten the old land of their fathers but who trade openly and unashamed in business and in politics upon their ancestry and their religion, who, indeed go to Mass on Sundays, send their children to parochial schools and Catholic colleges, give largely to Catholic work and Catholic charities and so far from imitating anybody in making a "religion" out of "civic virtue" practise corruption in politics up to the limit of tolerance on the part of public opinion and the penal laws? I will wager that readers of these lines can name two of the last-named kind against one of the class described by the Canon.

It is my humble opinion that in all our parochial schools there should be taught a "Catechism of Civics," for if my observation in the course of twenty years tells me anything it is that people generally seem to think that patriotism is purely a matter of war-time and that there is no such thing as peace-time patriotism or real civic duties. I say "people generally"; I do not suggest that Catholics or Irish-American Catholics are any worse than the rest, in this respect. I do suggest that they should be a great deal better, for their religion requires it of them and they should be taught that it is so required.

Osteopathy

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Ignorance, bigotry and jealousy can alone account for the injustice of Dr. O'Malley's attack on the osteopathic physician. The undeniable success of osteopathy may serve to enrage Dr. O'Malley, but it is surprising that he should so far forget himself as to give vent publicly to such a vulgar display of temper and unwarranted abuse. It is anything but Christian to brand as a disgrace to Christianity some 7,000 physicians who by their knowledge and skill are succeeding in giving health to suffering people, where medicine has failed. Osteopathy thrives and will continue to thrive solely on its merits. I refer Dr. O'Malley to an article in the New York Medical Journal of September 8, by J. Madison Taylor, M.D., part of which is as follows:

> Let me ask how can we clinicians do our full and honest duty to our clients if we collect into little self-applauding and mutually commendatory groups and affirm in chorus: "The other fellows only try to fool the public all the time," and assert that we, you and I, are the only real healers to whom alone truth is vouchsafed by special advices from the primary source of all wisdom and good? . . . It is a childish, though natural and pardonable, attitude to deny what you do not wish to become established as a fact, also to declare false that about which you know nothing and which fails to coincide with your experience or taste. Especially is it vexing to the consciousness, inviting denial, when these invasions of privilege fall upon one's own craftmanship or one's pre-empted domain. The temptation is thereupon to characterize all such unwelcome statements as nonsense or worse.
> When these outlandish claimants succeed in obtaining such excellent results in certain directions as you and I certainly do not get, an element of suspicion intrudes which may increase to fear. The temptation then is to dispose of these results by ascribing the whole to imagination or nowadays to "suggestion" only. It is, therefore, plain that the one practical method of disposing of so many bewildering, anxiety-producing stings to our vanity is to determine honestly their scope and nature, to go and find out just how much fire there is to so much smoke, to learn what there is to learn or to ascertain by personal investigation whether the whole thing is smoke and smoke only. If there should be found some promising facts, reputable principles, or useful and economic methods of getting remedial effects you know very well you or I cannot or do not get, why not learn and appropriate these for yourself and the good of your patients? Why stand afar off and deny, equivocate, or disparage like some feeble, pestiferous, old weakling?

At least Dr. Madison Taylor is fair enough to admit that there is a possibility of truth in the claims of the "outlandish claimants," and seems willing enough to appropriate to his own use whatever knowledge he can procure of the principles and practice of the science of osteopathy.

A Missionary's Appeal

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Let me thank you for the great help you have given me towards building up a library for my people, and especially for inserting last year in your Review my appeal for Catholic literature. I have been able to do much good as a result of your kindness. Once more I make bold to ask a favor, trusting that my needs as a missionary will excuse my importunity. I have had the good fortune to receive many back numbers of AMERICA, and would like very much to complete the set. I have all Volume VII, except number 9, and all Volume VI, except numbers 10, 16, and 24. If your readers would send me the lacking numbers and whatever numbers they can spare of Volumes I, II, III, IV and V, they would confer a great charity on a destitute missionary and set up before me a constant reminder to keep them fervently in my prayers and Holy Sacrifices. I need not say that I shall be very grateful for any assistance you or your readers may be able to give me. My address is Bangar, La Union, Philippine Islands.

"Catechism in the Grades"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It is only fair, we assume, to ask if the writer of "Catechism in the Grades" has passed on to us some pages taken out of the book of her own personal experience as a teacher of catechism in the grades, as otherwise, her temerity in condemning wholesale the Dolphin Method of presenting eternal truths to the young would be rash in the extreme, and give to her statements only ipse dixit value. Then follows the ancillary inquiry: If she has had experience on which to base her objections, how is it that she lays the fault to the system itself and not to the faulty method of presenting instructions, or the abuse of the system? Skilful teachers and resourceful catechists could well prune the Dolphin Method of defects, and at the same time bring into effective use its good features. Good points it certainly has, as the evidence of hundreds of teachers with years of experience to their credit proves.

The fundamental rule of all investigation inculcates approach to the unknown from the known, to the abstract from the concrete, to the generic from the specific, to the remote from the near, and the Church follows this basic principle in her large use of symbols, emblems, graphic methods, if you will, to visualize the lessons she intends to teach. If the writer's objections to the graphic method are sound, what of our stained glass windows, and other pictorial representations of sacred persons or events; what becomes of the rich symbolism which the Church has used in all ages, and of the various devices she employs to bring home the special truths she wishes to convey? Who will say that by presenting the Cross with its corpus of brass or silver or gold the child is taught that this bit of wood with its image of the Crucified is God Himself, and not merely a representation of the Man-God in the closing act of the great drama of redemption? No; the graphic method is one which teachers have always found helpful, and which, appealing to the eye of the child, readily aids in the mind-grasp of the truths thus presented in symbol.

Of a truth, the writer of "Catechism in the Grades" is a laudator temporis acti, and this in more than the realm of catechetical instructions. She finds reason to lament the passing of old days and old ways in the study of English, opining that much of the brain-fag of present-day instructors of freshman English is due to the departure of time-old "learned by heart" definitions. And there is much to be said in favor of the traditional methods. But, in depreciating the newer forms, this writer pulls down without offering material for building up better structures; her theory is destructive, not constructive. The old ideas, and old methods were found inadequate, and if the adopted substitutes are not all that can be expected of them, they are certainly the best that can be offered at this time, and they afford ample scope for the exercise of ingenuity on the part of the skilled teacher. To the teacher, in fact, must be laid the charge of failure to develop the best in the Dolphin Method of religious instruction, as indeed in all instruction; if she fails to see the child's needs, and is not able to develop the material suggested in the text, then the fault must be laid at her door, not attributed to any system or systems.

Jersey City. A. E. T.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Not having the privilege of being regularly at home and of regularly reading our home copy of AMERICA, it happens that I read it not in weekly but in monthly instalments. I make this statement to show why pardon may be granted me for coming at possibly a late date to say a word on the subject of the article, "Catechism in the Grades."

I read the article with deep interest for three reasons. I am frequently invited to play the part of Father Donald to the little ones about to make their first Holy Communion; my heart was touched by the reference to Jack the Giant Killer and Buffalo Bill; and it was my misfortune to have been taught catechism by the method of being sternly asked: "Who made you?" and yet more sternly: "What do you mean by the Immaculate Conception?" and even more sternly commanded: "Define Transubstantiation."

The writer of the article deplores in no ambiguous terms the passing away of the days when children were sternly asked these questions. Frankly, I do not. Catechism was taught to me by the question and answer system for over twelve years, and in spite of that fact I left school a very ill-informed Christian. And when at length it was my privilege to study theology, of which the blue catechism—mine was a green one—should necessarily be a complete résumé, I felt that I was hearing many of the sacred truths of the Faith for the first time.

One day, about four years ago, I was invited into a class-room of one of the largest and most efficient parochial schools in Philadelphia. It was the catechism hour, and I gather from what "a Sister of Charity" writes, that the method employed must have been what she terms the "new method, also perhaps of dubious value." The method was certainly new to me. But of its dubious value I beg to hold my own opinion. The writer is, no doubt, a catechist. I am not. But to say that "the main objection to the graphic system is that it pictures God to the child as a circle, or a triangle, or some other concrete symbol, which God is not," is a very poor objection to be a main objection. Because the "graphic" system does not picture God as any concrete symbol, whether circle or triangle, but these things are meant to convey an idea of God.

Those who are familiar with the almost world-old symbols of Christian architecture will find that, even so, the circle and the triangle have held an honored place for centuries as symbolic of an Eternal God, and of our indivisible Trinity. Nor is the symbolism too deep for the mind of a child to grasp. That a smaller circle, the image of the larger, represents a soul made unto the Image of God, not that it is a soul, any child will likewise understand. As for the chain, ruthlessly broken by mortal sin, which links together those two fairly adequate representations of the two deepest concepts of the human mind, it gives to the child, so it seems to me, a detailed account of what I, at least, "sang in a pleasing rhythm and to a melody of our own hearts' composing," but without having the faintest notion of what it meant, namely, the answer to the question sternly asked: "What is sanctifying grace?"

The main defect, since there is question of a main objection, in the argument in favor of the sing-song method of question and answer, is the assumption that the knowledge acquired by the sing-song method is denied the child taught by the graphic method. This is not stated in so many words, but it is implied in the argument. In my never-to-be-forgotten visit to that school-room, not only were the answers to the questions: Who made you? Who made the world? Why did God make you? known by the children at the blackboard, but a still more detailed knowledge was possessed by them. They could give specific reasons to explain why God made the rain, the sun, the rivers, the flowers. One child in reply to my question, told me that God made the fishes so that we could have fish on Friday. I never found that in the sing-song method, or in any theology, but I am inclined now to believe it is true; and not only that, but I felt there and then that the child, as yet only "stammering the name of God," had already visualized in her child-like faith, rendered concrete by the dubious graphic system, the whole system of doctrinal and moral truth which has flowed like a stream from the wounded Heart of the God-made-man, whose Great Love has, if nothing else, at least one day of the week consecrated to His memory.

A minor defect in the argument is that the writer after advocating a system by which grown up people would infallibly remember their catechism system, almost relinquishes it, substituting for both a third system, namely, story-telling. Even this is finally relinquished in order to show that the great function of the catechist, theologian or otherwise, is to bring before the class the ideal of the love of Christ. This, however true it is to say that the personal love of Christ is the object of all religion, is a decided departure from the point at issue, namely, the system of teaching catechism in the grades. But as regards the story-telling system, the "graphic" system does not exclude it.

The complete manual of this "dubious" system is not without its fund of hints of stories from the Bible and the lives of the saints; but, better even than that, it gives a chronological account of the life of the Saint of Saints Himself, a truly valuable story of which so many Catholics are in complete ignorance. What is said of the graphic system can be said with equal truth, at least, of the story-telling system, as an appeal to the imagination of the children; it is indeed "a treasure-trove to the teacher. . . . It interests the children. It entertains them." But to think that Sunday-school stories can fire the imagination of the average boy or girl to the extent that Jack the Giant Killer and Cinderella were known to do so for children of a generation that is gone, may possibly be a mistake. For a dozen of our modern boys, as I know them, who would drive every giant one by one from the Cornish Coast, and rid America of every monster or magician, would scalp Indians along the Huron or the Delaware, would challenge every Moor in Spain to single combat under the very walls of the Alhambra, careful search might find in this dreamland where boys fight so many victorious battles, one boy perhaps who would in real life eventually emulate a Sebastian or a Laurence. The childish mind, eager it is true to dare the marvelous, cannot be wed to virtue by dreams. To dream is good, but we cannot dream ourselves into heaven, much less into a virile Christian life.

In conclusion may I say that this is merely a case where "doctors differ"? Let us hope that as few as possible of the patients die. To teach catechism effectively is a supreme art. All catechists are not, by nature or by grace, supreme artists. But let us all welcome with gratitude any genuine and approved system which will aid our Sisters in their self-sacrificing work of giving by their example, as much perhaps as by their teaching, many generations of good men and good women to be the hope and the consolation of the Church in America.

White Slavery

To the Editor of AMERICA:

J. L. is like the soldiers preparing for the front. He is using his bayonet on a stuffed dummy but draws no blood. I am quite familiar with and full of admiration for our Catholic charities and institutions and yield to none in an effort to aid them to the best of my ability. Of these self-sacrificing works for the poor there is neither in my nor Mr. Connolly's letters any question. Our complaint has to do with Catholic abstention, both lay and clerical, from public movements and efforts for the protection of our girls, for the curbing of white slavery, the controlling of prostitution and from other similar endeavors. Is it true or is it not that we Catholics hold aloof? If it is not true, will J. L. give the names of Catholic Bishops, priests, or prominent lay people who, in any appreciable number, have been publicly identified with these activities? All else is irrelevant.

It is no answer to talk of "silk and satin in the slums." That is not the question. It is no reply to refer to the "Catholic directory," interesting and edifying as such reading is. The enumeration of our Catholic institutions and the well-known sacrifices of our Sisterhoods may prove that we are doing more than is done by the public movements under discussion, but still the difficulty is not met.

Mr. Connolly's contention is that we Catholics are not identified with such movements. Possibly the desire that we should be identified with them arises, not from any lack of appreciation of Catholic efforts, but from the wish that we should come into closer touch with our fellow-citizens in philanthropic work, get to know them and let them know us better. By so doing we might remove from their minds certain prejudices and range them, when there is question of Catholic charities, not against, but with us. It is possible that had we been represented in the movements on birth-control and on imparting knowledge of certain delicate matters to children and similar matters, our influence could have been thrown against many excesses and false teachings. We could have made the doctrine of the Church better understood and have prevented the widespread misrepresentations of our attitude towards these subjects. Abstention deprives us of this opportunity and leaves our action open to serious misapprehension.

Criticism of Catholic action or inaction may be prompted not by a spirit of carping, but by a zeal for the cause. It is possible that we want no spots on the sun.

New York. MARTHA A. BAXTER.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

If the trio of New York City Catholics, C. Connolly, George Brady and Martha Baxter, who have recently imposed upon the courtesy of your columns and the patience of your readers, are at all representative of Catholicism in that metropolis, it would go far to explain the strange fact that where Catholics are numerically strongest, they are, none the less, least zealous in the defense of their holy religion. For Catholics of this type Christ's Cross with its inseparable concomitants of ignominy and obscurity has lost all its attraction; for them no goal is worthier of aspiration than a place in the smiling sun of popular commendation, no torment more grievous to endure than that ostracism of social nonentity to which the noblesse oblige of a loyal Catholic inevitably condemns him.

Accordingly, they are forever deploring the Church's backwardness and lack of efficiency, they are continually scandalized at her scant appreciation and cold enthusiasm for modern reforms and up-to-date methods of infallibly abolishing sexual depravity and kindred evils that, like the poor, always have been, are, and always will be with us, C. Connolly's "fie upon theologians!" to the contrary notwithstanding. The confessional, forsooth, and the Good Shepherd Convent? Nonsense! They stand in about the same relation to modern social problems, as stage-coach transportation compared to modern Pullman service. One wild, whooping crusade of police, social workers and self-righteous church-members charging gallantly through the slums, dives, cabarets, and winerooms of New York will, naturally, accomplish far more for lasting reform than all the confessionals in Romish christendom. What are 17,000 plodding "apathetic," priests compared to one glorious "Twentieth-Century Limited" reformer like Billy Sunday? How foolish to contend that the teaching of self-control is the only efficient means of reform, and that, only if it be supplemented copiously with the supernatural grace of God!

Yet, for all this sophistry, the fact remains that there are only two ways of exorcising the brute in man: the one is to supernaturalize him by grace into an angel in flesh; the other, to disembody him physically altogether, and that cure will hardly recommend itself even to the immoderate extravagance of evangelical reformers. Moreover, let the would-be reformer look to himself; for there is another sin, as Father Faber well says, that angers God even more than those of the flesh.

The devil urges men on to great positive breaches of the Divine Commandments. The passions of the flesh impel sinners to give way to their passions by such dreadful sins, as catch the eyes of men and startle them by their iniquity. Worldliness only leads to these things occasionally and by accident. It neither scandalizes others, nor frightens the sinner himself. This is the very feature of it, which rightly considered, ought to be so terrifying. The reaction of a great sin, or the shame which follows it, are often the pioneers of grace. They give self-love such a serious shock, that under the influence of it men return to God. Worldliness hides from the soul its real malice, and thus keeps at arm's length from it some of the most persuasive motives of repentance. Thus the Pharisees are depicted in the Gospel as being eminently worldly. It is worldliness, not immorality, which is put before us. There is even much of moral decency, much of respectable observance, much religious profession; and yet when Our Blessed Saviour went among them, they were further from grace than the publicans and sinners. They had implicit hatred of God in their hearts already, which became explicit as soon as they saw Him. The Magdalen, the Samaritan, the woman taken in adultery, it was these who gathered around Jesus, attracted by His sweetness, and touched by the grace which went out from Him. The Pharisees only grew more cold, more haughty, more self-opinionated, until they ended by the greatest of all sins, the crucifixion of Our Lord ("Creator and Creature.")

Be that as it may, one always finds the worldly Catholic deprecating the want of zeal and wisdom which withholds "an appreciable number of Bishops, priests or Catholic laity" from clambering up into the band-wagon and sitting down modestly behind those of the more enlightened, progressive, practical, and, unquestionably, more vociferous, Protestant clergy and religionists, who have long since abandoned even the semblance of religion, substituting in lieu thereof "social service," prohibition, politics, physical culture, and other imperative needs of the body.

O, you, who have honey in your mouths when you allude with respectable deference to "our brethren" of the Protestant denominations, but vinegar and gall wherever there is a question of the Church of Christ, learn to appreciate her goodness and beauty before it is too late! Know that she holds in her hands the means of solving practically and successfully every enigmatic and baffling problem that vexes humanity today, that she and she alone possesses the remedy for every human evil or suffering! Turn, then, from the false, pretentious shams of a world that has forgotten God! Give her your cordial support. Lift up her arms, lay your gifts of wealth and self-sacrifice at her dear feet, and you will find in the Bride of Christ beauties, treasures and resources, that you never dreamt of, and will live to know that in providing for the vast and intricate assemblage of human needs, there is no rival who can vie with her. It is vain to look elsewhere for light or guidance. When the forces of Joseph and Azarias were routed and dispersed, Holy Writ explains the defeat by the simple comment: "But they were not of the seed of those men by whom salvation was brought to Israel" (Mach. V:62). So to those who forget that "Whosoever . . . will be a friend of this world, becometh an enemy of God," who are ever ready and eager to fraternize with the enemies of Christ, ever disposed to follow other leaders than their own, we repeat: Not by such shall salvation be brought to Israel!

Let us have less concession and compromise. Let us try to imbibe at least a little of that loyal and dauntless spirit that impelled St. Jerome in the fifth century to exclaim:

> As the East, vexed with internal discord, with all the habitual frenzy of that people, is tearing into shreds the seamless garment of the Lord, and the foxes lay waste Christ's vineyard, so that among the broken cisterns that hold no water it is difficult to discern where is the sealed-up fountain, and that enclosed garden; therefore, have I thought that I ought to consult the Chair of Peter. . . . Wherefore, although thy greatness deter, yet does thy mildness invite me. From a priest a victim asks safety; from a shepherd a lamb seeks protection. I speak with the Fisherman's successor and the Disciple of the Cross. I, following no leader save Christ, am joined in communion with Thy Blessedness; that is, with the Chair of Peter. Upon that rock I know that the Church was founded. Whosoever eateth the Lamb outside that household is profane. If anyone be not within the Ark of Noah, he shall perish when the deluge prevails. Vitalis I know not, Meletius I renounce, Paulinus I ignore! Whosoever gathereth not with thee, scattereth, to wit, is not of Christ, he is of Antichrist! (Epistola 15 ad Damasum.)

It would be well if Catholics would follow the example of the great Doctor.

Beatty, Pa. BARRY O'TOOLE.

Catholic Chaplains

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have followed with interest the various articles which have appeared recently in AMERICA relative to the question of Catholic chaplains for our Catholic soldiers. I refer especially to your own editorial, the article of Charles Dawson and the communications of Father O'Gorman and of F. H. R. Up to November 2 my interest was that of the man outside, but since that date it has become that of the man inside.

I cannot speak from experience of the deficiency of Catholic chaplains abroad, but I would like to say something based on my own experience and observations of the deficiency here in our own country. You said in your editorial: "To the credit of the Government of the United States be it said that there has been no disposition on its part to deny its Catholic soldiers and sailors the consolation of religion." This statement may be true in a negative sense but is it true that the United States Government has actually provided a sufficient number of Catholic chaplains to minister to the spiritual wants of the Catholic soldiers who are in camps and trenches?

Most of the National Guardsmen of New England were encamped this summer at Westfield, Mass. I do not know the exact figures but there were about 18,000 men there. The Government provided only one Catholic chaplain. One more was finally added through the untiring efforts of ex-Governor Walsh. At the present time Camp MacArthur is the training ground of the National Guardsmen of Michigan and Wisconsin. They form the Thirty-second Division and expect to see France soon. According to figures given me this morning at Division Headquarters there were 26,592 officers and men in camp yesterday. The Government has provided nine chaplains to care for the spiritual needs of this division, six Protestant and three Catholic. We do not know the exact proportion of Catholic soldiers as yet, but it is safe to say that at least thirty per cent are Catholic. That means that the Government has provided three Catholic chaplains for the 8,000, more or less, Catholic soldiers in this division. It is interesting to compare these figures with those given by Father O'Gorman. The British Government has set us a good example.

Camp MacArthur, Waco, Tex. WILLIAM F. DAVITT, K. of C. Chaplain.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A communication in your issue of November 17 under the heading "an ex-Governor and a Chaplain," gives a good example, as the writer says, of "what an individual can do for the comfort of a large number of his fellow-men." All honor to the ex-Governor and may his tribe increase! It seems strange however that no mention is made of any effort on the part of those most responsible for the Catholic soldiers in question.

The same predicament presented itself to a Canadian regiment. It was nearly all Catholic but a Protestant chaplain was sent from another province to look after it. The soldiers and their friends pleaded but in vain. The appointments made by the military were as unchangeable as the laws of the Medes and Persians. The regiment got orders to leave for Europe. They made ready but refused to move out of their quarters until they got a Catholic chaplain. They get one.

"Our New Voters"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I infer from several recent editorials that AMERICA is very anxious that we "new voters" should first inform ourselves on the political situation, and then exercise our franchise with "wisdom and discretion" or something like that. Good advice, I am sure, but, coming from a man, it puts me in mind of Thackeray's:

> You see a demure-looking woman, perfect in all her duties, constant in house-bills and shirt-buttons, obedient to her lord, and anxious to please him in all things; silent when you and he talk politics, or literature, or balderdash, together, and if referred to, saying with a smile of perfect humility, "Oh, women are not judges upon such and such matters; we leave learning and politics to men." "Yes, poor Polly," says Jones, patting the back of Mrs. J's head good-naturedly, "attend to the house, my dear; that's the best thing you can do, and leave the rest to us." Benighted idiot! She has long ago taken your measure. . . . As I grow older and consider these things, I know which are the stronger, men or women; but which are the cleverer, I doubt.

Of course, being a man, Thackeray could not be fair to the end in a question affecting women, but had to take refuge in "doubt."

The President's Message

"FOR us," said the President in his address to Congress on December 4, "this is a war of high principle." With a forbearance which some at home thought weakness and enemies abroad openly proclaimed cowardice, the United States watched for months the course of the war in Europe, hoping that at an opportune moment the nations, weary of slaughter, might hearken to her counsels of peace. That moment was made impossible "by the sinister forces that interrupt peace." In the words of the President, "a menace of combined force and intrigue" threatened the dignity, the honor, the very existence of a free people. War came, and we undertook it with hands unstained. With the President, every loyal American now understands that "our object is to win the war" as by the favor of God we shall assuredly win it, and that "we shall not slacken, or suffer ourselves to be diverted until it is won." Had we not taken up arms, we should have lost not only our place among the nations, but that fulness of authority at home, without which peace and concord must be replaced by contempt of government and social anarchy. Yet in war, we have not departed in any instance from the high principles which ruled us as a people, before that fateful day last April. Now as then, we utterly disown any "selfish ambition of conquest or spoliation." The literal truth is that we have been forced into the war, "to save the very institutions we live under from corruption and destruction."

With all its solemnity, the President's address brings with it a message of cheer. A peace founded on dishonor, countenancing injustice, can never be accepted by the United States. When complete justice has been done, and "right set up as the arbiter and peacemaker among the nations,"

We shall be free to base peace on generosity and justice, to the exclusion of all selfish claims to advantage even on the part of the victors. . . . The wrongs, the very deep wrongs, committed in this war will have to be righted. That of course. But they cannot and must not be righted by the commission of similar wrongs against Germany and her allies. The world will not permit the commission of similar wrongs as a means of reparation and settlement. . . .

The eyes of the people have been opened and they see. The hand of God is laid upon the nations. He will show them favor I devoutly believe, only if they rise to the clear heights of His own justice and mercy.

Whether we fight for the success of our arms on land and sea, or abide at home to fulfil those functions which make possible the proper conduct of the war, let us who thank God that we are Americans, lay our cause before the Arbiter of nations, and by the purity of our lives, the rectitude of our purposes, bring down the blessing that is as a wall unbreakable against the powers of evil.

The Poor Millionaire

DULL, unimaginative persons who steadfastly refuse to consider the millionaire as either harmless or necessary, like the poor cat i' the adage, will grieve to learn that the tribe of Dives is waxing strong. In December, 1915, there were 14,771 "of him"; one year later the forces mustered an addition of 7,925, making a total, as the mathematician will observe, of 22,696. Increasing in numbers, they have not increased the joy of the community, for millionaires are not precisely popular. They may be good to their mothers and kind to the servants, but the glamor of these amiable qualities is swallowed up in the fierce auriferous splendor that beats about their careers. To the poor man, alas too often! do they represent nothing but fuel stacked for the burning, and he can back his view with many a Scriptural misquotation. The economist regards him as a sheep with an overlong fleece, and his are the shears to cut it, if he could but break into the pasture. The reformer would forbid him to transmit his hard-earned and his hardly-earned possessions to his children, arguing wisely that much concentrated wealth sets up private centers of power and influence, that are inconsistent with the public good. The rich man is the observed of all observers, but very little love goes with all the observation; he is in the mouths of all, but every tongue babbles schemes to separate him from his vast possessions. Taxes pile up so rapidly, that the thumb of the rich, once calloused with cutting coupons, takes on a yet deeper callous from signing affidavits, in protest of excessive appraisals. If popular disfavor grows warmer or if social legislation ever approximates the ideal held out by the sprightly Mr. Walsh of Kansas City, our 22,696 American Croesi will assuredly take rank with the umpire as most unhappy men.

It is clear that not all our millionaires can throw down that bar to favor, their money, but all can use it more wisely, a policy which would stop the mouth of the ranter, fill the judicious with joy, and give the millionaire himself a belated opportunity to grow in grace with God and man. There can be no better time to begin than the present. War does not ask the millionaire to relinquish even one of his luxuries, but it may make the children of the poor grow wan with hunger. There should be no quarrel between those who have and those who have not; but in a world that has forgotten God, envy and bitterness in the ranks of the poor, and rapine and oppression in the hearts of the rich, are well-nigh inevitable. Man is more cruel than any beast when he denies his nature by denying his Maker. Did the rich remember that God entrusts them with certain good things, that they may in truth and justice be the stewards of the poor, His dearest brethren, there would be no social problem. The peril to mankind does not lie in a multiplication of stewards, but in a multiplication of stewards who are unjust.

The Fruits of "Academic Freedom"

SOME two years ago reference was made in these pages to the presence in many State and "non-sectarian" colleges, of professors whose teachings were subversive of Christian morality and the natural law. The occasion was seized by certain so-called Catholics who, for reasons perfectly familiar to many besides themselves, choose these institutions for their sons and daughters, as a typical instance of the narrowness and ignorance of "cloistered" priests. On whose side the ignorance lay and the narrowness, a train of events has made clear since the entrance of this country into the war; none more directly than the untoward outbreaks, common to faculty and students, which have been chronicled of more than one institution for the training of young Americans.

Confining himself to the discussion of domestic difficulties, Dr. Butler has recently announced that Columbia University must not be regarded as a reformatory for juvenile delinquents, or as a shelter for "young persons worse than irresponsible." Extending his remarks, the President notes that

> It is humiliating and painful to find, with increasing frequency, and in different parts of the country, men in distinguished academic posts who choose to act in utter disregard of the plainest dictates of ethics and good conduct.

Yet, with all due allowance made for the foibles and eccentricities of individual professors, what other result could have been anticipated? Dr. Butler admits that "one effect of recent teaching in what once was ethics" has been to break down "all sense of obligation of any kind, except to one's own appetites, and desire for instant advantage." With this disaster, personal morality is at an end, and a menace to civilization is the net result of a college training. Muddled thinking, he continues, has been "bold enough to misuse the noble name of philosophy," and it is only sober comment to add that of late years this boldness has been conspicuous at Columbia. "Academic freedom" has been carried to such extremes, that Dr. Butler can quote before an academic audience, and with the air of one applying the sole available remedy to an undeniable evil, the words of a Justice of the Supreme Court of New York, to the effect that "there must of necessity be a limit somewhere" beyond which free speech ceases to be a right.

Dr. Butler is not fighting an evil which does not exist, but an evil which will long survive his honest indignation. It is an essential part of a system which, beginning with the denial of the principle of authority in religion, has logically proceeded to extend the denial to all fields of human activity. Consistency is hardly served by encouraging a professor to disown the sovereignty of God, and compelling him to acknowledge the sovereignty of a dean, or of a governing board, with offices in Wall Street. Perhaps in the days of reconstruction following the war, the non-Catholic colleges may recognize the wisdom of requiring moral integrity as well as intellectual ability in the professorial staff.

The Social Problem of the Future

IN a widely-quoted article the London Economist condemns in unqualified terms the existing State control and longs for the day when the English Defense of the Realm Act, "with its enormous ever-growing comet's tail of regulations and orders," may pass out of the nation's horizon. At the same time it believes that the old individualism can never again return, each industry conducting business for itself on the principle of the "devil-take-the-hindmost." In spite of the inefficiency of the existing government control and management, men have realized the frictional wastage which obtained under previous conditions, and will not submit to them again. On the other hand, they have also seen what organized production can achieve, even when "the inefficient and lumbering State is the organizer."

State organization, as the Economist rightly says, is not merely inelastic, but in times of peace is constantly in danger of falling under political influence. State control and State management are often excellent, but they must be kept within the strict limits defined by the exigency that called them into being.

The same argument that condemns State absolutism or State Socialism in the field of economics, likewise condemns Socialism itself. We are not surprised that the Socialist Call of New York should have claimed to see in the foregoing article an implicit admission of all the Socialist contentions. Yet nothing could be further from the truth. The promise of Socialism to satisfy all human aspirations and offer to mankind the supreme perfection of organized effort, is the merest assumption. But more than this, Socialism would bind men with restrictions tenfold more odious than the severest restraints a Government can place upon them in time of war. It is a needless trammeling of human freedom in time of peace, if peace indeed can ever exist in a Socialist commonwealth. The experience of Russia today, and of France at an earlier period, should make men pause.

Neither from a Catholic nor from a sane economic point of view can there be any question of Socialism as a solution of the coming social problems. Yet the danger at present is that men may be misled by its siren song which is always in their ears.

Catholics can have no justification, either in reason or religion, for adhering to Socialism, which has become more insidiously dangerous than ever to the Catholic workingman. The Church herself possesses, in her principles and traditions, the only solution of the tremendous social problems that are confronting us. Yet so unfamiliar are many with their own social system that they are in danger of casting their eyes longingly upon its counterfeit. When the London Economist draws its conclusion that we can pass safely through the coming crisis in no other way than by drawing into a common circle not capital and labor only, but also the consumer, it is expressing nothing more than the Catholic ideal. Again, when it favors the voluntary and complete organization of industries on cooperative principles that are based upon the common welfare, that will not interfere with the rights of private ownership, that will not destroy competition, yet will acknowledge wide common interests, and that will extend from the raw material to the consumer, it is approaching towards the gild concept as applied to modern conditions.

Socialism is as far removed as individualistic capitalism from the desired goal. The key to the entire situation is in the hand of the Catholic economist who is profoundly acquainted with the traditions of the Church and with the social teachings of the Holy See, and is able to apply them scientifically to modern problems. We have no need of looking elsewhere. The best thought of the world is turning towards Catholic ideals. But we must awake fully to the realization of our great advantages.

Rosebuds and Trifles

THE sentiment is somewhat trite, for it has rubbed against the storied corridors of time these many years, claiming, at various periods, the high authority of Phidias, Michael Angelo, and the Spanish ascetic, Alphonsus Rodriguez. It is, therefore, of no mean lineage. Counted among the commonplaces of grave writers, it has been accorded by the moralists a degree of reverence that is wholly edifying. "Perfection" it is weightily said, "is no trifle." What poor erring mortal, inured to failure from his youth, ever held that it was! "But perfection," continues the sentiment, "is built upon trifles."

There is encouragement here. Old apothegms are like old friends; that, perhaps, is the reason why we occasionally allow ourselves to treat them with neglect. But the field is wide, and for those who live in the midst of trifles varying from crowns resting uneasily upon royal heads to bits of gilded gingerbread that children cry for, a classification which includes the whole of our race, a wise choice is necessary. Some may set themselves to transmute difficulties into opportunities, a task calling for a spirit of exploration no less keen and hardy than that which fired Columbus, or those undaunted navigators who first gazed upon the peaks of Teneriffe. Others, whose daily bread is not a ration of bristling difficulties, might with greater personal and communal profit, begin the round of those countless little acts of courtesy and self-sacrifice that would remain unnoted, did they not make this hurly-burly of existence more like the City of Peace, the lasting City of God. These are the trifles upon which perfection is built, and they are not far from any one of us. "Gather ye rosebuds while ye may," is the admonition of the poet, for "Old time is still aflying," towards the night when roses droop, and the hands that might have gathered them, the rosebuds of little kindnesses, are still forever.

The Troublesome Pronoun

THERE is hardly a gray-haired teacher in the land, it is safe to assert, whose life has not been embittered by the violent addiction to the pronoun it shown by the children under his care. Without question, it is the most cruelly overworked and abused of all the pronouns. Lazy, hurried, or unclear writers are so fond of it that they force that unhappy pronoun to discharge the office of any remote, preceding noun that they choose to refer to, quite regardless of the painful confusion they thus cause in the mind of readers. But this perverse pronoun ruffles the peace not only of teachers and pupils, but even that of editors and authors. Nay, the word has actually tried the soul of the Postmaster-General himself. For when writing the following "Notice to Readers," which he instructed publishers to print on their magazine-covers, the perverse pronoun it was evidently annoying him:

> When you finish reading this magazine, place a one-cent stamp on this notice, hand same to any postal employee, and it will be placed in the hands of our soldiers or sailors at the front. No Wrapping—No Address.
> A. S. Burleson, Postmaster-General.

Perhaps the Postmaster-General's first draft of the notice read "hand it," but the latter word was deleted and "same" substituted as a clarifying improvement. "But is it unmistakably clear," a schoolma'am might ask, "to just what word 'same,' refers? Is it 'magazine,' 'stamp' or 'notice'?"

That is a question that stylists and grammarians will wrangle over unendingly. But meanwhile there is evidence that the wording of the Postmaster-General's notice caused the editor of the Atlantic Monthly, not to mention others, the keenest distress. For after the entire staff had prayed, deliberated and consulted for two long months, it was solemnly decreed at 3 Park Street, Boston, that Mr. Burleson's notice should be amended to run:

> After reading this magazine, affix a 1-cent stamp and hand it to any postal employee. It will then be placed in the hands of our soldiers or sailors at the front. NO WRAPPING. NO ADDRESS.
> A. S. BURLESON, Postmaster General.

But the meticulously critical can well maintain that in trying to make the diction of the Postmaster-General's instructions conform to Park Street standards the Atlantic has still left that pronoun it ambiguous. Moreover as the New York Sun shrewdly observes:

> In the course of editing Mr. Burleson has not the Atlantic omitted the highly important injunction to place the one-cent stamp "on this notice"? "Affix" is a potent word, connotative of deeds and giving, devising and bequeathing with red seals; and sealing and solemnly swearing and the smell of burning wax. Still, it hardly insures putting of a one-cent stamp in the proper place.

The entertaining episode, be it noted in conclusion, seems to hold a lesson for impatient teachers. If the incorrigible perversity of the pronoun it can cause such embarrassment to the wide-ruling Postmaster-General himself, and hopelessly puzzle the combined wisdom of even the Atlantic Monthly's staff, should schoolma'ams be unspeakably surprised and indignant because their callow goslings cannot always make a correct use of the word?

Literature

"CANON SHEEHAN OF DONERAILE"

A BETTER biographer for "Canon Sheehan of Doneraile" (Longmans) could hardly have been found than the Rev. Herman J. Heuser, D.D., who modestly calls his book "The story of an Irish parish priest as told chiefly by himself in books, personal memoirs and letters." For it was Father Heuser who as editor of the American Ecclesiastical Review really "discovered" that gifted Irish novelist and did more than anyone else to make him widely read and properly appreciated. Through visits and correspondence, moreover, he learned to know Canon Sheehan so well during his own distinguished career as editor and author, he has done so much to heighten the quality of today's Catholic literature, and his priestly ideals are so like those cherished by the writer of "My New Curate," that Father Heuser has been able to paint for us in this volume a remarkably true and sympathetic portrait of the Canon.

The "discovery" was made in 1897, when Father Heuser, who was traveling in Europe, chanced to pick up a copy of "Geoffrey Austin, Student," a novel which had appeared anonymously two years before but attracted little attention and had remained for the most part on the booksellers' shelves. Father Heuser's delighted perusal of the volume convinced him that the author was just the person he had long been seeking. For he was eager to publish in the Ecclesiastical Review a series of clerical sketches that would faithfully depict the Catholic priest occupied with the various functions in his parish and reflect his "spirit of prayer and study within the privacy of the presbytery." Father Heuser's editorial eye now discerned in the creator of "Geoffrey Austin" that clear perception of "the lights and shadows in our modern religious and public "life," together with a "wit and humor" which allowed him to apply correctives without greatly irritating the reader." So the enterprising editor got into touch with the obscure author and as a result of their negotiations "My New Curate's" was begun as a serial story in the May, 1898, number of the Ecclesiastical Review. Before that year had ended Father Sheehan's reputation was made, for by universal consent "Daddy Dan" is the most charming and original of his creations. From that time forward until he died in 1913 Canon Sheehan kept his pen so busy that he left the Catholic reading public a rich legacy of eighteen volumes, comprising novels, essays, sermons and poems. Here are the titles:

> Geoffrey Austin, Student. The Triumph of Failure. My New Curate. Luke Delmage. The Blindness of Dr. Gray. Glenanaar. Lisheen. Miriam Lucas. The Graves of Kilmorna. The Queen's Fillet. A Spoiled Priest and Other Stories. Early Essays and Lectures. Under the Cedars and the Stars. Parerga. The Intellectuals. Lost Angel of a Ruined Paradise. Cithara Mea. Mariae Corona.

The timely appearance of this biography will doubtless awaken among Canon Sheehan's old friends a new interest in his books and will win him a host of new admirers besides.

Patrick A. Sheehan was born at Mallow in the diocese of Cloyne in 1852, was educated at the national school and at St. Colman's secondary school, where he acquitted himself with such distinction that at the age of seventeen he began his course of philosophy at Maynooth, without being required to study rhetoric or humanities there. After his ordination in 1875 Father Sheehan was immediately appointed to the English mission, working first at Plymouth and later at Exeter. He then had many of the adventures he has so entertainingly-described in "Luke Delmage," for he was fond of weaving into the plot and narrative of his books his own experiences as a priest. Returning to Ireland in 1877 he held the post of curate, first at Mallow and later at the Queenstown Cathedral, and in 1895 was appointed parish priest of Doneraile, a small town in County Cork pleasantly situated on the Awbeg River, and there he lived and wrote and labored among his people until his widely lamented death in 1913.

Father Heuser arranges under four main divisions the thirty-two chapters he writes on Canon Sheehan's career, namely: "The Formation," "Literary Life," "Pastoral Life" and "The End." Though a little compression would perhaps have made the second part more attractive to the general reader, in the third part is presented so charming a picture of a good shepherd toiling for his flock that most Catholics will doubtless be reminded by it of pastors they know. No priest can read those chapters without being made much the better for it.

There are some particularly interesting pages on Canon Sheehan's literary methods. Far from being labor, writing was to him a recreation. Amid his parochial cares he would devote some two hours daily to composition, as "a sort of musical accompaniment to his more serious tasks." He was endowed with a "mind that absorbed facts, stories and impressions like a blotting-pad." He had great facility of expression but cared little for technique. He seldom revised what he had written currente calamo, and he used to keep several books on the stocks at once. The author also throws interesting side-lights on the Canon's literary predelections. Strange to say, he did not care for Shakespeare.

"I sometimes loathe him," he wrote. Perhaps the exceedingly "human" character of the great dramatist's creations and the striking absence from his plays of any man or woman who continually and consistently acts through supernatural motives gave the pious Canon pain. Shelley he regarded as the most spiritual of the English poets. He "would have come round to the Church" had he lived. He seemed to Canon Sheehan "the one poet who has shaped his language to his thought and not his thought to his language."

Remarkable as were the literary gifts of our novelist, more remarkable still, attests Father Heuser, was the consummate skill and unwearied devotion with which he discharged the duties of a parish priest. "Literature had no value to him unless it served to bring men to know and love God better by ministering to the offices of charity and instruction." He was particularly devoted to the lambs of his flock. There were seven schools in his parish and he exercised a careful supervision over them all, visiting every day the two nearest his home and making it his duty to know all about every child in the parish. "If the babies have a special place in heaven I should like the privilege of being with them for eternity" he would often remark. "How I wish we could always keep them in their innocence" he would say half-sorrowfully. "The thought of what may become of them saddens me."

He also worked hard to improve the lot of the Irish farmer. He did all he could to make practical in his parish the Wyndham act, which was designed to give the land back gradually to the people, and he used to rejoice when he saw his flock taking pride in the neat appearance and productiveness of their holdings. Zeal for the beauty of God's house was another characteristic of Canon Sheehan. "Cleanliness and good taste were everywhere and always maintained" in everything connected with his church. As for his openhandedness, Canon Sheehan's biographer avers that "charity and the patience and forbearance that go with it was his besetting weakness." He made over to the Bishop whatever revenue he received from the sale of his books that it might be used to help needy and disabled priests. Canon Sheehan was not a demonstrative man, but he loved his people tenderly and was loved as much in turn. Father Heuser strongly suspects that that admirable passage in "The Blindness of Dr. Gray," when the pastor is bidding his flock farewell, is a page from the author's own life.

What will doubtless especially interest American readers is the account of the warm friendship that sprang up between this Irish priest and Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes of the United States Supreme Court. The American jurist chanced to be visiting his friend Lord Castletown of "Doneraile Court" in 1902 and the latter introduced him to Canon Sheehan. "The philosophical habit of mind and literary tastes of the two men appear to have at once drawn them toward each other," writes Father Heuser. The Canon's best letters are those written to Justice Holmes, and here is the American's tribute to his friend:

> During the last summer of his life I was at Doneraile and called every day after luncheon, that time being best for him. He knew and feared he was dying, though I did not admit it. One day he bid me go to his library and select a book. On his assurance I took Suarez—"De Legibus," which I had heard him praise, and it bears his inscription, "August 5th, 1913." . . . I wish that I could have offered him something besides affection and reverence for his lovely spirit.

On the evening of Rosary Sunday, exactly two months later than the day Justice Holmes was given the volume of Suarez, Canon Sheehan peacefully passed away, after bearing with great cheerfulness and courage a long and painful illness. On the plain Celtic cross that stands over his grave is carved the appropriate text: "Where dwellest thou, Rabbi?" And Jesus said: "Come and see."

PORTRAIT OF AN OLD LADY

Early one morning as I went a-walking
I met an old lady so stately and tall,
The red of her cheeks gave a quiver of pleasure
Like the sight of red hollyhocks by a gray wall.

Fragrance of lavender clung to her, telling
Of linen piled high on immaculate shelves,
You could fancy her tending her garden or strolling
Among the proud roses that grow by themselves.

When I am sorrowful, dreading the future,
Thinking of days when my hair will be gray,
It cheers me to think of that lovely old lady,
Lavender-haunted and hollyhock-gay.

REVIEWS

God and Myself. An Inquiry Into the True Religion. By MARTIN J. SCOTT, S.J. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. $1.00.

Very seldom does a book run through an entire first edition of many thousands before a notice of it has had time to find its way into the reviews; and the wonder grows when this happens in the case of a treatise, professedly theological. And yet this has been the good fortune of the present volume. The commendation thus given by the reading public, anticipating as it does the critical judgment of the reviewer, makes the latter's task almost superfluous, except to point out some of the reasons why the book has met with such favor and to recommend it heartily to Catholics and non-Catholics alike.

The book is clear, cogent, brief, thorough, and easily understood. It is a complete whole, proceeding logically from first foundations to the finished superstructure of the Faith. Solidly learned, it makes no parade of knowledge; eminently practical, it avoids those theological subtleties and abstruser points of argument, which, though tempting, serve rather to confuse than to guide the first groping steps toward the fold. A careful courtesy of style marks it throughout, disarming prejudice by undoubted but unobtrusive sympathy with the sincere inquirer. The controversial and argumentative tone has been rigorously excluded, for the author has found by twenty years of dealing with prospective converts that the most convincing proof of the truth is the simple exposition of the truth itself. It is an excellent book to put into the hands of those who are dissatisfied with religious indifferentism or are turning wistful eyes towards the Church; Catholics also, who are happy in the possession of the Faith, will find it valuable for its rapid, comprehensive view of the entire Catholic system; and both alike will find it stimulating to further investigation, scarcely less by what is said than by what is left unsaid. It has the endorsement of noted theologians and the praise of no less an authority than the venerable Cardinal of Baltimore.

Catholic Churchmen in Science. By JAMES J. WALSH, M. D., Ph. D. Third Series. The Dolphin Press, Philadelphia. $1.00.

This third volume of Catholic Churchmen, to whom the scientific world is much indebted, follows the lines of this distinguished author's first and second books of the series. Like many of Dr. Walsh's other apologetical writings this interesting treatise answers in clearest fashion the oft-repeated calumny that the Catholic Church debars progress in science as inconsistent with her dogmas. As a foreword to the book is this quotation from "The Beginnings of New England, or the Puritan Theocracy in Its Relations to Civil and Religious Liberty," by John Fiske: "It is hard to find words to express the debt of gratitude which modern civilization owes to the Roman Catholic Church." The truth of this remark is clearly proved by the contents of the six chapters, which comprise such subjects as "Papal Scientists and the Vatican Laboratories," the anthropological research work of the Abbé Breuil, and the gigantic labors in the field of biology carried through by the Abbé Spallauzain, who was a clerical precursor of the great Pasteur.

It will interest Catholic members of the medical profession, who recall the rationalistic tradition of the supposed incompatibility of sound Catholicism with the study of anatomy or physiology, to be reminded of the Papal Medical School in the University of Rome, where some of the world's leading anatomists have held chairs. Such writers as Sir Bertram Windle and Father Gerard have treated the same topic which Dr. Walsh has chosen for his present theme, but from a different viewpoint and with other subjects, so that these new facts about the Church's patronage of science should be very acceptable and eagerly welcomed by those whose glory lies in whatever advances the interests of God's Church. Diplomatic Days. By EDITH O'SHAUGNESSY (Mrs. NELSON O'SHAUGHNESSY). Illustrated. New York: Harper & Brothers. $2.00.

It may safely be predicted that most of those who read this author's former volume, "A Diplomat's Wife in Mexico," will consider it their pleasant duty to secure her "Diplomatic Days." The book is made up of a series of delightful letters written to her mother by the wife of the Secretary to the American Embassy in Mexico, from May 1, 1911, shortly before President Diaz was forced to resign, until October 12, 1912, when Mrs. O'Shaughnessy sailed away from the country for a time, leaving Francisco I. Madero insecurely seated in the presidential chair.

With the same remarkable powers of observation and description that made her earlier volume so readable a book, the author now gives her first impressions of Mexico and her opinion of the public men to whom the future of that country was entrusted. She is an enthusiastic admirer of the natural beauties of the land beyond the Rio Grande, and descriptive passages as vivid as the following are frequent:

> After lunch we walked about the old, ruined monastery, inexpressibly lovely in that solitary spot. Trees grow from what once were cloisters and cells; the mother-church in its midst is crumbling, pink vine-grown, delicious. . . . The old retreat is a mass of lovely unexpected details, long galleries, carved lintels, bits of sculptured vaulting, romantic enclosures, and everywhere some natural growth to fling a living charm about it all. The pink belfry still has its old bell, but now when it rings it warns Zapatistas of the approach of gendarmes instead of calling monks to prayer.

Regarding the religious condition of Mexico in 1911, this Catholic author reports that "Instead of indifferentism the churches are packed with men, women and children on all occasions." She cannot see "How the Indian is benefited by the suppression of religious ceremonies," for "that going in and out of churches" seems to be an essential part of the Mexican's life, and she is unable to understand "Why that habit, which seems to compensate for so many things obviously lacking, should be a reproach to those who instilled it." From the first the author appears to have appraised Madero correctly. He walked in an atmosphere of "illusions and dreams," and was guided in his public policy by mediums and planchettes. Though he was as "honest as the day" and promised everything to everybody, he failed because he lacked the firm hand of President Diaz. The book also gives pleasant pictures of the life led in Mexico by the diplomatic corps, narrates entertainingly how Mrs O'Shaughnessy solved her domestic problems, and how she brought up her little son, Elim, who seems to have had more than his quota of original sin. The Quest of El Dorado. The Most Romantic Episode in the History of South American Conquest. By the REVEREND J. A. ZAHM, C.S.C., Ph.D. (H. J. MOZANS). Illustrated. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $1.50.

Everyone thinks of El Dorado as an enchanted land, over the mountains of the moon, down the valley of silence, the imaginary storehouse of untold wealth and gold, which lured the Spaniards of the early days of their explorations and conquests. Father Zahm tells us on what seem to be good authorities, that originally at least El Dorado, the Gilded or Golden One was a man, the Cacique of Guatavitá, not far from Bogotá. This chieftain, according to the laws of his tribe had to prepare himself by a long fast for the duties of his office and then went to offer sacrifice to his gods on the Lake of Guatavitá. His body was annointed with a viscous earth, which then was overspread with powdered gold so that the chief was covered with the precious metal from head to foot. He then proceeded to the middle of the lake and cast all his treasures into its depths in honor of the deities he worshiped. The same tale appears in somewhat similar forms among the chronicles of the old Spanish explorers. Soon, however, the story of the Gilded Man or King was forgotten and in the popular estimation El Dorado came to signify the land of wealth and gold and treasures which were to be the reward of the hardy explorers who should first discover and win them.

The story of the adventurous pathfinders who looked for El Dorado, Father Zahm, who knows so much about Central and South America, tells with an interest and zest that never flag. It is the story of a great and absorbing Odyssey and its roll-call of sonorous and picturesque Spanish names fills the ear while the imagination is stirred by the recital of deeds of stupendous daring. Sebastian de Belalcazar, Gonzalo Pizarro, Francisco de Orellana, Pedro de Ursua, Gonzalo Ximenes de Quesada flit across the pages in all their martial valor and prowess, followed by Sir Walter Raleigh all led and lured by this ignis fatuus of their golden dreams to perils on sea and land, and time and again to the most appalling tragedies. We could wish that their heroism, their indomitable pluck, daring and energy could have been spent in a nobler quest than that of the sordid metal whose glitter lured them on. But gold was not always the one object of the Spaniards' quest and many of these stern hidalgos had at heart the real good of the countries which they conquered. Everywhere the priest and the friar came in the wake of the conqueror to teach and Christianize the natives and defend their cause. Father Zahm has given us a fascinating little book, full of information and accurate detail. On page 6 "auri sacri fames" should be restored to its original and correct form "auri sacra fames." J. C. R.

The Two Dreams. By JUSTIN MASSÉ. Authorized Translation by Frederick Arthur. New York: The Devin-Adair Company. $1.35.

This remarkable story, which is artistic enough to have won the hearty commendation of that finished artist, Pierre Loti, the well-known French Academician, and profound enough to have summed up the spirit of the two forces which are struggling for the soul of France, is a splendid little tale of sublime self-sacrifice. It reads like a page torn from the diary of the innermost soul, and is a striking monument to the heroic generosity of those mothers and sons of the eldest daughter of the Church, whose untutored peasant-hearts have still the courage to lay their dearest hopes and fondest dreams on the altar of their Faith. The boy whose aspirations form the thread of the story—and who has the sensitive sympathy with the beauty and moods of nature of a St. Francis of Assisi—and his mother from whom he learns to climb the heights of self-oblation, are both gentle, tender, bravely steadfast figures, struggling hard but hopefully for higher things against the malignant cruelty of a bitterly cruel materialism.

Over the book there hangs the constant shadow of the Cross: but although its burden is one of sadness, it is not depressing but rather cheering, for its final message is one of promise that the Faith, no matter how many its enemies and how great its vicissitudes, shall never be torn from France, "where the ashes of our dead call thee, and the blood of our martyrs hold thee fast, and where "Christian mothers, even the poorest, are content to suffer for thee, and to give to God despite the hatred of the world, their true riches and their chief hope, the children of their love." This is the chief lesson of the book, meant for the lovers of France; but it has another message, scarcely less important, for all its readers, whose eyes are blinded by the glamour of the world and are held from seeing where true happiness lies. Devin-Adair is worthy of all praise for this and the many other excellent books which the firm has made accessible to American readers, at reasonable prices. J. H. F.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The current Catholic Mind begins with an eloquent and well-reasoned address by Archbishop Hanna on "The Church and Peace." His Grace shows that the Catholic Church is the stanchest defender of human liberty, the strongest protector of true democracy and the most consistent promoter of enduring peace there is in the world today. Then follows Father Hull's irrefragable answer to the old query, "'Catholic' or 'Roman Catholic'?" An Anglican minister in India has raised the question once more, and so the capable editor of the Bombay Examiner uses convincing theological and linguistic arguments to prove that the only church that has the right to call itself "Catholic" simpliciter is the Church that is in communion with the Successor of St. Peter.

"The Romance of King Arthur and His Knights of the Round Table" (Macmillan, $2.50), which Alfred W. Pollard has abridged from Malory's "Morte D'Arthur," and which Arthur Rackham has beautifully illustrated with sixteen pictures in color and seven in black and white, is a sumptuous holiday edition of that famous medieval book. In clearing away "some of the underwoods that the great trees may be seen," Mr. Pollard says that he has added hardly a hundred words of his own. Though some will regret that for the sake of younger readers he has not omitted more sentences and incidents that smack too much of the old Adam, still, compared with certain novels of today that "everybody is reading," Sir Arthur's high romance of knighthood is quite harmless, for sin always meets with punishment, vice is never painted as virtue, and courage, courtesy and fidelity are constantly practised.——Willy Pogany has painted four unusually fine pictures to illustrate "Tales of the Persian Genii" (Houghton Mifflin, $2.00), which Frances Jenkins Olcott retells for boys and girls. When Patna and Coulor, the son and daughter of Guialar, the Iman of Terki, entered the wonder-palace of the Good Genii, it was only to be expected that marvelous things would happen, and they did, for he had some forty Oriental stories to tell the children that are not only fascinating but even improving.

"The Story Book of Science" (Century, $2.00), by Jean-Henri Fabre, which Florence Constable Bicknell has excellently translated from the nineteenth French edition, will make an admirable Christmas present for boys and girls of about twelve. This charming Catholic writer in simple language tells about those marvels of nature and science which he has studied so deeply and in which he never fails to find manifestations of God's infinite power and wisdom. We can picture the eyes of the three little French children who listen to "Uncle Paul" growing as large as saucers as he tells them about the ant's "cows," "The Epeira's Bridge," and "Processionary Caterpillars," how the butterfly breaks open its cocoon with its eyes, how vipers "sting," how the bees' commonwealth is governed, why nettles hurt, how long trees and animals live, and a thousand other facts about the world around us and the field of science and discovery. M. Fabre knows how to give facts all the fascination of fiction. Children should learn to like his books, a number of which have already been praised in these columns. Dodd, Mead & Co. publish them.

This year, instead of writing a novel, Father Richard Aumerle Maher has prepared an attractive Christmas book called "While Shepherds Watched" (Macmillan, $1.25), which is a beautifully written amplification of the text, "Unto us a Child is born." In short chapters entitled "The Word," "The Woman," "The Mother of My God," "Joseph, Son of David," "Bethlehem of Judah," etc., he tells again the wondrous story of the first Christmas. The book is full of passages that will stimulate the imagination of the devout.——Pat for the holiday season come new and revised editions of Father Francis P. Donnelly's well-known books of devotion, "The Heart of the Gospel" and "The Heart of Revelation" (Kenedy, $0.75 each). Besides providing all the chapters with excellent paragraph heads to guide the reader, the author has added two new chapters to each of the volumes.——Cyrus Townsend Brady, a minister who says that he is "a priest of the Church," has put together "A Little Book for Christmas" (Putnam, $1.25), which is described as "containing a greeting, a word of advice, some personal adventures, a carol, a meditation and three Christmas stories for all ages." "Looking into the Manger" is a good Christmas sermon which shows that the author really believes Christ to be Divine, and that is something to be thankful for, in these days of disintegrating Protestantism.

Here are some beautifully illustrated holiday books for the children: "Christmas Tales of Flanders" (Dodd, Mead, $3.00) contains twenty-three quaint stories that for centuries have been told to little Flemish boys and girls. The devil always cuts a sorry figure in them, and the machinations of wicked enchanters are brought to naught by the simple and virtuous. The fine pictures in color and in line by Jean de Bosschère are as grotesque as could be wished.—— From the J. B. Lippincott Co., Philadelphia, comes a series of little books, gaily pictured in colors, which are sure to win the favor of even the most critical rulers of the nursery. They will particularly enjoy "Tales of Washington Irving's Alhambra," which Leila H. Cheney has simplified, and "Moufflon and Other Stories," by Louisa de la Ramée. In "Boys and Girls from Storyland," "Fairies and Goblins from Storyland," "Tell Me a Story Picture Book," "The Adventures of the Greyfur Family," and "The Greyfur Neighbors," every page of text is faced by such a bright and wonderful picture that the most sophisticated child will be interested.

An excellent Christmas gift for children, North and South, is "A Life of Robert E. Lee, for Boys and Girls" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.25), by Hamilton and Hamilton. The grandeur of the character of this modern Bayard is well depicted, although too little insistence is laid, perhaps, upon the part which religion played in the life of the Southern leader.——Another Christmas book is "Gulliver's Travels" (Macmillan, $2.00), edited by Padraic Colum. Willy Pogany's vivid illustrations in color and in black and white will please the children, and their innocence will be their shield against the Dean's inhuman cynicism. Nor will they take harm from an occasional expression, best omitted, in the preface, for what child will stop to read a preface when Gulliver is waiting to take him into the realm of romance?——"The Treasure of Mushroom Rock" (Putnam, $1.25), by Sidford F. Hamp, is a boy's book of modern adventure. Two London lads run away from their boarding-school to the wild West and have the usual adventures there.——"Scouting with General Funston" (Doubleday, $1.25), by Everett T. Tomlinson, relates the adventures two Texas boys had during the Villa raids. Interesting side-lights are thrown on the character of General Funston.

The purpose Hildegarde Hawthorne had in writing "Girls in Bookland" (Doran, $2.00) is an excellent one, for the good fairy who leads Rose and Ruth through a magic gate and then introduces them to the maidens that figure prominently in some of the great novels, will perhaps lure other lassies of our day to contract the habit of reading good books. The two girls have pleasant chats with such amiable heroines as Rowena, Lorna, Maid Marian, Queen Guinevere, Di Vernon, Romola, Little Nell, etc., and see each of them in her own home and country. Any youthful reader of the book who cannot catch every allusion the author makes should conscientiously turn to the original novel and pore over it till the force of each reference is perfectly clear. John Wolcott Adams supplies suitable pictures.——In Bertram Smith's "Days of Discovery" (Dutton, $1.50) is given an autobiographical account of some little English boys' nursery escapades. Their natural enemies, "Those in Authority," are outwitted, as a rule, with singular success. The rather labored humor of the book will probably weary American readers. Kenneth Graham's "The Golden Age" and "The Olympians" are the classics of this kind of literature.

"The Book of the Happy Warrior" (Longmans, $1.50), Sir Henry Newbolt's most recent collection of martial tales for boys, is the best of the series, for he now goes for his material to the days of chivalry and holds up for his youthful readers' admiration and emulation the brave deeds of such valiant knights as Roland and Oliver, Richard the Lion-Hearted, St. Louis, Bertrand du Guesclin, the Black Prince and the Chevalier Bayard. The adventures of Robin Hood are also narrated. The volume ends with excellent chapters on the spirit of chivalry as it flourished in the Middle Ages and as it persists today in all true soldiers. As Henry J. Ford has finely illustrated the volume with pictures in color and in line it makes a good gift-book.——"The Belgian Twins" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.25) is the latest of Lucy Fitch Perkins' attractive "twin-series." She now tells how little Jan and Marie fled to America from the German invader.

The Mount Carmel Gild of Buffalo, N. Y., has out betimes its "Catholic Calendar" ($0.50) for 1918. Apt quotations in prose and verse, chiefly from Catholic writers, are arranged on weekly panels and all the saints' days are noted. Here is a prayer for August from a "Medieval Anthology":

Sweet Lady, Saint Mary,
  Full of all courtesie,
Mother of Mercy and of Pity,—
Mine hope, mine help is all in thee,
Well I wot that born thou were
In help of all us wretches here.
Beseech thy Son, loved and dear,
For me a sinful wretch down here.
Beseech Him for the love of thee
That He have mercy on me;
And help me at mine ending day
From the foul fiend's dire affray.
Beseech, also, the Flower of All,
Thy Son, my Lord, for my friends all;
That He them keep with His grace
From all perils in each place;
And give them good life and good end
And joy when they shall heavenwards wend;
  Good Lord Jesus. Amen. Amen.

"Moscow in Flames" (Brentano's, $1.50), by Gregory P. Danilevski, and translated from the Russian by Dr. A. S. Rappaport, will be read with interest by those who have been following the course of events in present-day Russia. The burning of the great city is told in a strikingly vivid manner. No long descriptions weary the reader; step by step the Russian retreat is described, and the mysterious flames leap out from unknown sources to greet Napoleon's advance upon the city. The misery and desolation following in the wake of the fierce conflagration are strongly outlined. Napoleon's chagrin at his reception and his disastrous retreat as he is harassed by the Russian soldiers, like hounds at his heels, make fascinating reading. Too many details, however, mar the unity of the story. Characters that add nothing to the progress of the tale are introduced and described with a minuteness that grows wearisome. The simple love-story interwoven adds much to a subject in itself of lively interest. The heroine Aurora would make a fitting leader for the now-famous Battalion of Death.——"Thunder an' Turf" (Kennedy, $0.40), by the Rev. Mark O'Byrne, should more or less appeal to the sons of the "old sod" and to the sons of the sons of the "old sod." The little volume is a collection of ten sketches of Irish life, character, customs and incidents, stirring memories that are at once pleasant and reminiscent, some touching the anxieties of a parish priest, others the Fenian movement of '67, etc.

The thirty-six pages of thick paper in R. Gorell Barnes' "Days of Destiny, War Poems at Home and Abroad" (Longman's, $1.00) hold few verses of more enduring worth than the dedicatory stanzas "To England," whom he calls the "Great little mother of half the world, and the following tribute "To Belgium":

They think, those savage reivers, that you lie
Wholly down-stricken, bleeding now to death:
They have not learnt that while a single breath
Of freedom stirs the world you cannot die.

What you have wrought can never pass away:
Proud prodigal of Honor, still you stand;
Trampled and torn with grief, your little land
Had never life so glorious as today.

The body slain, the spirit still is free;
Yours burns, a quenchless beacon, through the night;
And all the fires their murderous marchings light,
But hatch the phœnix of your liberty.

In an excellent paper on "The Renascence of Catholic Poetry" in the Newman Quarterly for November, its editor expresses the hope that some one will soon be found who will bear the expense ($500) of bringing out a volume of the poems and letters of Father Gerard Hopkins, S.J., which Mr. Robert Bridges, the Poet Laureate, has in preparation. Following the article is "The Starlight Night," one of the Jesuit poet's sonnets, which runs thus:

Look at the stars! look, look up at the skies!
  O look at all the fire-folk sitting in the air!
  The bright boroughs, the quivering citadels there!
The dim woods quick with diamond wells; the elf-eyes!
The gray lawns cold where quaking gold-dew lies!
  Wind-beat whitebeam; airy abeles all on flare!
  Flake-doves sent floating out at a farmyard scare!—
Ah well! It is a purchase and a prize.

Buy then! Bid then!—What?—Prayer, patience, alms, vows.—
Look, look! a May-mess, like on orchard boughs;
  Look! March-bloom, like on mealed-with-yellow sallows.—
These are indeed the barn: within-doors house
The shocks. This piece-bright paling hides the Spouse Christ, and the mother of Christ, and all His hallows.

"Let it be a book" is always sound counsel for those who are at a loss what Christmas presents to give their relatives and friends. But if the question of just what books to buy still perplexes AMERICA's readers, perhaps a glance through the volumes reviewed in this number, or acknowledged under "Books Received," will help to solve the problem. As a further aid, the following list of books commended in these columns during the past year is offered:

ASCETICISM AND APOLOGETICS: Mgr. As for those books that will make suitable presents for the little ones and for their little older brothers and sisters, in another column will be found notices of many old favorites that have come out in new editions, and in recent numbers of AMERICA appeared reviews of such juveniles as Father Finn's "Lucky Bob," and Father Spalding's "At the Foot of the Sand Hills" (Benziger, $1.00 each.) Every Christmas there is an inundation of new books for boys and girls, but it is wise to get them to read instead the time-honored children's classics.

EDUCATION

The Willow Gad

CORPORAL punishment is one of the perennial problems of the parent and teacher. It was not always the problem that it is today, because there was a time when its use was scarcely questioned; a time when parents had recourse to it without a qualm, and the master of the little red schoolhouse—it was not the mistress then—was chosen for his muscularity as much as for his ability to impart knowledge. Thus did the trustees or selectmen or board, or whatever the governing body might have been, insure the vigorous handling of the bodies of their young offspring, as well as the cultivation of their minds. A century ago, when Thoreau, the famous naturalist, with his brother John, opened a boys' school at Concord, the fact that whipping was practically abolished therein created a sensation in the old Massachusetts town.

THE COURT OF "LAST RESORT"

IT is a perennial problem, one that will never be solved, because it springs up anew with every recurring army of recruits in the nursery or the classroom, and no hard and fast rules of the parent or the teacher imposed upon himself or herself can fully meet it. All depends on the child, the individual child. Generally speaking, however, it must be said that corporal punishment, as a potentiality and a possibility, at any rate, is preferable and more effective than its abolishment. There are gentle children to whom the ferule need never be applied; to whom, indeed, to apply it would be a disaster. But there are ungentle boys in the world also, and others so easily influenced or led astray that the spectacle of one of their boon companions falling under the rod has the most salutary effect imaginable. A well-known priest of San Francisco, Dr. Crowley, who has had a lifetime's experience in dealing with boys, once said at a welfare conference that "It has taken but one good whipping to start many a boy right." Father Crowley, we imagine, was facing rather stern odds when he uttered these words. In these days of overdone sentimentality and scientific mollycoddling it is almost revolutionary to hear a man declaring for the good old-fashioned rule of "Spare the rod and spoil the child." "The rod," said Dr. Crowley, "will establish submission when all other means have failed. It is the juvenile court of last resort."

THE NEED OF AUTHORITY

IN discussing, recently, the present world-crisis and the part played therein by our own country, with a certain high ranking officer of the United States army, I was told this one thing with all the force that a strong man can put into his words: "What we Americans lack is authority. The sense of responsibility to authority is so vague and undeveloped among us, that it might be said to be a minus quantity altogether." Is not the absence of the "rod" in the home as well as the school to be blamed for this national defect of ours? Let the "rod" mean all that authority and firm discipline can signify: is it not too little in evidence in our American life? A visit to the army training camps that the present war has brought forth will convince any open mind that this is so.

"Fear is the beginning of wisdom"; but, alas! the youngsters of the present day have less of it in their make-up than is good for them. It is all very well for fond parents, and green teachers, to declare that they will "rule by love":

> "Speak kindly, it is better far
> To rule by love than fear."

But love is not ennobling that has no foresight, that is weak, that does not carry with it the strong hand of authority. The parent or teacher who thinks to manage a lively crowd of boys by a course of sweet heavenly smiles, only does the youngsters injury and invites disaster on his own foolish head. The swift and vigorous hand of finality must be there to support the laws and regulations of the classroom or the fireside. Love is never born of fear, of course; and we do above all things desire our children to love us. But there is a fear born of love that is priceless beyond rubies. That is the desiderandum.

The Implement in Hand

SPARE the rod and break the teacher's and the parent's heart. That is the way it inevitably works out. If the world-war, through which we are now agonizing, only results in showing us our national weaknesses, and influencing us to seek remedies for them, it will have indeed been a blessing. That it will result in an awakening to the need of discipline I firmly believe. Then will we say "Hail to the Willow Gad," or the strap, or the slipper, or whatever the implement "in hand" may be! The fond parent, or the fonder teacher, may be in earnest when he solemnly announces, "This hurts me just as much as it does you, Willie," but he is doing his duty to himself, his child, and his country, when he applies the switch on certain necessary occasions.

ECONOMICS

Cancelation vs. Repudiation

"I HOPE England repudiates her war debt" was the startling remark, in a casual discussion of business prospects when peace comes, of the manager and financial man of a corporation running at full capacity on war contracts. After-war conditions present a grave problem. Europe can pay us only in goods. She cannot pay us in money, nor would we permit her to do so. So vast an amount of gold would be perhaps impossible to obtain in a century, and its abundance when brought to this country would make it tend to the value of copper. Payment in gold is out of the question; yet such a prospect pleasingly fills the mind of many.

Payment in Goods

WITHOUT further consideration of gold payment, what will be the effect of payment in goods? As the goods arrive in this country they will be owned entirely by the financiers, small and great. Labor will have no share in them. If the worker buys them, he can do so only by using so much less of the goods produced here. Yet, an amount equal to all the goods produced by us in the future, must be used in the United States before we are in a position where it is possible for us to be paid. So it may be said that the workers can buy none of the goods with which Europe pays us; for the workers' wages will not buy even as much as is produced here. Of course, if we make further excess shipments when peace comes, the debt will be increased.

Repudiation by England and France would cause grave industrial and financial disturbances in this country, yet the business men of those countries would be only too glad to pay. The more they paid, the more profit for them, because the more business for them. Payment would be at the expense of the workers of those countries, but their industries would thrive. Hence the people would be cajoled into the belief that they were prosperous. We have been thankful during the past three years for the opportunity of shipping our goods; they would be similarly prosperous in shipping to us.

But we could only have made our excessive shipments because of the numbers, also large consumers of goods, detached from European industries. If, then, when the war is ended, we maintain, as is proposed by the most influential press, a large army and navy requiring extraordinary equipment, we shall be in a position to receive and assimilate whatever amount Europe can spare us in settlement of her account. For our normal production will thus be greatly lessened, while our consumption of commodities will be increased. Even though our workers could not buy what is sent us in payment, the Government, by taxation, could buy from the capitalist owners of imports, and from domestic producers, an amount equal to the cost of supporting its military and naval establishment; or the imports would supplement domestic products used by the Government.

Where Our Protection?

BUT if the war is to result in disarmament, it will be impossible for Europe to pay us. All our workers would then be available for productive employment, and could produce more wealth than they were permitted to utilize. If all our workers were productively employed, and to the best advantage to the country, there would be practically no market for foreign goods. Conversely, if there is a market for foreign goods sufficiently great to make an appreciable reduction in Europe's debt to us, then to a corresponding degree must there be unemployment in this country that the people are not apt to stand patiently.

But we can protect ourselves by a high tariff, says even the man of affairs. A high tariff would make it impossible for us to be paid. We can be paid only by goods entering this country, and at a selling price that will successfully compete with our own products.

What, then, is best for us to do, for ourselves and for the allied nations? Make Germany assume the burden? There would be no better way of insuring her "place in the sun." Her industries would have to be prosperous beyond vision to accomplish it. The more we successfully demanded, the more extensive her industries would be. In fact, our financiers would then be more interested in her prosperity than in our own, so that she might be able to pay the bill.

Indemnity and Cancelation

THE reader has already exclaimed "Preposterous!" But, economically considered, an indemnity has the same effect as a gift. If Europe's payment were postponed a generation its gift-like nature would at that time be apparent. What is the economic effect of a great international gift or indemnity? In "International Finance" Hartley Withers, an English authority and an apologist for international trade, says: "Trade is nothing but an exchange of goods and services. Other countries are not so philanthropic as to kill England's trade by making her presents of their products." Let us not permit the killing of our trade by allowing any nation to make us gifts, through deferred payment, or to pay us an indemnity.

What, then, is the proposition? Cancelation! Let us transform our loans to the Allies into a national contribution. Their industries will not suffer, for the goods have been consumed, being sent as a supplement to the goods they produced; while, if we pay our financiers, we will be but contributing to our own wealth. We can pay the bill with but little cost to our people. That seems absurd. But if we pay our capitalists a billion or twenty billions, there must be so much added value in existence. Wealth has value only as it is of value to society, to the people. If the financiers were given a vast amount of new capital, it would have to be utilized to maintain its value. Competition for opportunity to be used would reduce the rate of profit on all capital, and capital would have to be used to have any value. The capitalist's cost to society, under proper conditions, would be but his personal consumption of goods and services, which would tend to increase but little in relation to his added wealth.

We have pretended we were prosperous when we were shipping goods abroad, which shipments represented excess profit. We would be really prosperous when we were piling up values in this country which, though owned by the capitalist, could only be of value to him to the extent that they were useful to the people. But the workers cannot see that. They will be easily seduced to acclaim the prospect of new foreign markets and a favorable balance of trade, thus allowing the capitalist to possess value abroad that is of no value to the people of this country.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Doing Our Bit

THE Protestant foreign mission receipts for the past year are given in the Catholic Missions. The figures are taken from the current issue of the "Year Book of Protestant Missions." We find that in round numbers the Protestants of the United States contributed $19,000,000. Great Britain and Ireland gave $8,000,000 and Canada $1,000,000 to the same cause. War-stricken continental Europe contributed its mite of $2,000,000. "Thirty millions in all!" exclaims the editor of the Catholic Missions. "And this in war-time!" Catholics should make it a matter of serious self-examination, particularly at this holy season, whether they have not pulled their purse strings too tightly when the mission appeal was made to them. There is still time to remember our heroic missionaries, to offer our share, whether great or small, to the Propagation of the Faith, the Holy Childhood, or any of the well-approved mission organizations. We have become a billion-dollar nation, and we can no longer forget the brave men at the front, our Catholic missionaries in heathen lands, nor the self-devoted women who are doing more for humanity than even the Red Cross nurses, or any humanitarian organization interested in the welfare of the bodies of men. It is a great war, and we must fight on to victory.

Sound Declarations of Labor Principles

A HOPEFUL sign is the insistence upon industrial agreements and strike avoidance in the official summary of the principles of the organized-labor movement, as declared at the Buffalo convention of the American Federation of Labor. "The trade-union movement," says the report, "is committed to mediation and arbitration. Strike settlements by these methods increase in proportion to the workers' unity." In evidence the following declaration of the Buffalo convention is then quoted: "It is advisable that production should not cease because of an apparent injustice or oversight contained in an award, for it is necessary for the nation's protection, as well as for the welfare of the trade-union movement, that there should be no cessation of work except as a last resort." Insistence is further laid upon reciprocal relations between employers and employed, if production is to reach its "peak" point. "The nation's interest makes it essential that cooperation should exist in the industries. There can be no efficiency in production without good-will. The employer who talks about 'individual rights' and refuses to recognize labor ignores flint-hewn facts." All these are Catholic principles. The test, however, will lie in the application of them. The interests of the consumer are often overlooked with equal indifference by both labor and capital. There can be no true social development until wages and profits alike are regulated and limited to conform with the common welfare.

The Pre-Reformation Printed Bible

VALUABLE data concerning the number of Bibles printed before the Reformation period are gathered together in an article by the Rev. John Lenhart, O.M. Cap., in the Seraphic Home Journal. The complete number of editions of the entire Bible printed in Europe between the years 1450 and 1500 was 177, according to the figures quoted from Mr. Peddie. Of these editions 134 were printed in Latin, fifteen in German, thirteen in Italian, and eleven in French. Two were Bohemian, one Dutch, and one Spanish. Bibles, says Father Lenhart, were the best-sellers in the fifteenth century. Yet in the year 1500 Luther was only seventeen years of age and had no thought of issuing a Bible of his own. Father Lenhart says:

> The vast mass of printed Bibles as revealed by modern research attests more than anything else how highly the people of the fifteenth century valued the Bible. The printers of those days conducted their trade upon a business basis. They did not print those thousands of Bibles to distribute them gratis among the people, like the modern Bible Societies. They were business men trying to make a living by publishing Bibles and other books. Naturally they put on the market books that were most in demand, the best-sellers. The output in those days was as truly an index of the prevailing demand as it is nowadays. Except for the few Bibles donated by the printers and the rare cases of over-production, those thousands of Bibles were bought by the people with their money. We know the names of some of those buyers, the years when they bought their Bibles, and the price they paid for them.
> In spite of the immense output of Bibles in our day we may say that it is relatively less than in the days preceding the Reformation. According to modern researches there were, at the lowest figures, 8,000,000 books printed from 1445 to 1500. Of these 53,100 were Bibles. Every one hundred and fiftieth book printed was therefore a Bible. In these calculations, moreover, the entire Bible only is considered, containing all the books from Genesis to the Apocalypse. Were we to compute the sections of the Bible printed, as is done in modern Protestant statistics, the Bible figures would be increased eightfold. A great many Christians did not possess a complete printed Bible, nevertheless, as Father Lenhart remarks, "they were acquainted with the contents of the Bible to a greater extent than many people of our day imagine." There was, moreover, no Catholic to whom the Scriptures were not read and expounded, and who might not behold their illustration in the richly colored windows and the very stones of the Catholic churches that were the glory of the Ages of Faith.

War Prices Impairing Our Children's Health

AN investigation into the effects of the increased price of milk has just been concluded in New York. It discloses the serious danger threatening the country on this score. Since the price of milk had risen to fourteen cents a quart, it was found that more than half of the 2,200 families visited had substituted tea and coffee for milk. Yet in all of these families there were children under six years of age. Special attention is called by the Federal Children's Bureau to the imperative necessity of milk in the diet of babies and young children. Of the families in question 120 had given up milk entirely, although in twenty-five of these there were children under one year of age. Of the total number of families with young children investigated by the New York committee nearly half were taking from one-fourth to one-half less milk than before. Yet even before the high price had decreased the amount of milk, these families were getting little more than half the quantity of milk which experts on children's diets claim they need. Dr. Grace L. Meigs, Director of the Child Hygiene Division of the Federal Children's Bureau, commenting on the danger of such a decrease of milk to the health of our American children, says:

> Milk is the one food that all young children must have if they are to be strong and healthy. Whole milk is rich in the elements without which the child's growth ceases and his health is impaired; indeed there is no food which can supply as well the needs of the growing child. There is no substitute for milk in the diet of babies and young children. Yet the increase in its price is so startling that, as the reports the Bureau receives show, many mothers are economizing on milk. Young children cannot get the nourishment they require from the would-be milk substitutes given them. Patent foods which do not themselves contain milk and are not intended to be mixed with milk are so lacking in the essentials of healthy development that we must expect children fed on them instead of on milk to be weakly and ailing. Plainly, very great harm is done young children by giving them tea and coffee to take the place of milk which is really a complete food; it is giving them mere stimulants to replace their best food.

The situation evidently calls for serious deliberation and effective action. The problem is by no means restricted to New York. In certain Connecticut towns where milk delivered at the station was sold wholesale at eight cents a quart, the retail price rose as high as fifteen cents. The welfare of our country requires that our growing children at least be abundantly provided with this wholesome diet of milk.

The Church and Education

THE Catholic Church, writes William P. H. Kitchin, in a recent issue of the Irish Rosary, was the first to establish gratuitous teaching and free schools.

> Pre-Christian educators surrounded the acquisition of knowledge with obstacles and mysteries; the schools of the philosophers were closed to the uninitiated; the rhetoricians and grammarians exacted heavy toll for their lore. But the Church and her leaders threw open the feast of knowledge to all, she went out into the highways and byways to compel the indifferent to enter. St. John the Evangelist is said to have established a school at Ephesus, St. Polycarp one at Smyrna; in the catacombs of St. Agnes, side by side with the chapels where the Christians prayed, were the schoolrooms where the catechumens were taught. De Rossi found in the cemetery of St. Callixtus the epitaph of a humble Magister Primus; two well-known martyrs, SS. Cassian and Flavian, had been schoolmasters.... The catechetical school of Alexandria, founded by Pantaenus, made illustrious by Clement and Origin, embraced all the knowledge of the time, and was a worthy precursor of the universities still to come. As far back as the third century free schools and libraries begin to form around each great cathedral, and churchmen spare no pains to attach to themselves promising pupils, who give indications of becoming eminent professors in mature life. Nearly every city of the Old World can point to some great saint, who inaugurated the reign of science in its bosom, and who, too, trained up suitable successors to carry on and propagate his work.

Well, therefore as the writer adds, may the humblest Catholic teacher, whose diploma is but of yesterday, exclaim with all the enthusiasm of a great zeal in a sublime cause: "I belong to a noble company, wherein are found apostles and martyrs, pontiffs and confessors, the sublimest geniuses and the grandest heroines; and we have been teaching, refining and leavening the world for the past 2,000 years." What other teacher can say the same?

Billy Sunday's Reason for Denominationalism

BILLY SUNDAY is a believer in denominationalism because it reflects, he says, the variety of temperaments among the people. "No two blades of grass are alike. God loves variety and He's got more than fifty-seven kinds." Then follows a glowing description of the green of the grass, the purple of the grape, the yellow of the orange, the red of the apple, the white of the snow, the black of the coal, the blue of the sky, the crimson of the sunset and the golden glory of the full noontide. Yet when all has been said, the fact remains that truth is one and that two contradictory doctrines cannot both be stamped with its seal. All that was taught by Christ we must believe, observing "whatsoever I have commanded you." He therefore leaves us no choice among conflicting doctrines such as constitute the teachings of the countless varieties of sects. However, the truth itself, as it exists in its entirety in the Catholic Church, is endlessly rich in variety of beauty and color, and all is exquisitely harmonized, like the light that passes through the gorgeous stained-glass windows of some ancient cathedral built far back in the Ages of Faith. But it is the temperamental variety of the sects that attracts Billy Sunday, and for this he is willing to waive the doctrinal contradictions which render them impossible of acceptance:

> I believe in denominations. Oh, if you've got a good, gingery, warm, enthusiastic make-up you'd make a good Methodist—or would have before the Methodists lost their religion. If you're a little stiff, you may be an Episcopalian or a Presbyterian. You need to be loosened up a little bit. I believe that denominations reflect the different temperaments of the people. I believe they are God all through.

In choosing a religion it is therefore a question of selecting the one that best agrees with our temperamental disposition. Its doctrine is apparently of no importance, provided its inventor has labeled it "Christian." Yet here, too, there is no Church that so perfectly accords with every temperament as the one and only Church of Christ. It was built by Him upon Peter precisely to answer the needs of all men without discrimination of race, color or temperament. For proof that it has fulfilled the purpose of its Founder we require no other argument than the fact of its catholicity: within its fold are all manner of men.

Army and Navy Chaplains

A CLEAR exposition of the number and status of the Catholic chaplains with the United States army and navy has been sent to the press by the Knights of Columbus Committee on War Activities. Before the declaration of war sixteen Catholic chaplains had been allowed for the army and eight for the navy. Since that time the number has increased to thirty-seven priests in the army and nineteen in the navy. The original plan had provided for 350 chaplains, 128 of whom were to have been Catholics. The increase in the size of the regiments, however, greatly reduced this number, since the law provides one chaplain only for each regiment, regardless of its size. Thus the total number of chaplains has now been reduced to 128 of all denominations. The following remarks are made regarding the method of assignment:

> The method of distributing chaplaincies has been placed upon a satisfactory basis, the official church census of the United States being taken as the unit of assignment. At present 36.6 per cent of the chaplaincies are to be filled by priests. The method of appointing chaplains to the navy remains as it has always been, the matter being entirely in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy. Secretary Daniels has demonstrated his absolute fairness to the complete satisfaction of the Catholic Hierarchy.

The National Guard has, unfortunately, but few Catholic chaplains. This is probably due to the fact that in times of peace these appointments were largely honorary, and also because National Guard chaplains were chosen by the commanding officers of the regiments, who were not controlled by those laws which regulate the appointment of chaplains to the Federal service. Yet the supply of commissioned chaplains for the regular and national armies, too, is inadequate for the needs of our Catholic soldiers. Hence the appointment of thirty-seven auxiliary chaplains provided by the Knights of Columbus. Though without official status in the army, and receiving absolutely no support from the Government, they are permitted to work in the army camps. Their assistance therefore is of inestimable value. The hope of Catholics at present rests in the passing of a bill which was blocked in the House Committee during the last days of the previous session. It provides that one chaplain be permitted for every 1,200 men, thus giving three chaplains to each regiment. This is the ratio upon which chaplains are assigned to the navy and the coast artillery corps, where the division is not upon the regimental basis. United efforts must be made that the bill be passed successfully at this session.

The War.—The capture of Jerusalem early in the week by the British came as a natural sequel to General Allenby's strategic advance and the seizure of Jaffa and later of Hebron A part of General Allenby's troops, advancing from the direction of Bethlehem, drove back the enemy and passing Jerusalem on the east, established themselves on the Jerusalem-Jericho road, while another division attacked the enemy position west and northwest of Jerusalem, and placed themselves astride the Jerusalem-Schechem road. The city was thus surrounded and surrendered. Every care was taken to avoid injuring the Holy Places. On December 11, General Allenby entered the city officially at noon on foot, with his staff, the commanders of the French and Italian detachments, the heads of the political missions, and the military attachés of France, Italy and America. Guards were set over the Holy Places and the military governor appointed by General Allenby was immediately put in contact with the custodians and the Latin and Greek representatives. A proclamation from the British commander "To the inhabitants of Jerusalem the Blessed," written in Arabic, Hebrew, English, French, Italian, Greek and Russian, was published, proclaiming martial law and intimating that all the Holy Places would be maintained and protected according to "the existing customs and beliefs of those to whose faith they are sacred."

Bulletin, Dec. 10, p.m.-Dec. 17, a.m.

On the western front, after continuous artillery fire from the Germans to search out the British positions, severe fighting again flared up in the Ypres sector and resulted in the capture by the enemy of a small section of British trenches in Polygon Wood, part of which was later on taken by Marshal Haig's forces, who also made a successful counter-attack near Poelderhoek Chateau. On the Cambrai front, after an unprecedented concentration of men and guns, a fierce attack was made by the enemy against the elbow in the bend of the British line between Bullecourt and Quéant, about ten miles west of Cambrai. The British report says that the vigorous defense of General Byng's men arrested the movement, but only after the Germans had obtained a footing on about 500 yards of the British front.

In spite of heavy Austro-German attacks along the Italian mountain front the Italian lines, except in a few positions, seem so far to be holding the enemy. The fighting has been especially severe between the Brenta and Piave Rivers; in the Col della Beretta region and in the Col dell Orso, where large German units stormed from the east Monte Spinoncia and the defenses in the Calcina Valley, and south of the Col Caprille heights, previously captured by them. On the lower Piave the Italians claim to have repulsed all attacks.

Mr. Baker, Secretary of War, announced on December 15, after a conference with President Wilson, that a Military War Council to be composed of the Secretary of War, the Assistant Secretary of War and five high-ranking officers of the regular army had been created in a general order issued that day. This body is to devote itself to the problem of supply for the American forces in the field, and will serve as a connecting link between these forces and the War Department. From the statement made by the Secretary, it has been generally inferred that the War Council will consider matters of military policy and questions relating to the cooperation of the United States forces with those of the Allies, and that it will act in conjunction with the Inter-Allied War Council, just organized in Europe, of which Oscar T. Crosby, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, has been elected president. In his statement Secretary Baker says that the new War Council will not take over the "specialized duties" of the Army General Staff and the Army War College but will devote itself to the "larger problems" of the War Department. It is intended to send members of the War Council to the various theaters of the war to gather information for the Council. General officers of large experience will be added to the council from time to time. The Secretary's statement indicates that the new body will determine or at least outline matters of strategy and problems that have a political or semi-political aspect. It might be called a sort of Super-General Staff. One of its members will be the Chief of the General Staff.

New Military Council

An investigation of the country's war efforts has been started by Congress. The Senate ordered a general inquiry into the work of the War Department, while the House is looking into the state of the military establishment with special reference to the ordnance. The Senate plans to investigate the coal and sugar situation, and the House is preparing to look into the shipping problem. General Crozier, of the Ordnance Bureau, testified that owing to delay this country will probably have to borrow its artillery in France until some time next summer. Secretary Baker came in for some criticism for the delay. For the machine-gun delay the Secretary took full responsibility, but stated that every plant in the country is now being operated to full capacity.

Investigations

The recent change of government in Portugal was due partly to economic conditions and partly to political reasons. Premier Costa and President Machado have been arrested, the presidency going to Dr. Sidonio Paes, leader of the revolt and former Minister to Germany. The new leaders, though supposed to be personally favorable to Germany, have declared, it is reported, that Portugal will continue her previous international policy. In the lower house of the Prussian Diet Chancellor von Hertling introduced an electoral reform bill and the act has been characterized by its author as a turning point in history. Deputy Strobel, on the occasion, made a significant speech in the Diet urging the democratization of the country as the only means of escaping from the evils of the war. Maximilian Harden says that "only a miracle can bring peace." "Either Germany must be crushed or our enemies must be defeated. There is no alternative."

Other Items

Austro-Hungarian subjects now in the United States, most of the million of whom are laborers and, according to Government information, loyal to the Allied War cause, will suffer but few restrictions as a result of the war between this country and Austria-Hungary. In a proclamation issued on December 12, declaring a state of war with Austria-Hungary, in accordance with the act of Congress, the President specified that unnaturalized Austro-Hungarians, unlike the Germans in this country, shall be free to live and travel anywhere, except that they may not enter or leave the United States without permission, and those suspected of enemy activity may be interned. They need not register with police or post-office officials, as Germans will soon be required to do, and are not debarred from the 100-yard zone about docks, piers and warehouses closed to Germans, and are not required to leave the District of Columbia. As an indication of the attitude of the President towards the Austro-Hungarians, it has been pointed out that nowhere in the proclamation does he use the phrase "enemy aliens," but refers to them only as "natives, citizens, denizens or subjects" of Austria-Hungary.

Status of Austro-Hungarians

Declaring himself in agreement with President Wilson's statement of war aims, Premier Lloyd George in a speech at London before Gray's Inn benchers, December 14, asserted that the Allies were making progress towards the goal of victory, which was the only hope of peace. According to the Premier, any peace overture to Prussia would be a betrayal of trust. Victory, he added, was now a question of tonnage, and Germany was evidently gambling on a failure by the United States to transport her troops to Europe in time. In the course of the speech the Premier pronounced the last word in the peace controversy opened by the recent letter of the Marquis of Lansdowne. He thoroughly indorsed President's Wilson's declaration of war aims, but found no common ground in the paths of the President and the Marquis towards peace. The Premier made no specific statement with regard to the war aims which the Marquis had urged. In referring to the Lansdowne letter, Mr. Lloyd George said:

The Lloyd George Speech

> I now understand that all our anxieties concerning this epistle were groundless, that the Marquis of Lansdowne did not intend to convey the meaning which his words might reasonably bear, and that all the time he was in complete agreement with President Wilson's message. Now, the Government is in full agreement with that message. Mr. Asquith also is in agreement with it.

The Premier added that he did not fear the extreme pacifists, but admitted that there was a minority of people busying themselves with the views advocated by the letter and who thought that in its author they had found a leader whom the country would follow into "a premature and vanquished peace." He warned the nation to watch men who think there is a half-way house between victory and defeat. He admitted that this "was not the most propitious hour," that Russia's threatened retirement from the war strengthens the Hohenzollerns and weakens the forces of democracy, but that Russia's action will not lead, as she imagines, to universal peace. "It will inevitably prolong the world's agony and inevitably put her in bondage to Prussian military dominance." But if Russia is out, he said, America is in with both arms, and the gap formed by Russia's retirement will be filled "by the valiant sons of the great American Republic."

France.—Even anti-clericalism, with all its rabid hatred of the Religious Orders, is forced to pay homage to the heroism and patriotism of those whom it drove out of France. The following article, which appeared lately in an anti-clerical journal, L'Italie, published in Italy, is an eloquent testimony, extorted by the evidence of facts, from the sworn enemies of those whom it praises:

Jesuit Distinctions

> Jesuits in France! What are we coming to? Yes, the Jesuits are in France, fighting Jesuits, not for the purpose of prayer, or teaching, or preaching, for they have been forbidden such things by the country of Caillaux, though their schools have produced such men as Castelnau, Foch and Guynemer. Jesuits from distant French missions, where wild savagery and primitive barbarism are to be found, where they are free to preach Christ, preach Christ unhampered, and die for Christ too. These Jesuits have left their distant missions to do their duty by their native land, the land which exiled them, because of their faith, to those foreign countries. Yet France, immortal France, had to call them back. There were 750 of them in all, of whom 112 have been killed, 20 taken prisoners, and 48 wounded. Think of it! Fifteen per cent of their total number fallen! There are still 528 of them in active service; and among these are to be found 10 chaplains, 15 lieutenants, 31 sub-lieutenants, 8 adjutants, 2 midshipmen, 96 sergeants, 59 corporals, 3 doctors and 6 marine officers. So much for their efficiency.

As for their bravery, it suffices to mention the well-earned distinctions of this Company of Jesus which is serving in the Army of the Republic. Of the 528 Jesuits still in active service, 27 have merited the Legion of Honor, 16 have won the Military Medal, 200 the War Cross, 239 the Summons to the Order of the Day, 2 the Medal for Bravery during an Epidemic, 3 the English D. M. C. Medal, 1 the Belgian Cross of War, 1 the Serbian Eagle Medal, and 1 the Medal of the Order of Isabella of Spain; in all, 490 decorations and distinctions for 528 men enlisted, which means ninety-three per cent of the whole. Who will dare assert hereafter that the "Spiritual Exercises" of St. Ignatius, that much libeled book, does not import a characteristic Jesuit training and an education truly typical and thorough!

Nor is this all. The French Jesuits are serving their country, not by arms alone, though it is much to do this, but in the intellectual sphere as well. The Etudes, the masterly review, is continually giving expression to the noblest sentiments of Christian patriotism, so necessary today. Truly may the Jesuits apply to themselves the words of Veuillot: "In the midst of competition and faction no side claims us but Church and country." Jesuits! That ninety-three per cent says all! What party, or group of men, or club, or lodge can claim similar distinction in its devotion to country? Out of one hundred persons ninety-three were decorated or honored. That indeed is Jesuitical! Nothing more need be said.

Very different all this from the words of opprobrium hurled by the anti-clericals against the Jesuits these many years. Much the same, doubtless, could be said of the other orders, were the details of their practical love of country put on record. Will the enemies of the Society of Jesus remember its service after the war? Have we heard the last of the malicious lie, that loyalty to the Church and the Holy Father is incompatible with unquestioned love of country? Past history forbids us to be oversanguine. Nevertheless the facts are on record. It would be well if they were treasured against the day of need.

In marked contrast to this evidence of Jesuit patriotism are the charges now before the Chamber of Deputies against the arch-enemy of the Jesuits and the soul of anti-clericalism, M. Joseph Caillaux, mentioned above, who has posed for many years in Paris as the embodiment of French patriotism. M. Caillaux is at present facing trial on three accusations, namely, an attempt against the safety of the State by acts of a nature tending to compromise the alliances concluded between France and foreign Powers; treasonable relations with the enemy; and dishonorable peace propaganda. The matter was brought before the Chamber by General Duvail, Military Governor of Paris, in a letter asking for authorization to proceed with the prosecution of the former Premier. The Committee of Eleven, appointed by the Chamber to report on the case, has been urged by Dr. Clemenceau, the Premier, to suspend the immunities of Deputy Caillaux on the ground that the country demands an investigation. But the Committee withheld action pending further evidence on the charges. Some documents have already been laid before it; other documents, said the Premier, could not be put at its disposal without authorization from the foreign Powers concerned.

Accusations Against Caillaux

M. Caillaux appeared before the Committee and declared that the charges against him were the result of a personal quarrel between himself and Camille Barrère, the French Ambassador at Rome. Premier Clemenceau later informed the Committee of Eleven that unless the iimmunity of ex-Premier Caillaux the present Ministry could not remain in power. Accordingly a vote was taken in which nine of the Committee were in favor of granting M. Clemenceau's demand.

Rome.—Strictures on the Pope's note have taken particular exception to the attitude of His Holiness towards Belgium. If any voice can be relied on to give correct expression to the sentiments of Belgium it is that of the distinguished Cardinal of Malines, Archbishop Mercier. In a letter addressed to the Holy Father on October 10, but only lately given to the public, he writes as follows in the name of the Belgian Bishop and clergy:

Cardinal Mercier's Letter

> We feel constrained to express to your Holiness how happy we have been made by learning of the new proofs of your paternal love for Belgium, contained in the message of peace addressed to the belligerent nations. . . . While fulfilling your lofty mission of endeavoring to restore peace to the world, you have had special solicitude for our unhappy country. Your Holiness asks of those who have the direction of the destinies of the belligerent nations in this terrible tragic hour to provide for the total evacuation of Belgium, with guarantees for its complete political, military and economic independence; but an official commentary makes it clear that the part of the message of your Holiness, which speaks of a final indemnity based on justice and equity, has Belgium in mind.

In view of the fact that both the King and the Primate of Belgium have put themselves on record as greatly gratified with the Pope's attitude towards their country, reasonable men will know how to discount malicious criticisms on the subject which are entirely at variance with the truth.

An association has been recently formed in Rome to cultivate and emphasize loyalty to the Pope. The character of the organization is thus set forth in the Catholic Herald of India:

> Amongst the means to this end it is proposed that every year on the feast-day of the reigning Pontiff, and on the anniversary of his birth, Catholics throughout the whole world should unite in a common prayer, also assisting at Holy Mass and offering Communion for the intentions of the Pope. All who are ready to undertake this obligation, be they individuals, families, associations or parishes, are requested to send their adhesion to the seat of the Committee, whose address is Via San Marcello, 20a Rome. The Committee propose to present to the Holy Father each year an album containing the names of all who have participated in this act of devotion on his account. During the reign of the present Pontiff the dates for the two Communions will be the 25 July, his fête-day, and November 21, the day of his birth.

Since the very earliest days of the Church devotion to the Holy See has been the touchstone of Faith. Undoubtedly in these days of violent attack on the Papacy Catholics the world over will be anxious to give to the Holy Father this simple and touching proof of their adherence to the Chair of Peter.

Russia.—The Bolsheviki's first attempt to conclude an armistice with Germany, as was noted in last week's chronicle, ended in failure, for the Kaiser's representatives insisted that Russia should withdraw her troops from the occupied portion of Galicia and the Black Sea littoral, and Russia's counter-proposals were that Germany should evacuate the islands in Moon Sound and guarantee not to transfer troops to the western front. Neither side would yield, so negotiations came to a standstill. But on December 10 the news came that the Central Powers had signed a three months' armistice with the Russian and Rumanian armies on the Russian front between the Dniester and the mouth of the Danube. Rumania could do nothing else, as the Bolsheviki threatened to cut off her food and war material. On December 11 thirteen delegates representing the army, the navy and the civilian population, set out for Brest-Litovsk to resume negotiations with the Germans, and on December 15 an armistice was signed which was to begin at noon December 17 and remain in force till January 14, 1918. Unless seven days' notice is given the armistice remains in force automatically. Here are the remaining terms of the armistice:

The Armistice Signed

The armistice embraces the land and aerial forces on the front from the Baltic to the Black Sea and also the Russo-Turkish front in Asia Minor. During the armistice the parties concerned obligate themselves not to increase the number of troops on the above fronts or on the islands in Moon sound, or to make a regrouping of forces.

Neither side is to make operative any transfers of units from the Baltic-Black Sea front until January 1 (January 14), excepting those begun before the agreement is signed. They obligate themselves not to concentrate troops on parts of the Black Sea or Baltic Sea east of the 15th degree of longitude east of Greenwich.

The line of demarcation on the European front is the first line of defense. The space between will be neutral. The navigable rivers will be neutral, their navigation being forbidden except for necessary purposes of commercial transport or on sections where the positions are at a great distance. On the Russo-Turkish front the line of demarcation will be arranged at the mutual consent of the chief commanders.

The armistice on the naval front embraces all of the Black Sea and the Baltic Sea east of the meridian 15 degrees east of Greenwich. . . .

Both sides agree to begin negotiations at once for a permanent peace.

There is little news about the first session of the Contituent Assembly, but on December 10 Lenine sent out a wireless message from Petrograd announcing that "The second sitting of the Constituent Assembly was opened by a person authorized by the Council of the People's Commissaries. There were present no fewer than 400 members." The full membership of the Assembly is 600, and the number of Bolshevik delegates is said to be equal to that of all the other parties combined. In the elections the garrisons were largely for the Bolsheviki; the Social Revolutionists carried the villages and the Constitutional Democrats the towns. But the Assembly seems to have dwindled down to an attendance of fifty members on December 11 and of only forty on the following day. The Bolsheviki arrested the Central Elections Committee, a number of Cadets and Constitutional Democrats and broke up a meeting of the Social Democrats. One group of Delegates has retired to Kiev to hold sessions there.

The Constituent Assembly

On December 16 the Executive Committee of the Workmen's Committee of the Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates, by a vote of 150 to 104, approved a decree which declared the Constitutional Democrats enemies of the people. The Peasants' Congress, by a vote of 360 to 321, protested against members of the Constituent Assembly being arrested and called upon the country to protect the Delegates. But Foreign Minister Trotzky said in an address to his opponents: "You are perturbed by the mild terror we are applying to our enemies. But know that within a month this terror will take the terrible form of the French revolutionary terror—not the fortress, but the guillotine."

The news that comes about the progress of the civil war is very confusing. Dispatches dated Petrograd, December 10, announced that Bolsheviki forces came into conflict with Korniloff's troops at Tamanauk Station. The battle seems to have lasted about twenty-four hours, and there were many casualties. One report had it that Korniloff was defeated and wounded, another that he had routed his opponents. His attempt to cut off the Bolsheviki from communication with Siberia appears to have failed. According to later intelligence the Bolshevik forces took three important cities in the Don Cossack territory, and Kaledines was arrested by his own generals. That would leave General Dutoff, hetman of the Ural Cossacks, the only anti-Bolshevik leader in the field. The situation in Moscow was reported grave on December 12. The Bolsheviki had placed machine-guns in the streets, the garrison was insubordinate and starvation threatened the inhabitants. In Petrograd there was great disorder when the people broke into the Winter Palace's wine-cellars and plundered the liquor they found there.

The Civil War

Christmas Day, 1917

JOHN CARDINAL FARLEY

FOR the first time in more than half a century, Christmas Day dawns upon our country at war. We have not lived through these fifty years and more, as through an unbroken cycle of tranquillity; yet, since the fateful Christmas of 1864, year by year have the Christian people of this nation gathered at the Crib of the Prince of Peace, at peace with all the world.

We may not attempt to search the Providence of God to inquire why this change has been thrust upon us. God's counsels are His own, beyond the scrutiny of created minds. But today we know that the words of Isaias have come to pass in our land; upon the dark mountain the banner is lifted up, and there is a noise of a multitude, as it were of many people, the noise of the sound of kings, of nations gathered together, for the Lord of hosts hath given charge to the troops of war. For many, therefore, the birthday of the Prince of Peace will this year be a day on which the tender recollection of those young men who bear our flag in foreign lands, or who, perhaps, have already given their lives in the glorious cause of our country, will bring the tears of longing into the eyes of those who knew and loved them; a day on which all of us, certain as we are of the rectitude of our cause and the might of our nation, will be minded to come to the Crib, not alone with the simple, child-like joy of other years, but as those who implore the mighty protection of the Prince of Peace, who is likewise the King of Justice, the eternal Ruler, upon whose shoulder is the government of nations.

Touched with poignant memories, then, this Christmas Day will be for many, and not without apprehension for all who with any adequate measure have gauged the magnitude of the task before us. We have been asked to undertake many heavy burdens; we have answered the appeal, whether for our possessions, our time, our services, our children, with an alacrity which promises much for the future. Under the leadership of the Chief Executive of the nation, the conduct of our people on all occasions has demonstrated the vigorous survival of the old American, Christian, ideal of patriotism, love of country founded on love of God. From this fact we may draw assurance that the Providence of Almighty God which in days far darker than any which now seem to confront our people gave strength to the trembling hands of our fathers, will continue its benign protection over our beloved country. Although the times were bitter, God was very near to us in that winter, when, in camp at Valley Forge, the Father of our Country besought the favor of Heaven for his cause; so, too, in a later day when, as men thought, the Union under which our nation had grown great, was about to be broken forever. In the years of peace that followed, charity, education, all manner of benevolent works flourished, and in the calm and undisturbed surroundings of a reunited people, dwelling in concord and mutual esteem, the power of the Church, the mystical body of Christ, was made manifest in countless enterprises for the mental and spiritual quickening both of our Catholic people and of the nation at large. Surely, in the history of our country, and of the Church fulfilling her Divine mission under a just and benign government, we can easily discern the operation of God's loving Providence. His hand is not shortened; His designs over our country, as we may believe, are not yet perfected. Therefore, as we gather at the Crib of the Saviour of the world, at a time when well-nigh the whole world is at war, with all confidence may we trust that, if we are faithful to Him, the dark clouds now hanging over us shall be speedily lifted, and in the glorious day which follows after, God's fostering Providence will grant us unexampled opportunities to approach more closely, through faith and love, to the fruition of the peace of Christ, the unbroken peace, which the world cannot give or take away

Before that longed-for day gladdens our war-weary eyes, we may be asked to drink deep of the chalice of suffering. The lessons which will hearten us are preached with eloquence at the Crib of Jesus Christ. We see a little Child; in our faith, we adore Him as very God. Our hearts are moved to love God who has so loved us as to give His only-begotten Son for our comforting and salvation. Wrapped in swaddling-clothes, the Divine Child has divested Himself of all exterior manifestation of the Divinity; He who is adored in the palaces of heaven is laid in a manger. He is made poor to encourage us to bear with patience the sufferings of life, to teach us to alleviate the sufferings of the poor, His brethren, even as we would have ministered to the Holy Family, had that blessed privilege been granted us. Taking our nature, in compliance with the eternal decree of God, He begins His mission of salvation in want and suffering. The Child in the manger is the model and the inspiration of all who would look upon God forever, after their eyes have been closed to the fleeting joys and sorrows of this world of time. Unless we strive to emulate the virtues of the Child of Bethlehem, we shall not bear as Christians should the trials of life, and, at the end of all, enter into the Kingdom of God. Therefore, now, more than before, is it necessary that we draw close to the Manger at Bethlehem.

• When the world seemed lost, the glory of Our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ, appeared amongst us, a little Child in the arms of Mary, His Immaculate Mother.

So shall it be with us, we pray, with our people and with our nation. To those that love God, as St. Paul tells us, all things work together unto good. If He has care for the flower of the field, for the birds of the air, His merciful Heart will be opened to the prayers and to the intercessions which rest upon our men who have left all to serve their country. Some day, as we confidently trust, the spear shall be laid aside for the Cross of Christ, and God shall take His place, from which He has so long been excluded, in the government of His people, and in that day a little Child shall lead the nations, united in mutual charity and trust. But now, as always, our lots are in His hands, the loving hands of Him who because He loved us, became a Child, the broken hands of Christ our Saviour, pierced upon the Cross. In all trust, then, may we say as we gather at the Crib of Bethlehem, on Christmas Day, 1917, "I will give thanks to Thee, O Lord, for . . . . behold, God is my Saviour; I will deal confidently, and will not fear, because the Lord is my strength."

Crusaders in Khaki

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

A CHRISTIAN army has entered Jerusalem in triumph and the tread of its victorious regiments has echoed round the world. The Holy City has been freed from the Moslem yoke which has disgraced and enslaved it for the last seven hundred years. Over the Mosque of Omar the crescent has been lowered before the Cross. A sigh of relief and a hymn of gratitude have gone up from the nations that still worship Christ, the Son of David, as their God and as the Redeemer and Saviour of the world. They can sing their Te Deum, for Bethlehem and Gethsemane, Calvary and the Holy Sepulcher are once more in Christian hands. Never again must they be given up. Never again should the Turk be allowed to keep guard over the holiest spot in all the world. No statecraft, no game of shifting world-politics should ever be tolerated by which these hills hallowed by the life and the sufferings of the Man-God and bedewed by His Sacred Blood will ever pass out of the power of the last of the Crusaders, who have just entered the portals of the Sacred City.

The hosts of England were not the only ones, who a few days ago passed in victory under the gates of Sion. The heart of Christendom went with them. With them marched ghostly and invisible armies, the spirits of heroes of their own flesh and blood, the spirits of English archers and bowmen, knights and kings, of Richard the Lion-Hearted and Edward Plantagenet, of the Crusaders who, spear in rest, charged the hosts of Saladin, fought at Ascalon and under the walls of the Holy City in the brave days of old when men went forth to the Holy Land to free the Sepulcher of Christ. The regiments of England today have only followed where centuries ago Godfrey de Bouillon and Tancred and Baldwin and Bohemond, Philip Augustus and Frederic, the chivalry of feudal Europe from the Danube to the Shannon, pointed the way.

The dream of the Crusader has come true. The triumph granted for a short time only to Godfrey, the first Latin King of Jerusalem and to his successors, but denied to Philip of France and to Richard of England, refused even to the piety and the chivalry of St. Louis, by a strange chain of circumstances has been finally granted to the arms of Christian soldiers in the twentieth century. The last of the Crusades has closed with victory for the Cross. The dreams of Popes like Urban and Innocent and Calixtus, of fighting kings and knights have been realized. Unconsciously perhaps, but nevertheless in a very real and practical sense, modern armies different in every way from the steel-harnessed hosts of the past have continued and completed the work which they undertook, and which they saw was necessary for the peace of Christendom, that of breaking the power and the prestige of the Turk.

There is of course work yet to do. Constantinople must be wrenched from the grasp of the Osmanli. But that will be only a political victory. The capture of Jerusalem, not without its practical value, is one which especially appeals to the feeling and the heart of Christendom. By that victory Christians regain their self-respect, for as long as the Turk kept guard over the places which of all others were dearest and most sacred in the world to faith and loyalty, they felt humbled and disgraced. The humiliation is ended. We have come into our own again. Forever now Christians will watch in reverence without fear of insult over the Cradle and the Tomb of the Man-God. Christians cannot imagine, shall not tolerate any other guardianship.

In the light of the recent events in Palestine we see the truth of the old adage that God fulfils Himself in many ways. Mysteriously He bends the course of history to His own Divine purposes. Out of the chaos of passion, war, cruelty and wrong He brings order and peace. On the wrecks of gigantic plans for world-empire, He builds for His own ends. In a war, caused undoubtedly because His laws and His Commandments had been set aside for the fulfilment of the most ambitious schemes, He shows that He is still the Master and Guide of men and that the colossal machinery of modern warfare, the instrument of men's ambition, becomes in His hands the means whereby His City and His Tomb return once more to their rightful owners. When the first guns of the great war thundered at Belgrade or against the forts of Liège and Namur, men little thought that they would reecho on the fields of Palestine, that they were a warning to the Turk that his day, a day of degradation and death, was over. Men blundered we hear, some one blundered terribly at Sulva Bay and in the trenches at Gallipoli. French and English seamen, Irish Guards and Australian riflemen died then in a vain attempt to capture the City of Constantine. They failed, failed gloriously there. Had they succeeded and had Constantinople then been taken, Jerusalem might not have been so speedily freed from the yoke of its former masters.

Ever since the fall of Constantinople in 1453 Christendom has been but too anxious to break the power of the Turk. Now and again stout hearts were found to answer the call of the Popes, never more statesmen than when they warned Europe that the power of the Osmanli had to be curbed. Though the days of the Crusades were over, generous hearts were ever found to enrol themselves under the standard of the Cross to deliver Europe from the sway of the hated and dangerous intruder. John Hunyadi and St. John Capistran on the field of Belgrade, John of Austria and Colonna at Lepanto, Sobieski under the walls of Vienna, the brave Knights of Malta under La Valette, those of Rhodes under D'Aubusson and Villiers de l'Isle Adam, ever kept the dream in their hearts and fought for it with their prayers and their swords. The dream has been more than realized. Constantinople would be a fair prize at any time, at any cost, but the city on the Bosphorus cannot be as dear to the Christian as the City of Sion, the City of David and the Promised King of whom he sang.

The sound of marching Christian hosts in the Holy City has awakened the echoes of other hosts who fought and bled for that incomparable prize. From its heights Melchisedech went out to greet Abraham after his victory over Chodolahomor and brought forth bread and wine, image and type of the Great Sacrifice to be instituted in coming ages by another Prince of Peace and King of Salem. For those heights in his warrior manhood David fought the Jebusites and wrested from them at last the Castle of Sion. On Moria, their eastern crest, Solomon built the noblest temple ever raised to the worship of the True God, "rising like an exhalation" from the ground, in whose courts the sound of the builder's ax or hammer was never heard. In the days of its splendor, here it was that the wisest of kings, as he contemplated the domes of that queenly city, its gardens and waterpools, its orchards of palm and olive, and surveyed the hosts of his marching men, and heard the voices of his singing women and thought of all that glory and beauty and power, and of the works which his hands had wrought, saw that all things were vanity and vexation of mind and that nothing was lasting under the sun. Before its bastions the ten-thousand tents of the Assyrian Sennacherib were pitched, but the Angel of the Lord passed in the night and the legions of the invader perished. From its palaces and homes Nebuchodonosor carried off into captivity the king's mother and the king's wives and every artificer and every smith to grace his triumph in Babylon. For the possession of those hills and to hold in their hands that priceless jewel, Egyptian and Roman and Assyrian and Christian and Moslem and Bedouin have fought for centuries. Its very courts today seem to be ringing with the war-shouts of the Machabees, of Judas and His brethren as they smite their Syrian foes, or with their wail of sorrow over the ruins of the Temple and the desecration of the Altar for which they were willing to die. In its streets Saracen emirs and Arab sheiks have been locked in deadly combat with the Knights of old who came to redeem the Sepulcher of their Lord. Under the very arches, where the riflemen of Allenby have passed in all the panoply of war, Godfrey de Bouillon, barefooted and bareheaded went to the Holy Tomb and, when proclaimed King by his victorious hosts refused to wear a diadem of gold where his Master had worn a crown of thorns. For the love of that Temple which crowned its heights, even though its glory had departed, a whole people endured one of the most terrible sieges in history and when the legions of Titus had at last broken and beaten their frenzied resistance, 600,000 Jews had laid down their lives. More than this. So beautiful was that City, so loved by the Son of David, that true King of whom other monarchs were but a feeble image, that as He gazed on all its loveliness and grace and thought of its coming ruin and heard already the echoing tread of the advancing Roman legions, He wept over its impending doom. For the Christian that City is the most hallowed and sacred spot of all the world. It is the City of the Great King. In its streets He walked in the Flesh. As a Child He taught the doctors in the Temple and there His Mother found Him. Under its gateways He entered in triumph. Up the Via Dolorosa he went to His death. On that hill He died to redeem the world. In that rocky Tomb He was laid to rest. And because those sacred and loved scenes have been wrung from the hand of the Moslem, the Christian world rejoices today. On the eve almost of Christmas the Holy Places, the Lord's own Christmas gifts return to their rightful owners. If in the conquest of Jerusalem the belligerents of one party gain a great advantage, that success dwindles into insignificance before the larger victory of the triumph of the Cross. The khaki-clad Crusaders of the twentieth century have done what Richard of England and Louis of France dreamt of in vain, what brave Godfrey and Baldwin of Edessa and Amaury, and Guy de Lusignan in their precarious tenure of the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem accomplished for a few short years only. Through the Crusaders of the twentieth century though undoubtedly thousands knew it not, the King has come back to

His own. Wherever throughout the world there is a head that still bows at His Sacred Name and a heart that worships Him, the prayer and the resolve will be uttered that in the City which He loved and for which He died, the Saviour and the Redeemer of the world shall be undisputed Lord and King.

Suffrage and Woman's Responsibility

JOHN A. RYAN, D.D.

IT is of the greatest and most urgent importance that the Catholic women of New York, and all other women who believe in the integrity of the family and in the maintenance of Christian social principles and institutions, should realize immediately that political enfranchisement has put upon them a very serious responsibility. The power to vote is not a personal prerogative that one is morally free to use or not to use. It is a personal privilege granted for a social purpose, and carrying with it social and civic obligations. If the women who cling to right social doctrines fail to vote in as large proportions as the feminine adherents of extreme theories, they will be as certainly and as definitely to blame for the resulting injury to the home and to right social order as though they had openly preached the doctrines they abhor. In order that they may exercise the franchise intelligently, in order that they may be able to distinguish between good and bad political policies, they will obviously be compelled to study consistently social and political questions and conditions. Undoubtedly this will be the most irksome feature of their responsibilities as voting citizens.

Many Catholic and other conservative women of New York State will accept this conclusion with great reluctance. They will insist that they had not desired this privilege and this responsibility. They will complain that the men voters acted unfairly by imposing the franchise upon them in order to please a small but active minority of the women of the State. Undoubtedly it would have been better to permit the majority of the women themselves to decide the question of suffrage. The refusal of the leaders of the movement to seek or consent to such a decision, showed not only a lack of faith in the political sense of their sisters, but a want of regard for the methods and principles of democracy. Had the extension of the franchise been left to the determination of the masses of the women, they probably would have refused the privilege at first; but the field would then have been open for a direct campaign of political education among those who most needed it, the women themselves. By the time that the majority of them were convinced and ready to accept the franchise, they would have a much better conception of its importance, power and responsibility than they have as the result of an appeal which was primarily addressed to males.

All these complaints and all these speculations on "what might have been" are now worse than futile. The outstanding fact is that the women of New York have been empowered to vote; that if they wish to be good citizens they must inform themselves concerning public and political questions and conditions, and that the Catholic women may not conscientiously shirk their new obligations.

Some twenty-three years ago the writer defended in a classroom essay the proposition that female suffrage had become reasonable and expedient, on account of the large number of women that are otherwise occupied than in the home. Time and observation have strengthened him in that opinion. That woman's true and permanent place is the home, and that her duties as homemaker are so engrossing and so remote from political problems as to make her much less apt than man to acquire political knowledge or capacity, are propositions that will always be true of the wives, mothers and daughters whose time is devoted to domestic occupations. With a reasonable amount of effort they can, however, learn enough about the more concrete political and civic matters to provide the basis for a fairly intelligent exercise of the voting privilege. They can make themselves fairly well acquainted with those public problems, situations and projects which affect the home and morals. And their instincts in this province are sounder than the instincts of men. As regards the more abstract political issues, they will probably vote in the same way as their husbands, fathers and brothers, thus doing neither more good nor harm to the public weal than the latter.

On the other hand, the millions of women who have gone for longer or shorter periods, into professional, industrial or commercial occupations will have the same interest in the politics of domestic and moral questions as their sisters of the household, and in addition will be immediately and vitally concerned with those political proposals which affect their own gainful occupations. The conditions surrounding and affecting women who work for wages are far from satisfactory. For the majority, neither the remuneration, the hours of labor nor the sanitation and safety are up to the standard required by decency, humanity and Christianity. Most of the measures necessary to remove these abuses will have to come through legislation. Owing to their intimate and practical connection with these problems, wage-earning women are in a position to understand most of them, quite as well as men, and some of them very much better. After all, one of the fundamental justifications of democracy is the fact that the members of every social or industrial class understand certain of their own needs better than do the members of any other class. The principle is strikingly true of wage-earning women.

While writing the concluding paragraphs of this paper, I received a letter from a talented and active Catholic woman who declares that educated Catholic women are doing splendid work in purely charitable fields, but have taken little or no interest in civic and social reforms. This thought reinforces and makes more concrete what I wanted to say by way of conclusion. I have already pointed out the responsibility that rests upon the Catholic women of New York State to use their votes against Socialism, feminism, and all other forms of extreme radicalism. But if their political interest and activity do not go beyond this purely negative policy they will prove themselves no better citizens, and from the viewpoint of civic opportunity, no better Catholics than their coreligionists of the male sex. It is unfortunately still a commonplace that the majority of our Catholic men have restricted their beneficent activity in civic and social movements to the task of combating wrong views and measures. In the main they have done little or nothing for constructive reforms. The Catholic women of New York State have a splendid opportunity to put the men to shame. May they realize this opportunity by taking the trouble to find out the social, civic and industrial evils that ought to be removed, and to support and vote for positive measures of betterment. Once they seriously adopt this resolution, they will find the practical ways and means ready at hand.

The Eternal Whence?

DANIEL A. LORD, S. J.

INTELLECTUAL life is a history profusely punctuated with question marks. When a child lifts a puzzled face to his father and propounds his first why, intellectual life for him has really begun. And as long as a man continues to use the rising vocal inflection and besprinkle his conversation and his thoughts with a liberal scattering of interrogation points, no matter what his years or his infirmities, he is still very much intellectually alive. For thought would almost cease were it not for the question mark. Now, like an automatic, it is leveled at nature forcing her to yield up her most jealously guarded secrets. Now, like a steam shovel, it digs deep into the foundations of things, giving us philosophy. Now, like a lever, it dares to pry up a little corner of that curtain which shuts off mortal vision from what may lie beyond. The question mark is the spark plug in our intellectual motor, the condiment in our mental cuisine.

It is an historical fact that just this ubiquitous question mark following on a monosyllable "whence" has driven every race of men to acknowledge a Being they call supreme. The least civilized races have had intellectual life sufficient to formulate that inevitable whence with its inevitable answer; while the more civilized peoples have answered their question with the temples of Karnac and Olympus and the Capitoline and Jerusalem, with the cathedrals of Reims and Canterbury and Cologne. All men, as they looked out over this tremendous world have asked whence, and the only satisfactory answer has been: From a supreme Being beyond and above this world who made it and rules it. The name men gave that Being is aside from the question. It is His existence that alone solves the riddle hidden in that whence.

The fact that a vast majority of all men in all times have been forced to bend their intellects before a supreme Deity is in itself a most powerful argument for the existence of such a Being. For only the intellectual waster flings to the winds the cherished convictions which have satisfied the minds and consoled the hearts of the world's greatest geniuses. But my argument is taken from the nature of the world as it exists about us. For the rational mind, even when untouched by the light of faith, cannot fail to see in the world a clear reflection of some power above and beyond it. The world is the handglass of the Deity.

There seems to have been a time in history when men believed that they had exhausted the possibilities of science. Every savant possessed encyclopedic knowledge. He had memorized the information or misinformation which previous ages had committed to writing, and there was simply nothing more to be said on the subject. A man might be at the same time an accomplished physicist and metaphysicist, a mathematician and astronomer, an alchemist and botanist, confident the while that he knew quite all the world had to teach him in each branch of knowledge.

But in that respect at least, the world has grown very modest. Men used to study the universe; now they specialize on a ray of light. A tiny fragment of one of the great branches of science is now enough to absorb the exhausting and exhaustive study of a lifetime, for man through his microscope and telescope has begun to realize the tremendous and undreamed-of complexity and magnitude of the universe.

To the ancient Assyrian watching the stars from the temple roof, the universe seemed gigantic; but to the modern astronomer, it is just this side of infinite. Yet quietly and undisturbed, these gigantic masses, sun, planets, whole solar systems, swing through their measureless cycles, clicking off the days and the centuries and the aeons with a precision which the most accurate chronometer pitifully imitates; and on our own little planet, season follows season, each with its myriad mysteries, lawbound, definite in its purpose.

Only the professional pessimist denies the order of the universe. Of course no sane philosopher or scientist claims for the world an absolute perfection; in fact, all emphatically deny it. It is, consequently, possible for fanatics like Haeckel, by focusing their microscopes on the imperfections of some deformed sea-urchin and deliberately shutting their eyes to the unfathomed perfections of the solar system or the human organism, to fling sarcastic jibes at the world's order. As well say there is no beauty in Angelo's "Last Judgment" because in places the wall has cracked.

Admitting even the many defects and admitting, too, that science has yet to learn the purpose of many seemingly useless things, one can go through life sublimely convinced that no stray planet will crash into our world, that crop will follow crop, and living things will be born in pursuance of some definite scheme. As a matter of fact, order is so universal that from crystals and cocci to mountains and mastodons we have the bases of systematic sciences, each with fixed laws, each bound up with two unquestionable facts, matter and force. Whence, then, the world's order? Three solutions suggest themselves: it comes either from chance, from the essential nature of matter and force, or from some directive intelligence.

Listen, I prithee, to a fairy tale. Once upon a time, a certain humorous giant decided to build something, he did not much care what. So up to the top of the mountain he lugged vast quantities of mortar and stone and iron and wood and nuts and bolts and wheels and springs and water and gasolene and fire. Then he sat him down and upon the plain below he playfully tossed great handfuls of his materials. A truly humorous giant this! At last he exhausted his supply, and then into the valley he strode, where, wonderful to relate, he found his mortar and stone and iron and wood had formed themselves into a wonderful city with fair streets and stately buildings, with bridges and car lines; while the gasolene was running the engines which had been formed of his nuts and bolts and wheels and springs; and over the fire water was boiling in preparation for his tea. That is a real fairy tale, and, curious reader, you must not ask where he got the mortar and stone and iron and wood and nuts and bolts and wheels and springs and water and gasolene and fire.

The ancient rhetoricians demanded that an allegory be clear as crystal; I am trusting that mine would not have made any of them shudder. In any case, chance as an explanation of the universe makes the cosmology of a headhunter seem scientifically adequate. Originally everything was chaos; then, just by accident, stars began to form, and planets to revolve, and grass to grow, and birds to fly; until, by a final and crowning accident man was formed and began to think. That is nonsense unworthy of a serious man. Chance does not explain how order once entered the universe, and it is simply incapable of accounting for the still more remarkable fact that for ages and ages order has continued to reign.

Matter and force have during the last century been used as twin levers in an attempt to lift the Creator out of the universe. According to the theophobic scientists matter and force are eternal. By their essential, necessary nature they have been working together until they have given us the universe as it is today Together they made the universe with its wonderful order which regulates our watches and inspires our poetry. And they have been everlastingly at it. Simple, is it not?

The theory rather puts to blush our old adage that practice makes perfect. Matter and force in this staggering postulate have been eternally, that is, without any beginning, working toward perfection. And yet, after an eternity of practice they have not reached anything like absolute perfection. In an unlimited amount of duration they have achieved a very limited amount of perfection, though they should have reached absolute perfection ages ago. On the contrary, the present imperfection of the universe indicates with absolute certainty that matter and force began to evolve the universe at some definite time. Put it as far back as you like; none the less the eternal duration of matter and force falls with an appalling thud.

Yet for all that they have only been working for a limited time, they really have put a marvelously intricate order into the universe. The question, then, which naturally arises is: did they, when they set out to evolve the universe, know what they were doing, or did they act without knowledge?

To suppose that this order was introduced without any knowledge of what was being done is as ridiculous as an appeal to chance. Let's suppose that when the last exquisite building had been added to the Acropolis of Athens, some one had rushed up and clasped the architect's hand. "It is almost divine!" he cried. The architect then stood back and looked at the buildings which have been the despair of all subsequent builders. "It is marvelous," he remarked; "and do you know, all the time we were working on them, no one in this world knew what they were going eventually to be?" Matter and force, according to this second alternative, have been working diligently until they have accomplished the present order of the universe, though all the while no one in this world had any idea what their labor was all about. An intelligent child would turn up a contemptuous nose at such nonsense.

And even to the scientist who does not want God, the idea is so absurd that we are gravely informed that matter and force are really acting intelligently all the while. So electricity and rocks and fire and the falling seed and hydrogen and the star nebula really think. The tiny atoms of oxygen and iron and cobalt, the forces of gravity and affinity and centrifugal motion set out with a definite plan in their non-existent heads, and white men, hitherto supposed to have the intellects par-excellence, were vainly trying to discover how it was all coming about, these factors actually mapped out the universe and made it according to the plan.

The "Arabian Nights" with its thinking horses and talking birds has nothing comparable to this. Matter thinks; force plans. How proud a bit of gold must be when it finds itself made into a magnificent watch; and how delighted the explosive power of gasolene must be when it is driving an imported limousine.

Perhaps my paper on idealism sounded absurd, but as a matter of fact what really lies back of this "thinking matter" is a denial of all matter. Many of the scientists who talk of thinking matter mean that matter really does not exist. Only thought exists; thought evolves itself into appearances which we call matter. Fortunately we don't have to waste more mental labor on that precious philosophical legerdemain.

The order of the universe is a fact as unquestionable as mother love, or the multiplication tables, or an aching tooth. Chance could not have produced it, nor could matter and force if left to themselves. We have only one remaining alternative, a directive intelligence. Here at length is common-sense. If the order displayed in a clock or a mouse-trap or a torpedo or a linotype could not come into existence without some one to plan it down to the most minute details, it is perfectly ludicruous to talk of the order of the universe, so complex, so constant in its manifestations, unless there is implicitly admitted an intelligence which conceived it and directed it in accordance with a definite plan.

And if the human mind is still struggling to understand the order of the universe, what must we think of the tremendous intellect which introduced this order where otherwise chaos would reign? Men may differ in the names they apply to this intellect, but they cannot but stand in awe before its gigantic proportions. And though as yet I have not proved its personal character, I shall feel justified when, in these essays in armchair philosophy, the words again occur, in spelling Directive Intelligence with capital letters.

The Patron of the Destroyer Jacob Jones

THOMAS F. MEEHAN

THE sinking of the destroyer Jacob Jones, on December 6, recalls some interesting Catholic history in connection with the distinguished officer of the old navy, after whom the vessel was named. Commodore Jacob Jones was the father of Sister "Stanny" Jones, who, from 1825 to 1879, was one of the most famous educators at the Academy of the Visitation, Georgetown, D. C., the oldest Catholic institution for the higher education of women in the United States and the alma mater of so many prominent women from all sections of the country. She was a convert brought into the Church by Father Benedict J. Fenwick, S.J., during his stay in New York as assistant and pastor at St. Peter's and St. Patrick's churches.

Commodore Jones, who was a native of Delaware, entered the navy in 1799 as a midshipman and served for some time under Commodore John Barry, on the frigate United States. In 1803, he was on the Philadelphia as a lieutenant under Captain Bainbridge, when that frigate was captured by the Barbary pirates while aground off the coast of Tripoli. He remained a captive for twenty months. When released Jones returned home to share with Bainbridge, Decatur and Hull the admiration and rewards that a grateful country heaped on them. While on his way to New York from the Southern port at which he landed, his happy homecoming was saddened by the news that his wife had died, leaving a daughter, Wilhelmina, four years old, and a son two years younger. These children Lieutenant Jones confided to the care of their aunt, a Mrs. Swartout, in New York, and sailed away on his next naval assignments.

When Wilhelmina Jones was eleven years of age she was sent as a pupil to the French boarding school of Madame Binsse, then one of New York's most popular and successful "finishing schools." She remained there until she was sixteen, scoring a fine record in her classes for all the polite accomplishments then considered requisite for a well-educated young woman. It is hardly necessary to remind those conversant with old New York that the Binsse family were Catholics, and Miss Jones was specially impressed by the beauty of their religion and attracted by its practices. It was in this way she met Father Benedict Fenwick, and through his interest and instruction she was received into the Church two years later.

This step greatly incensed her father, who at once sent her to live with some Protestant Episcopal relatives on Chesapeake Bay's Eastern Shore, where she would be withdrawn from all Catholic influences. Here every argument that could be brought to bear on her was used to make her recant and return to the Episcopal sect. There was seeming success, to her father's delight. He had married again, and having been appointed a naval commissioner, he established his residence at Georgetown, D. C., in 1822, and took Wilhelmina and her brother to live with him at this Washington suburb.

At Georgetown she met her old New York friend, Father Benedict Fenwick, S.J., then rector of the well-known college. At once she became enthusiastic over the idea that she ought to convince him also of those errors of "popery" from which her obliging relatives had rescued her. The priest and the young woman had a number of discussions on doctrinal points, in which Mother Agnes Brent of the Visitation Convent joined, but Wilhelmina appeared to make no headway against her adversaries. In fact, it ended by her own tearful reconciliation to the Church. As her father was a man of very violent temper he was not immediately notified of this reconversion and only learned of it during the Lent of 1825. One morning, missing Wilhelmina from the breakfast table, he asked her step-mother where she was. The latter answered that she "had gone after that Mr. Fenwick to the Catholic church."

When Wilhelmina returned she was asked if this were true, and the admission being made her father flew into a terrible rage and shouted: "Don't you know you are doing this in spite of my commands? I won't have even a Catholic servant under my roof. If you will be a Catholic, quit my house. Let me never see you again."

Wilhelmina put on her wraps and left the house, never to return. By advice of her friend, Father Fenwick, she found shelter at the home of a Mrs. King, mother of one of the Visitation Sisters and remained there until she was herself received into the convent as a novice, on March 18, 1825. When her father learned that she had entered the convent, he hastened there and made the most piteous appeal to her to return home to be the comfort of his old age. Wilhelmina was almost persuaded, but finally refused. Soon after this Georgetown was all agog with the rumor that the ghost of Wilhelmina's dead mother could be seen every night wandering disconsolately around the convent, wailing and beseeching the young Sister to return to her father. Great crowds of howling fanatics gathered at the institution nightly, waiting for the obliging and shrouded apparition to stalk about, meanwhile upbraiding the discomforted novice for deserting her father and disturbing the eternal rest of her mother. They would shout in chorus under the windows: "Wilhelmina Jones, come out! Wilhelmina Jones come out! Come out! Come out!" So intolerable did this nuisance become that a body of Catholics had to assemble at the convent and, with force, disperse the gaping crowds, after capturing the spectral attraction, which turned out to be a practical joker in the conventional winding-sheet.

Wilhelmina Jones received the veil and the name of Sister Mary Stanislaus, on August 15, 1825. She died in the community, where she was affectionately known as "Sister Stanny," on September 11, 1879, in her seventy-eighth year, and the fifty-third of her profession. In the Mss. annals of the convent there is this tribute to her character:

> In the convent a model of exactitude and fervor; at the academy devoting her mind, with its rich and varied store of treasures, her brilliant talents and accomplishments, to the high mission which led her onward and upward. While she cultivated the minds and developed the talents of her pupils, she attracted their hearts to God; and numbers have testified to her holy influence both during their school-days and in after life, by their virtuous example, as well as by the faithful and loving correspondence they always entertained with their dear teacher.

At the Academy, Sister "Stanny" devoted herself chiefly, and with great ability to conducting the musical departments and the classes in the modern languages. Her father did not become reconciled to her entrance into the convent until 1837. It was then discovered that she was suffering from a cancer, and that an operation to remove it was necessary. For this purpose she was taken to Baltimore, where her father was then living, and he insisted on paying all the expenses incident to the operation. It was a success. When Sister "Stanny" recovered, the old Commodore asked Archbishop Whitfield to give her permission to dine at his house before returning to her Georgetown cloister. The Archbishop consented and accepted an invitation also, for himself, to the dinner, which ended in the complete reconciliation of father and daughter. Sister "Stanny" stormed Heaven with petitions for her father's conversion, but that happiness was not granted her. Her brother, who was a lieutenant in the navy, however, received the grace of faith and his son was ordained a priest. Her cousin, John Swartout, also became a Catholic. Both he and her brother were students at Georgetown College.

Cleansing New York's Theaters

By this letter I wish to reach those who still think it worth while to keep modesty a virtue in the land, who are still old-fashioned enough to prize maidenly reserve and chastity, who believe that manly continence should be cultivated, who revere the sacredness of Christian marriage, and who are determined to restore vigor to our already tottering public morality by checking as far as possible those forces in the theatrical world that are doing their best today to destroy all personal purity, both in the home and in the nation. Without question the people have a right to be left spiritually clean and to come away unsplashed by stage-filth when they go for amusement to places licensed to offer them entertainment. Unfortunately this right hardly seems to be recognized in New York.

But we have talked enough and heard enough about the evil of the hour and now has come the time for some concerted and effectual action to banish the pest. It is small consolation to be told that nowhere in the world is the Church freer and more honored than it is in New York, while we see its influence so openly despised and so often nullified by the debased stage of today. In the movement against this evil all should join; both public officials and private citizens, priests and laymen, fathers, mothers and little children. According to press reports, our District Attorney has begun a genuine drive against the improper shows of our city which sets the pace and standard for all the other great amusement centers throughout the country. So true is this that as the saying is: "Whatever 'gets by' in New York will 'get by' in other big places, and whatever can't run in New York can't be tried elsewhere."

Mr. Swann can be sure that the larger, saner and better portion of the people are with him in his crusade against the nastiness of the film and against the stage nudity for nudity's sake that is parading as "art." Perhaps the law of the land can expel the debauchery in entertainments that not even the dripping sword of war suspended over America's head can chasten, but which under various camouflages of virtue, and even under that of holy patriotism, is now filling the public mind, and too often our soldiers' and sailors' hearts with lewdness, and is sending them out to live or even to die with souls defiled by violations of the Sixth or at least of the Ninth Commandment. The agents of Venus that dramatize the seven capital sins to make money out of the wreck of human souls, and the aphrodisiac harpies that enact these so-called dramas, must be branded and punished according to their deserts.

And if they are not, whom will God judge, whom will He hold responsible for the persistence of the debauching plays, "movies" and dances on the modern American stage? Who are the guilty ones? There is no doubt about the authors, producers, managers, actors and actresses who pander to what is merely animal in man, and who in their performances stir him to think uncleanness, talk of it, and finally carry it by impure deeds into his own life and that of others contaminated by his presence. God will certainly enter into judgment against these direct agents of moral ruin. But what about those who, though not the promoters or agents of these libidinous spectacles, are yet bound by their office and calling to keep such pestilences from reaching the unfortunate and heedless masses but fail in their duty to check the evil they are sworn to prevent or ordained to fight? Who are the guardians of public and private morality? They are certainly the civil and ecclesiastical authorities in the land, supreme in their proper spheres, but ordained to cooperate in maintaining the moral life of the nation by safeguarding as far as possible the moral life of each individual in it. I know it may seem like straining the point a little to make the clergy as well as city officials accountable to God for the repression of what we have called the amusement evil. But to combat this evil is really the work of religion as well as of good government, and religion is the domain of the clergy and the field for their bounden activity. Of course the regulation of the public stage, like the conduct of the public market, belongs primarily to the men elected or appointed and paid to protect public interests.

True to the principles of his Catholic Faith, the Mayor of Boston, within the last year, has done something to purge the city theaters and to keep them from becoming Augean stables of moral filth, and the Providence, R. I., authorities have been prompt to imitate him and to insist on the observance of the invaluable ordinances of his Honor in the Bay State, even going so far, I am told, as to have his rules and regulations for decency printed and hung up in the foyers of playhouses. And from what we have heard of the attitude of our incoming Mayor towards vice suppression, we are confident that under his administration everything that human wisdom and prudence can suggest will be done to stamp out the stage evils that have been so long and so vainly deplored instead of being strangled before they were allowed to work the havoc already noticed on all sides, and particularly in the rising generation in our land. Thank God, there is comfort at last over the prospect ahead; and especially for mothers of Christian faith and purity, who have watched and prayed against the conditions in the up-to-date world of amusements that outrival even the abominations permitted in the days of decadent Pagan Rome.

Catholic Clubs in State Institutions

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The following letter may be of interest to AMERICA's readers inasmuch as it illustrates an attitude toward Catholic clubs in State institutions of learning. If we had more Catholic clubs in these institutions it would help vastly in clearing up much of the misunderstanding and party obsession so prevalent in State halls of education, where one little crowd is apt to put things to suit itself. The incident which gave rise to the subjoined letters was the country-wide drive of the Y. M. C. A., operating in State colleges. The Newman Club of a certain college promptly took up its side of the work in conjunction with the K. of C., whose war-work has been placed by the United States Government on the same basis with that of the Y. M. C. A. Exception being taken by a Y. M. C. A. chairman, Professor Sayles, to the activities of the Newman Club, on the ground that they were not working for the specific purpose then occupying the Y. M. C. A. students' attention, the following letter was sent by the Director of the Newman Club:

November 3, 1917.

Professor John M. Sayles,
State College for Teachers,
Albany, N. Y.

Dear Professor Sayles:

Our conversation over the 'phone today anent the respective activities of the Y. M. C. A. and the K. of C. did a lot of good, I dare say, inasmuch as it brought out our enthusiasm for the great cause. What is most important is that we cowork in a friendly spirit, since everything goes toward the same ultimate end, namely, the help of the needy and more especially our own needy whether they be in a trench, in a hospital or in a prison-camp. I think the surface difficulty lies in the intensity of our feelings, also there may be a touch of party-spirit to it. This, I take it, is admirable and praiseworthy even though we may get hot over it. Personally, I have no use for a slacker in enthusiasm or in action; therefore, when we drive right ahead and push the cause from our own angle, it seems to me rather admirable, and you have no more right to object than I should in the event of your initiative, even though you were first in the field.

If then, the Newman Club hustles on its own side, it is far from doing any injustice to the activities of the Y. M. C. A. It is plunging itself into the same cause from its own angle since the cause is one with ours ultimately. That the specific activities for the nonce are different doesn't materially affect the situation. All our activities are for relief; therefore, they should not conflict and there is no reason why the agents should not cowork each in his own sphere. The Y. M. C. A. and the K. of C. have collaborated magnificently up to this. There is no reason why they should not continue to do so. The school and college are just as much open to their respective activities as the market-place and the business house, the church and the chapel. More still, our determination is all the better when it is intensified to the end of doing our level best in keen rivalry. That only helps, it does not hinder. There is no "spilling the beans," but there is a fine scramble for more beans, and if your group and our group are scrambling at the same time then it is a good thing. The harder we strive the more beans we get and the best of it all is that the net results go into the same pot, even though they are thrown in from different sides. The greater the receipts the greater the help; the sharper the rivalry, the better the results. Surely you cannot object on grounds of justice and breadth to such a rivalry. If the phase of your activity appeals overwhelmingly to you, very good! I applaud. Honesty of intent demands that you do the same with regard to me when I take off my coat and vest and dive right into my side of the job with an equal enthusiasm; and let me say here, he would be a hardy umpire who would dare make a decision as to the more excellent of the activities, seeing that they make for the self-same end, although we act in different phases. The beauty of it all is that we are both out to secure help, relief and encouragement.

This is no time to quarrel about methods or special application. The United States Government has placed the Y. M. C. A. and the K. of C. on the same basis in this war-work and has urged them to go ahead and do their level best. They have done beautifully together in good-natured rivalry working like nailers for their own side. Far be it from you or from me to change emulation into antagonism or to try and crowd out another competitor in a legitimate field. The greater the number in the field the more work will be done, since the aims and activities of every group can be best directed at its own enterprise. If the K. of C. workers stood by in the Teachers' College or anywhere else and let the Y. M. C. A. workers monopolize the whole ground while they did not strike right into the work with their equipment and dig up as much as possible, plainly they would be derelict in their duty.

Furthermore, no one has a right to prevent them from operating in their own camp. Any plea of specializing in the work, strong though its appeal may be in its place, has no right to prevent further initiative even in the same school. Any attempts to crush such initiative would be as dishonest as it would be unpatriotic. I cannot conceive of reasons that could be urged against this position which is utterly unassailable. Rivalry we want, not conflict, since conflict would materially hinder the greatness of the achievement in the common cause.

Frankly, I don't dream that you could see it in any other light after you have thought it over and considered the legitimate claims of both sides. That you show so much enthusiasm and intensity about it is all to your credit. Is it not the same on my side? That's just where the matter stands, and as Mr. Dooley says, "There y' are." Therefore, with good-will and kindly feeling let us "go to it."

Trusting to have the pleasure of meeting you, I remain.

Sincerely yours,
(Signed) JOSEPH A. DUNNEY.

Later the following answer was received from the Director of the Student Friendship Fund:

New York State College for Teachers,
November 5, 1917.

Reverend Joseph A. Dunney,
454 Western Avenue,
Albany, N. Y.

Dear Father Dunney:

Your kind favor of the 3rd has been read with great interest. As appointed chairman of the Student Friendship Fund in this college, however, I would be remiss in my duties if I failed to bring to all students regardless of faith, their splendid opportunity to do a big service by making the student gift here compatible with the importance of the college. On that ground I shall try to carry it "over the top."

Sincerely,
(Signed) JOHN M. SAYLES.

The answer, you will concede, is hazy and unclear; it betokens an unwillingness to face the whole truth, or, perhaps, a psychological inability to see beyond one's own cramped quarters. The thing to be noted is that this same mental capacity prevails in matters of religion no less than in affairs of common decency. The incident illustrates the necessity of vigorous initiative on our part even with those who, "blind as he who will not see," are in constant need of having situations clarified and issues faced for them. The Holy Father in his Encyclical, "Acerbo Nimis," April 15, 1906, wrote:

> We decree and strictly command that in all the dioceses throughout the world where there are public academies, colleges and universities, religious doctrine classes be established for the purpose of teaching the truth of our Faith and the precepts of Christian morality to the youths who attend such public institutions wherein no mention is made of religion.

The sooner we Catholics wake up to the matter the better.

Inspector of Schools.

The St. Vincent de Paul Society

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of December 8 I find an interesting and timely letter, signed "L. E.," under the above title, which, among other things, points out some essential differences between non-Catholic philanthropic organizations, conducted along the lines of the modern "School of Philanthropy," with their "adequate relief," "full and complete records," "co-operation with confidential exchange" ideas and practices, etc., etc., and the Catholic charitable society which bears the name of the great Saint, St. Vincent de Paul, and which, being based on the charity of Jesus Christ, has no such prudent, harsh, business-like system.

It has come to my attention more than once in my life that refined, deserving persons, who, through misfortune, were in actual want, would deliberately, out of pride, prefer to suffer rather than resort to non-Catholic institutions of the modern "School of Philanthropy" type, with their full and complete record and careful scrutiny system, precisely because that system, in such institutions, existed and was in force.

I believe that the average really charitable man or woman would prefer to be imposed upon occasionally, or have part of his or her contributions to a truly charitable institution occasionally given to the undeserving, rather than have God's poor, many of whom are refined and most of whom are proud, suffer. Moreover, the little that may go to the unworthy through mistaken charity of Catholic charitable societies like that of St. Vincent de Paul, is more than made up by the fact that, except possibly for an occasional underpaid secretary, no salaries are paid to its members, who, relatively poor men, most of them, give their time to hunting out the poor, many of whom, and generally the most deserving, are too proud to let their wants be known; whereas, in these non-Catholic organizations, conducted on the modern plan of the "School of Philanthropy," with their "complete record," "prudent relief," "confidential exchange," etc., etc., system, the cost of their comfortable headquarters and the good salaries paid to their intelligent, inquiring, discriminating managers and clerks, more than make up, in cost, for any improvident or undeserving, intended Christian charity that the St. Vincent de Paul Society may distribute. The fact, if it be a fact, that some of these non-Catholic philanthropic institutions, through the generosity of patrons, have acquired endowment funds which insure the permanence of their plants and the salaries of employees only serves to bring out more clearly the contrast, in principle of operation, between them and the St. Vincent de Paul Society. The plan of St. Vincent de Paul, as I understand it, was designed to enlist, without remuneration, sacrifice, service and help for God's poor, and that plan seems best carried out, as it is carried out, by Conferences in the various parishes, usually made up of those who know the poor of their respective parishes and are inspired to serve them purely out of love for Him who was born in a stable.

I venture to say that, in one instance where the charity administered by St. Vincent de Paul Society gives to the undeserving, in fifty cases it gives where Christ and the founder of this truly noble society would have it go. By all means let us be reasonably prudent in giving to charity, but not too prudent.

It is very true, as "L. E." points out in his useful letter, that as a rule the members of the parish Conferences of the St. Vincent de Paul Society are obscure, even poor men—obscure and poor from a worldly point of view—and that one seldom meets a Catholic-college graduate in the St. Vincent de Paul Society. As a rule, to which there are always glorious exceptions, it would seem that wealth and prominence in the world do not seem to tend toward true Christian charity, but rather towards worldly, prudently managed, popular, well-advertised organizations, of the "School of Philanthropy" type, in contributing to which one knows, a priori, not only that he will help keep up a "very respectable" establishment, but that the portion of his contribution which eventually reaches a poor person will get to one who is absolutely in need and who has first been carefully "investigated," "card-indexed," etc. All too many of our prudent, "prominent," rich Catholics give to these non-Catholic organizations, conducted along the lines of the modern "School of Philanthropy," in preference to the less pretentious and less popular, because less advertised, Catholic charities. We have many modern instances of this. Witness the Y. M. C. A. "drive" as compared with the K. of C. appeal, in the matter of army recreation camps for our soldiers. Witness also two appeals in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat of December 9, where a modest notice of twenty lines was given to the appeal for charity for the St. Louis St. Vincent de Paul Society, while with large headlines and more than three times that space there was a bold article for a non-Catholic philanthropic association, administered on the plan of the modern "School of Philanthropy," which is making a so-called "drive" to raise a fund of $150,000.

I am proud to say that our St. Vincent de Paul Society of St. Louis has, and has had for many years, as its President a Catholic-college graduate in the person of the Hon. Joseph L. Hornsby, who, first a Catholic and cultivated gentleman and then a man of honor and integrity and a lawyer of ability, has served his State and his country and is widely known and universally respected. Also that, in the Treasurer of our St. Vincent de Paul Society of St. Louis, in the person of Mr. Louis Fusz, we have a gentleman who is universally recognized as one of our foremost and best citizens, a man who is highly respected by this entire community.

So that, after all, from the standpoint of serving the purpose for which the St. Vincent de Paul Society was organized, and also from the standpoint of first-class men being at the head of it, the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, as it exists in my native city, is pretty well off; thank God!

What I have rather crudely and hastily said in this letter is not intended, in any sense, as a criticism of the letter of "L. E." On the contrary, I agree with what "L. E." says; but his letter has given me an opportunity to attempt to score some other points not, perhaps, contemplated by him; and his letter certainly has given me an opportunity to express my respect and admiration for the St. Vincent de Paul Society in general and for the St. Louis branch of the Society and its zealous, honorable and distinguished officers.

All charities are good, and where there is question of poverty and want the question should be, as it is, not what the one to be helped believes, but what does he need. On the other hand, as between charity as administered by the methods of the modern "School of Philanthropy" on the one hand and charity administered according to the plan of St. Vincent de Paul on the other, it seems to me that all true Catholics should contribute to the latter rather than to the former. At all events, these are my views and I hope always to live up to them.

St. Louis. PAUL BAKEWELL.

Catholic Schools and Public Libraries

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The public library of the District of Columbia for some years has been desirous of supplying books to the Catholic schools of the District. Dr. George F. Bowerman, the Librarian, Miss Clara W. Herbert, Director of Children's Work, and Miss Louise P. Latimer, Supervisor of Work with Schools, have given much thought to the matter. Because of the lack of library branches a system of library work with public schools has been developed by which any teacher in the District can request that a set of books, one for each child in her classroom, be sent to her pupils for home reading. These sets, packed in locked boxes or baskets, consist of fiction, history, biography, travel, poetry, nature and handicraft books, all suitably graded. The service has been used increasingly by the public schools and several parochial schools have taken advantage of it.

Late in the spring of the present year two public-school teachers, members of the Catholic Women's Literary Gild, came to the library to talk over this matter of fuller cooperation between the Catholic schools and the public library. The library welcomed heartily the suggestion but pointed out that the school-work would not reach its greatest usefulness in Catholic schools as long as Catholic educators might feel that some of the books contained matter contrary to their Church's teaching. So it was suggested by the library at this meeting that a committee of Catholic teachers be formed to review the books of the school-collection on the point of acceptableness to Catholic children. As it was near the end of the school-year a meeting was hastily called to interest in the work as many teachers as possible before vacations took them out of the city. Later an enthusiastic meeting was held, which about twenty-five Catholic Sisters and lay-teachers attended, the plan proposed was approved and the teachers generously volunteered their services. It was decided to review the books of the collection, each teacher making herself responsible for a certain number of volumes. The books, together with cards for registering the reviewer's opinions, were sent to the teachers by July 1. The cards read as follows:

CATHOLIC REVIEW COMMITTEE Author
Title
Name of reviewer
O.K.
Not desirable
Reasons

In all, the Sisters in charge of seven Catholic schools and about thirty-five Catholic public-school teachers and librarians lent a hand to the work of reviewing, which was completed early in October, fifty-three books being rejected. Letters were sent to the Catholic grade-schools telling of the plan of the library, of the careful work of the committee and offering the use of the collection. Printed catalogues of the titles, to which additions are made once yearly, were sent to the schools, and a permanent committee has been formed to review these yearly additions. A list of all vetoed books has been made, and when sets are sent by the library to the Catholic schools none of the rejected volumes is included. It is hoped that the teachers and pupils of all the Catholic schools of the District will depend more and more on the library for both books supplementing their school-work and those for the children's optional reading.

Educational Value of Art Lectures

To the Editor of AMERICA:

If there is one thing insisted on in truly Catholic education, it is broad culture. Witness the artistic beauty of the Church's appeal in her ceremonies, her liturgy, her buildings; the arts and sciences are brought into play to captivate to beauty and truth the senses and the intellect. Historians point out clearly the efforts made by successive popes to preserve the pagan works of art, so that these monuments to the greatness of humanity, more eloquent than written history, might not be lost to the ages. In the Church itself we have a heritage in art which, known rightly, places in our hands a powerful weapon against our calumniators, and weans us from the vulgar display which, under the name of art, disgraces even some Catholic homes. Amongst those outside the Fold there is a widespread admiration and appreciation of our artistic achievements. In New York we find displayed in antique shops, relics taken from dismantled churches, exquisite embroideries, statuary, paintings, which are bought at fabulous prices by the wealthy. Everywhere in America we see signs of the awakening of a desire for culture, real culture and a tacit acknowledgment of the Church as its source.

I have listened to soul-stirring and instructive talks given by a truly Catholic lecturer on Catholic art and I have wondered why such methods of imparting knowledge cannot be brought within the reach, not of a few, but of all our people, especially in these days when pictures and lectures are such potent and popular means of instruction. These methods of educating the populace are ours, our very own, Catholic to the core. We have inherited them from past ages, we used them when books were practically unknown, and in Catholic countries they still hold sway.

No one who is in touch with the times can fail to be cognizant of the impetuous longing of our people for knowledge. They are hungry, thirsty for it, and this appetite is fostered and fed by farseeing, devoted and tireless seekers after commercial advantage. We Catholics are a large percentage of these knowledge and culture-hungry people. If men seeking commercial values have such tremendous success—I use the adjective thinkingly and knowingly—in language courses, art courses, music courses, even courses in the classics, in their original tongues, placed before the people in popular form, made accessible and wonderfully agreeable, what could not be accomplished amongst us who are,-as a whole, docile to the leadings of those whom we honor? To say that we do not want cultural subjects as recreation seems to me an insult to Catholic intelligence and a strong indictment against Catholic education. If some of us are so minded it is an imperative duty for those who possess the advantages of education and position to change our views and bring them back to Catholic standards.

We have the people, the power, the schools, the halls, the churches. We have men with psychological knowledge of human nature and we have college and university men, and yet we let our people crowd the halls of every dispenser of cultural knowledge, and fill their pockets with our money. And let it be said that our people do not give their money for nothing, for in return they acquire much that is well worth while as the result of the labor of these men who, with their whole hearts and energies and wills, go after what they want, create a desire in the people for what they have, put the object of this desire within easy reach, and so justly flourish. Can Catholics not do likewise with the great materials in their possession? In the matter of art can we not do for our popes, our theologians, our great artists what our popes have done for pagan art? Can we not make this subject of Christian art popular amongst our people? This subject, if properly presented, is a history of the wondrous part the Church has played in the civilization of the world. Cannot educated Catholics take up this great theme, which is so appreciated outside the Church and so falsely turned to our injury? Can we not use our means and our influence to pass down this knowledge in an easy form to the children in our schools and to our less favored brethren? We can awaken in them a thirst for cultural subjects, if they do not already possess it, by conversations in praise of these beautiful things, by having reminders of them in our homes, and in many other ways, even as a mother awakens the love of religion and higher things in the heart of her child.

If we cannot or if we will not do this, then must our people continue to seek the joys of knowledge from those commercial dispensers who so willingly spend themselves in striving to create "a market" for culture, and who make access to the heights so easy and so agreeable that men steal hours from their work-a-day lives to crowd their classrooms while real students of Catholic culture, like the very clever and entertaining Catholic scholar, art critic and lecturer, Mrs. Ellen Kirke Downs, are driven to cut from their subjects, points which dwell too plainly on the glorious work of the Spouse of Christ in order to adapt them to those who, though thirsty for culture, cannot abide its source?

Christmas Greetings

"GLORY to God in the highest, and on earth peace to men of good will." Such was the burden of the Christmas hymn sung by the multitude of the celestial army over the hills of Bethlehem on the night that Christ was born; and with each recurring anniversary of the Nativity these words have reechoed through the world, cheering and thrilling the sad hearts of men. It is a consolation to know that the first part of their message is as perfectly fulfilled today as it was in the cold watches of the night when the shepherds first heard it; for Christ still lives, and His human nature, His life and His actions are still possessed of that surpassing, flawless perfection which reflects and praises the Divine perfection in the highest possible way consonant with the designs of the Creator. Today, as on the first Christmas morning, Christ renders to God "glory in the highest."

Thanks to the goodness and kindness of God, our Saviour, the essential peace, which Christ came to give to men of good will, is also possible for all who wish to make it their own. No matter how the Gentiles may rage, no matter how shocking may be the apostacy of the nations and their rejection of the fruits of the Redemption, each individual soul may have, for the asking, reconciliation with God, Divine friendship, and the superabounding grace of Jesus Christ, which here on earth confers Divine sonship and hereafter, when it shall have become the light of glory, will unveil the splendors of the Beatific Vision

This is the peace of which the angel hosts spoke at the lowly manger of the Christ-Child, and it is this greeting and wish that AMERICA conveys to all its readers, that they, as men of good will, may be given in overflowing measure that peace which does not depend on others over whose wills they have no control, but the priceless gift of peace with God, that peace which will enable them to look unafraid on all the trials of the coming year, that peace which bids defiance to suffering and anguish, and is possible in spite of the fact that peace in the popular sense of the word is at present only faintly glimmering on the distant horizon. God's promises do not fail. Today no less than on other days in the Christian era, though we cannot be friends with nations that will not respect our rights, we can nevertheless be friends with God and the children of His love. Christ still says: "My peace I give unto you"; though he warns us that it is "not as the world giveth."

IN precise detail, the city of New York may not correspond to those imaginary municipalities which, from time to time, saints and scholars have held up as models to erring mortals. On the other hand, America's metropolis is not a City of the Dreadful Night, a place in which virtue is at a discount, and iniquity reigns unrebuked. New York owns to many faults, and has others unacknowledged; but events of public moment and of recent occurrence, prove beyond doubt that its citizens have at least one poor virtue. They will not sell their votes. Their peremptory refusal to bow to Mammon is probably the most encouraging sign of the vitality of democratic ideals in America, that has been vouchsafed for many a year. Similarly the eagerness of the "free press" of New York, with one or two honorable exceptions, to burn incense before that demon, is a melancholy indication that in New York, at least, a press really free is as extinct as the perissodactyla. And that way lies danger.

Publishers, and in public most editors, eagerly assert that the newspaper represents the "people"; for all practical purposes, they say, it is "the voice of the people." There was a time, perhaps, when that claim might have been within shouting distance of the truth. It was always subject to a certain suspicion, arising from the fact that publishers, as a rule, were rarely philanthropists, or consecrated ministers of righteousness. They were business men, with at least one eye firmly fixed upon the cash-box. Thus "the champions of the people" were always free and untrammeled, that is, within reasonable limits, and subject to the revision of the advertising and subscription agents, without whose good offices, no newspaper could long subsist. Within recent years, the influence of the press for good has been lessened by the further suspicion of an influence, unduly exercised by moneyed foundations and corporations of great financial resources, whose interests were by no means always identical with the welfare of the community, and, at times, were furthered by cunning and insidious violations of the law of both State and nation.

In New York's recent municipal election, a fund of more than $1,300,000, to which almost every great corporation in the vicinity contributed its quota, was expended in behalf of the defeated candidate. What influence these dollars had on the city's voters, is plain. Their influence on the press is not yet fully known, nor can it be known, until the District Attorney has completed his investigations. But it is openly charged, and has not been denied that "Many newspaper men at one and the same time were on the pay-roll of their newspapers and in receipt of daily or weekly stipends" paid from the funds used for the defeated candidate.

The injury to the public weal caused by such defections in a power which, rightly used, has a legitimate and even necessary place in American life, is apparent. Unless the legislatures of the respective States take immediate steps to place the practice in the category in which it belongs, bribery, the evil results of wholesale corruption, will flourish wherever newspapers that can be bought are to be found. The American press, by its own report a defender of the common people against the "interests," now needs protection from the common people from "the interests" that can buy it. Incidentally, it is interesting to note that the political forces which, under plea of super-sanctity and reform, persecuted the Catholic charities, came to an end in a campaign which gives the legislature ample reason for the speedy passage of a Corrupt Practices act.

"I'm for the Friars"

IN "Diplomatic Days," Mrs. Nelson O'Shaughnessy's recent book of reminiscences, she enthusiastically praises the work of the Church in Mexico, and gives the following reflections on what she beheld in the town of Texcoco:

> A crumbling, picturesque monastery and inconceivably desolate, dusty seminary join the church where the friars used to teach. Oh, the poor friars! There is so little account taken of their ceaseless activities, of how they found a wilderness, dotted it with churches, schools and hospitals, stamped it with a seal of matchless beauty, brought it out of the worship of greedy gods, human sacrifices and abominations, counting no cost, and showed as best they might dim shapes of more benign powers. I can't see what all the hue and cry is about, all the revilings. We couldn't match the record. We have disfigured Mexico, wherever we have set our seal. Frankly, I'm for the friars.

The reason why the author of "Diplomatic Days" is frankly "for the friars" is because she has learned from reading history that their spiritual conquest of Mexico caused the substitution of civilization for barbarism, and of Christianity for idolatry. The friars' untiring labors brought about not only the religious regeneration of the country, but its material and social betterment as well. The Indians willingly flocked into the Church in vast numbers. The renowned Friar Motolina, for instance, is known to have baptized some 400,000 natives with his own hand, and within a few years after the Spaniards came the entire country had become Catholic. Under the Church's fostering patronage education and learning throve and spread. The first printing press in the Western Hemisphere was set up in Mexico in 1536, and Dr. John Gilmary Shea gives a list of fifty books which were published before 1614, twenty-four years prior to the date a press reached the English colonies. In 1524 a school for Indians opened its doors, by 1543 the natives were taking industrial courses there, and in 1553 the great University of Mexico was started

As Mrs. O'Shaughnessy sadly owns, we cannot match that record. On the contrary "We have disfigured Mexico wherever we have set our seal." By giving official recognition to the persecuting Government that controls a portion of Mexico, the United States would seem to have tacitly condoned all the acts of pillage, rape, murder and sacrilege which have marked the rise to power of Carranza and his associates. Moreover, it was our unjustifiable interference in the affairs of Mexico that made possible the unspeakable abominations of Villa and Carranza. Without question, "We have disfigured Mexico wherever we have set our seal."

Christmas Optimism

ONCE upon a time, in the course of a lecture which a professor of astronomy was giving to the yokels of a Scotch village, he solemnly announced: "In seven-hundred million years, my friends, the sun will be a cold body like the moon. There will be no warmth on earth, no light, no life . . . nothing." Thereupon a chair was pushed back noisily at the back of the hall, a big farmer got up and asked in great agitation: "Excuse me, Mister, but hoo lang did ye say it would be till that happened?" "Seven-hundred million years, my friend." The farmer sank back into his chair with a great sigh of relief. "Thank Goad!" he gasped, "Aw thocht ye said seven million."

The comfort that grateful Scot derived from the news that the earth would last for 693,000,000 years longer than he had at first feared should be shared by some of those who are aging rapidly just now owing to the worry and anxiety they feel regarding the outcome of the present war and a thousand other unsolved problems that distress them. But vain fears should not be allowed to rob the Christmas season of its spirit of hope and optimism. The war, of course, will not last forever but will come to an end no doubt much sooner than we now expect. The fervent prayers offered through Our Lady's hands during the novena made by so many holy souls just prior to the Feast of the Immaculate Conception were by no means said in vain, but will all help to hasten the return of peace. According to the law of averages, most American mothers, it should be remembered, will welcome home their soldier-boys again, safe and sound. Our Government, too, will learn by experience how to solve best the many intricate problems of conservation and expenditure that this world-war has created, and the boundless resources of the country will be so well administered that the needs of the poor will be fully relieved and the prodigality of the rich wisely restrained. Just as the nations of Europe have been brought nearer to God by the scourge of war, in like manner the American people who were in danger of yielding to the soul-weakening influences of a soft materialism, will now in all probability be so chastened and spiritualized by the privations they must bear, that God will find our hearts well disposed for receiving joyfully His Christmas message of good-will and peace. Without question his religion makes every Catholic an incurable optimist, for he knows that God always governs the world with a loving Father's hand, that absolutely nothing happens without God's permission, that He is wont to draw from passing evil permanent good, that He works from end to end sweetly and strongly and that everything will come out right at last.

Working under Difficulties

THE mail marked for the attention of AMERICA's "complaint clerk" is rather large these days, and the senders of that mail chant the same threnody. Few of the complaints are captious. The writers have a just grievance, for the copy of AMERICA to which they were looking forward, has somehow failed to arrive. The unhappy clerk sighs like any lean and melancholy Cassio, but the editors rather rejoice in these compliments by complaint. No one complains of not getting things which he does not want. It is a bit difficult to imagine an indignant debtor writing because the monthly grocery bill had not been presented, or a flat-dweller grumbling because the landlord showed a positive disinclination to collect the rent.

A little forbearance is good always, and in these days most necessary. No blame can be attributed to the editors or publishers, for AMERICA has never been delayed in going to press, or failed in making connections with a mail-train. Your own postmaster can probably tell you of the many postoffices now working with a staff depleted by the departure of many for the army. In one large Eastern city not many months ago, the delivery system broke down completely, and went into a state of coma, caused by an unusually large mail, for nearly twenty-four hours. To make matters worse, the railways have been badly congested for months, a condition which does not seem the fault of the operators. If you will examine the date-stamp of the next letter which comes to you from a distance of 300 miles or more, you will see that the usual time-limit has been exceeded by a good many hours. A letter just received in New York was mailed in Louisville forty-four hours previously, although the ordinary running-time between these cities is liberally estimated at twenty-four hours.

But we are not making any complaints. Like Bret Harte's organist, the Post Office Department is probably doing its—well, let us say that the Department is making the fullest use of all the means now at its disposal. It is an excellent rule in life to believe that others are trying to do the best they can for us, and we are willing to extend that rule to our public carriers. If your copy of AMERICA does not arrive at the accustomed time, we suggest that to wait a few days will probably save you a stamp and some stationery. Even the Post Office recognizes the old saw that all things come to those who wait.

Literary Executors' Crimes and Follies

"THESE might do harm to others; let us destroy them," said Canon Sheehan not long before his death, as he threw into the open grate the manuscript of two volumes of memoirs he had written. That act of sacrifice, owing to the motive that prompted it, was without question among the noblest of the novelist's life. Though well aware, no doubt, of the literary excellence and interesting character of those memoirs, nevertheless he ruthlessly destroyed them because he feared that some of the truths in them would give pain or do an injury to persons still living. The Canon's course of action presents a refreshing contrast to that of many a man of letters facing a similar temptation. For almost every year there are brought out volumes of letters, or memoirs, containing matter which considerations of justice or charity should have kept from being published. A literary or public man, for example, commits to paper his cynical and unfair opinion of his contemporaries, then dies and leaves the manuscript to executors with directions to publish it. What he was afraid to do while living, he gets others to undertake after his demise, and that is the act of a coward. Then his scandal-mongering executors, throwing discretion to the winds, perhaps make "strictly confidential" letters public and let all the world read what the embittered author or publicist really thought of his friends and acquaintances.

There is another kind of literary executors, not so knavish as the preceding but quite as lacking in commonsense, and fully as deficient in editorial judgment. For no sooner is their "gifted author" thoroughly dead and quite powerless to defend himself, than they invade his literary workshop, and begin to rummage among his notes and papers in the hope of rescuing from hungry oblivion some deathless masterpiece. Though they probably find in the lamented author's desk nothing but a few commonplace tales, hum-drum verses, unfinished essays or half-finished novels which his own cultivated taste had kept him from publishing or completing, nevertheless these literary cormorants eagerly seize every scrap of his writing, and with scant editorial revision hurry off the manuscripts to the printer and soon have on sale several volumes of worthless fragments which the late author never intended should be published, as he fully realized that their appearance would deal a fatal blow to his reputation as a literary artist. So if all the living authors of our day are wise, they will courageously consign betimes to the open grate, as did Canon Sheehan, whatever manuscripts they have of which the publication would pain or injure others or would seriously impair their own literary reputation, for authors' executors often prove to be either knaves or fools.

THE CHRISTMAS MAGAZINES

NOT so many years ago the non-religious magazines seemed to engage every December in an entertaining rivalry to see which could bring out the most sumptuous and appropriate Christmas number. Fine reproductions of the old masters' Nativity paintings were common, sweet-faced Madonnas by modern artists abounded, while half the stories and practically all the poetry had to be unmistakably "Christmassy." But times, alas! have changed. For, judging by the contents of this month's magazines, the Christmas note is confined for the most part to their advertising pages. Merchants and manufacturers still have such a lively faith in the commercial value of Christmas that with striking pictures and arresting phrases they keep urging the readers of December magazines to buy "the gift that endures," "to give something useful this Christmas," to purchase "a gift worth while," to select "something new for Christmas," to choose "the ideal gift," or to secure "the gift that always pleases." Having thus caught his readers' attention, the advertiser then tells them, with as much self-restraint as an enthusiastic producer can command, why they should not neglect this exceptional opportunity of buying their friends the highly suitable present he suggests.

This year, however, in the majority of the secular magazines for December, the Christmas spirit, it must be said, is not permitted to steal very far beyond the advertising pages. Good Housekeeping, the Ladies' Home Journal and Scribner's Magazine are the most notable exceptions to the rule. The first of the three actually has a Madonna and Child on its cover and within is a Christmas story of unusual excellence by Gertrude Brooke Hamilton entitled "The Sons of God." She tells how the cook of a poste de secours on the French firing-line celebrated Noel by making a little crib for the Christ-Child, and how all who beheld it were filled with kind and holy thoughts. Theodosia Garrison then has a poem called "A Prayer for Mothers of Men," in which she sings of Our Lady:

She saw the gleam of white starlight, she felt the rush of wings;
Through the little door, the humble door, came simple folk and kings;
And some knelt down with gifts and praise and some with tears and prayers—
And suddenly the little Christ seemed less of hers than theirs.

and she ends with the prayer:

Now on this night when Mary felt the rapture and the dread,
O mothers of all wanderers may you be comforted
And feel again within your hearts the peace that Mother knew
Before her humble door stood wide to let the world come through.
God grant this night that Mary's Son bring back your sons to you.

For the readers of the Ladies' Home Journal Catherine Van Dyke describes "My Last Christmas Eve in Paris." She goes to Mass at Notre Dame with her Catholic friends and sees "The Cardinal of France" officiating. Looking about her she observes

> Some very old men and women cling one to another. There are four, over there in the dark corner, kneeling tightly together, before the Mother of Sorrows. Their heads are bowed almost to the stone floor. They are all very old. By their dress I tell they are Belgian refugees who have nothing left to cling to but the Mother of Sorrows. Sometimes an old woman drags her feet to a favorite niche and burns a candle with her solitary sou for the son who, this night, cannot be with her.

Kate Douglas Wiggin then tells a "Rebecca" story about "The Quilt of Happiness that Came to Miss Roxy on Christmas Eve." There are a number of bright Yuletide pictures, including a Madonna and Child, and C. Courtenay Savage gives an account of "The 'Baby Special'" which the Sisters of Charity in charge of the New York Foundling Hospital send out twice a year.

Scribner's Christmas story is Temple Bailey's "The Red Candle," which tells how Santa Claus unexpectedly came to a tenement-house family. Theodora Bates Cogswell ends her verses to "The Little Trees" with the petition:

Teach me through turning Godward
From fear to find release,
And steadfast with sweet worship
To greet the Child of Peace.

and Charles W. Kennedy's "Christmas Prayer" has the stanza:

God send us store on Christmas Day
Of friends and health and mirth,
And bless us with that dream alway
That blessed the world on Christmas Day
Good-will, and peace on earth.

In the Century the Christmas note is considerably thinner. It sounds faintly in Ruth Comfort Mitchell's amusing epistolary story of "The Glory Girl," changes to a minor key in Emory Pottle's "Christmas at Pont-a-Mousson," for he tells how the Germans shelled the place that day and killed his dear friend Captain Jennat, but rings out cheerfully in Grant Showerman's description of "A Country Christmas" which George Wright has faithfully illustrated with pictures in color.

In Harper's, however, the Christmas note almost peters out, being just saved by Margarita Spalding Gerry's "A Midwinter Night's Dream," the story of how gifts bought for the needy found their way to the home of a poor little rich girl. In the December Atlantic Monthly the Christmas note is quite inaudible. True to its chilling Unitarian traditions, that magazine seems to have succeeded in excluding from the pages of its reading matter the very mention of the word Christmas, and offers, perhaps as a substitute, James Harvey Robinson's dangerous and superficial paper on "The Threatened Eclipse of Free Speech" which ends with a paragraph as offensively alien to the Christmas spirit as this:

> One may reach such a stage of intellectual emancipation that he exempts nothing from scrutiny; he perceives that the spheres in which mankind has made the most startling achievements in human coordination and effectiveness are those from which all notions of reverence, except for intelligence and success, have been eliminated. Only when that ancient savage term "sacred" disappears from our thought and speech, except as a reminder of outlived superstition, can we hope for a full and generous acknowledgement of the essential rôle of absolutely free discussion.

This December's St. Nicholas, however, is almost as Christmas-like as of yore. A smiling Santa Claus waves a greeting from the cover, Julia Burket shows what "The Unwelcome Gift" was which little Bebelle offered the king, and Ellen Manly's "Ballad of Bungerydeen" is as cleverly rhymed and pictured as the most critical could wish.

All the Catholic magazines for December are, of course, replete with Christmas stories, articles, verses and illustrations. Father William D. O'Brien reminds Extension readers "What the Prophets Foretold of the Saviour," James V. Desmond relates once more "The Story of the Birth of Christ," and Lillian Murphy teaches "The Art of Christmas Giving." The Queen's Work opens with an exhortation to keep Christmas for Christ, publishes "The Christ-Child Candle in the Window," E. M. E. F.'s contribution to a short-story contest, and has a good ascetical paper on "The Feast of Generous Love," in which the writer exclaims with Crashaw:

Welcome all wonders in one night!
Eternity shut in a span!
Summer in winter, day in night!
Heaven on earth, and God in man!
Great Little One, whose all embracing birth
Lifts earth to Heaven; lowers Heaven to earth!

The current Catholic World, as was shown in our issue of December 8, by no means lacks appropriate prose and verse for Christmas, and the Magnificat could hardly have had more Christmas matter in it than this month's issue contains, Mr. Watts' story about the Protestant sergeant who saw midnight Mass celebrated in the trenches being a particularly good one.

The Messenger of the Sacred Heart makes the January number its Christmas issue and, as usual, is full of verses, stories and colored pictures appropriate for Our Lord's Birthday. Indeed all our Catholic papers, magazines and periodicals echo, as is meet at this blessed season, old Ben Jonson's melodious queries:

What comfort by Him do we win,
Who made Himself the price of sin;
To make us heirs of glory?
To see the Babe all innocence,
A martyr born in our defense,
Can man forget the story?

WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

A BIRTH-NIGHT SONG

The Child is rocked on Mary's knee,
Cold in the stall this bitter night;
And "Lullaby, loo," soft singeth she,
"My little Son and Heaven's Delight!"
When singing stars went up the sky
The Prince of Peace oped a sweet eye.

His Highness Lord, how small He lies!
He to be God and Very God!
A Jacob's ladder spans the skies
Whereof each rung is angel-trod,
Hark, how they sing: Good-will to men!
The Prince of Peace is born again!

Come in, O war-worn world, and rest;
Kneel where the gentle creatures kneel;
The Babe clasped close to Mary's breast.
He is your Wound-Wort, your All-Heal
Balsam for wounds that ache and smart;
The Rose of Peace on Mary's heart.

He gathers in His hand, so small,
All herbs of healing, not a sword.
Come in, poor broken people all,
For here your ancient peace is stored.
"Lullaby, loo," sings Mary mild,
Kissing her Lord, her God, her Child.

KATHERINE TYNAN.

CHRISTMAS

"And shall you have a Tree," they say,
"Now one is dead and one away?"

Oh, I shall have a Christmas Tree!
Brighter than ever it shall be;
Dressed out with colored lights to make
The room all glorious for your sake.
And under the Tree a Child shall sleep
Near shepherds watching their wooden sheep
Threads of silver and ropes of gold,
Scarlet bubbles the Tree shall hold,
And little glass bells that tinkle clear.
I shall trim it alone but feel you near.

And when Christmas Day is almost done,
When they all grow sleepy one by one,
When Kenton's books have all been read,
When Deborah's climbing the stairs to bed;
I shall sit alone by the fire and see
Ghosts of you both come close to me.
For the dead and the absent always stay
With the one they love on Christmas Day.

REVIEWS

Cardinal Mercier. Pastorals, Letters, Allocutions, 1914-1917. With a Biographical Sketch and Foreword. By REV. JOSEPH F. STILLEMANS, President of the Belgian Relief Fund. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. $1.25.

Amid the welter and horror of the present world-war there stands out no figure of more exalted moral grandeur than that of Désiré Cardinal Mercier, Archbishop of Malines and Primate of Belgium. From the time that his country was ruthlessly invaded by the Germans, until today, when after more than three years of outrage and oppression, her soul still remains unconquered, Cardinal Mercier has never ceased to lift up his voice in fearless protest against the wrongs done Belgium by the invader, in cries to the civilized world for justice and reparation, and in fatherly words of comfort for his stricken flock. We have in this volume the most striking and important of his official utterances bearing on the war. In the first of the seven chapters is the Cardinal's noble pastoral on "Patriotism and Endurance" issued the sad Christmas of 1914, in which he consoled the sorrowing mothers of Belgium with these words:

> I was asked lately by a staff-officer whether a soldier falling in a righteous cause—and our cause is such, to demonstration—is not veritably a martyr. Well, he is not a martyr in the rigorous theological meaning of the word, inasmuch as he dies in arms, whereas, the martyr delivers himself, undefended and unarmed into the hands of the executioner. But if I am asked what I think of the eternal salvation of a brave man who has consciously given his life in defense of his country's honor, and in vindication of violated justice, I shall not hesitate to reply that without any doubt whatever Christ crowns his military valor, and that death, accepted in this Christian spirit, assures the safety of that man's soul. "Greater love than this no man hath," said our Saviour, "that a man lay down his life for his friends." And the soldier who dies to save his brothers, and to defend the hearths and altars of his country, reaches this highest of all degrees of charity.

"An Appeal to Truth" is the letter Cardinal Mercier sent the following year to the Bishops of Germany in order to clear of calumnious charges the clergy and people of Belgium; "For Our Soldiers" is the heartening discourse he delivered on his country's national holiday, July 21, 1916; "Belgium Enslaved" contains the correspondence between the Cardinal and the German authorities regarding that worst of iniquities, the deportations, by which thousands of able-bodied men were first robbed of work at home and then carried off to Germany and forced to take the places of laborers who were thus left free to enter the Kaiser's army and fight against the Cardinal's countrymen. "Christian Vengeance," the concluding discourse in the volume, is a masterly exposition of St. Thomas Aquinas's teaching on charity. The book's frontispiece is a picture in colors of the intrepid Primate of Belgium. W. D.

The Well of English and the Bucket. By BURGES JOHNSON. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. $1.25.

Mr. Johnson's book has brought comfort to at least one who has spent many hours of his life trying to teach both high-school and college students how to write plain English. Comfort arises from two sources. First, the essays are so sensible, so practically suggestive, so charmingly done. Secondly, some of the ways and means explained were used by the one comforted when he was teaching the freshman class, and proved successful. It is consoling to have the commendation of an authority like Mr. Johnson. Whether or not the second reason is the more potent with the reviewer, matters little. It is none the less true that the papers, entitled "The Well of English and the Bucket," "Grammar the Bane of Boyhood," and the others, give solid reasons why our students are so backward in English composition. More than that, they offer effective remedies.

May it be given to our teachers to realize that their pupils can have all the rules of grammar, all the fiats of rhetoric trippingly on the tongue, and yet they may be unable not only to write a page of respectable English; but, further, they may be quite unconcerned about the lack of such an elementary accomplishment. More than one author worth hearing has said that without enthusiasm nothing of moment will be done. Now, the first step towards any degree of enthusiasm is interest. If the teacher does not arouse interest in his pupils, if he does not show them that to be able to write their mother-tongue correctly is altogether possible and worth while, how is he going to stir them to labor at acquiring precision, much less any elegance in self-expression? Not every teacher will be able to use a newspaper as a text-book and succeed as Mr. Johnson does. On the other hand, we have proof enough that if our teachers persist in sticking to the lumbering rhetorical wains employed so commonly, their poor charges will continue to bear the heavy yoke rebelliously and in vain, for they will never care to learn how to write good English.

The History of Medieval Europe. By LYON THORNDYKE. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $2.75.

"The pilgrim seeking the way to the past must first of all, like Christian at the wicket gate, free himself from the burden of all his present prejudices and even principles." Such are the words with which Mr. Thorndyke, in a spirit of "broad-mindedness," warns the historical student against what is justly reckoned the chief source whence most of the errors arise that darken the modern mind and prevent it from attaining to a clear and correct understanding of a past on whose institutions, customs, and beliefs our own age has, as a necessary consequence, been but very shiftily reared. The implication is, of course, that the author has done his best to comply with the above rule as he himself has formulated it. We have no reason to doubt his sincerity. His instincts are good and many passages in his book display a spirit of sympathy and condescending charity towards the rough-hewn giants of medieval times quite in keeping with the gospel of "sweetness and light." But instincts are poor guides in matters such as history, which for proper treatment, even in a text-book, requires a trained intellect and sound principles. The great medievalists certainly had more than mere instinct to direct them.

Mr. Thorndyke's deficiency in this regard is well illustrated by his formula which for all its apparent liberalism contains a gross psychological error. It is sound wisdom certainly to be on one's guard against prejudice, provided such prejudice be not in favor of known or suspected truth; but to ask a man to divest himself of his principles savors of absolute skepticism, which, for all the verbiage in which it may be clouded and shrouded, contradicts our God-given nature. If an historian has not a solid scientific grounding in ethics, metaphysics, and theology, he will of necessity assume an ethics, metaphysics, and theology of his own, of a purely anti-scientific and pragmatic nature and with no more solid foundation than the latest on-dit-ologies of his set or of current literature. And despite his liberal instincts this is precisely what Mr. Thorndyke has done. In theology he has assumed the Papacy to be a mere human institution. He assumes the metaphysical impossibility of miracles. And on his assumption again every emperor or king, whatever the ethical nature of his aims and actions, is sure to have been in the right whenever he opposed the Pope. The errors regarding facts and interpretation into which he has been thus led are too numerous to be detailed in a review such as this. If, however, he would take the pains to read such works as A. J. Carlyle's "History of Medieval Political Theory in the West" (non-Catholic), Hergenroether's "Church and State," Mann's "Lives of the Popes," and Hefele's "History of the Councils" in the latest French translation, we feel sure that, in view of his evident sincerity, his next edition will leave less to be desired. For in point of form and arrangement Mr. Thorndyke's book may well serve as a model for future text-books on medieval history.

Songs for a Little House. By CHRISTOPHER MORLEY. New York: George H. Doran Co. $1.25.

Weights and Measures. By FRANKLIN P. ADAMS. Garden City, N. Y.: Doubleday, Page & Co. $1.00.

Lightness and merriment are the dominant notes of both these books of verse, though some of Mr. Morley's pages are in a higher strain. He sings melodiously of the little joys and humors of domestic life, solemnly averring, for instance, that

> The man who never in his life
> Has washed the dishes with his wife
> Or polished up the silver plate—
> He still is largely celibate.

offers us "A Handful of Sonnets," of which "The Wedded Lover" is the best; runs off some parodies and "other literary pollen," not all of which are in impeccable taste, and writes some poems on the war, of which the following lines, entitled "March, 1915," are the finest:

> Pussy willow, pussy willow,
> Do you bloom in Belgium now?
>
> Tiny, furry little catkins,
> Where the Meuse runs green and clear,
> Do the children run to pick you,
> In this springtime of the year?
> Do they stroke you and caress you;
> Kiss the silky balls of fur,
> Take you to the priest to bless you
> And pretend to hear you purr?
> Do their small, hot fingers wilt you?
> (Sweethearts, you remember how—)
> Pussy willow, pussy willow,
> Do you bloom in Belgium now?

Verses which entertained those who were accustomed to throw a morning glance at F. P. A.'s "Conning Tower" are likely to prove disappointing when gathered into a volume. There are some clever translations of Horace into very modern English; "Maecenas atavis," for example, begins thus:

> Maecenas of the bluest blood,
> My guard revered, my glory noble,
> One man acquires Olympic mud
> Upon his racing automob'le,
> And winning of an earthly prize
> Exalts him to the well-known skies.

and here is Miss Muffet done in free verse:

> Little Miss Muffet sat in a corner,
> Absorbing casein—
> A food of great nutritive power,
> Rich in butter fats.
> A spider—an arachnid of the species
> Araneidae—came along
> Ugly, motive horrendous,
> Terrorizing her to the point of departure.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Mary Parker Converse has arranged and compiled an "American Soldiers' and Sailors' Diary, 1918" (Dutton, $0.60), and has placed at the top of each page texts ranging from Ella Wheeler Wilcox to St. John the Evangelist. At the end of the diary is a short exhortation by Cardinal O'Connell, a prayer by Dr. Jowett and, signed with Newman's name, a benediction, which he would hardly acknowledge his.——For housewives and cooks who are at a loss how to render meals appetizing to those who strive to make their bodies less and more their grace, Vance Thompson has prepared an "Eat and Grow Thin Calendar, 1918" (Dutton, $1.00). It contains the "Mahdah" menus for each month.

The Catholic Convert for December opens with Dr. James J. Walsh's sketches of the late Professor Eugene Woldemar Hilgard of the University of California and of Sven Magnus Gronberger of the Smithsonian Institute, Washington, two convert scientists of renown. The Rt. Rev. Henry G. Graham, Auxiliary Bishop of St. Andrews and Edinburg, who was formerly a Presbyterian, writes of the not very encouraging "Religious Conditions in Scotland" where few are willing to "turn Irish" as entering the Church is called. Eva Dorsey Carr of Annapolis continues the narrative of her conversion, Mary Roberts, and Francis Chapman Leete tell how they found the true Church and Helena T. Goessmann contributes an appreciation of the late Herbert Shaw Carruth. According to the official records 10,000 converts were made last year in England.

War dominates in Nellie L. McClung's "The Next of Kin" (Houghton, Mifflin, $1.25), but it is not the war as seen only on the fields of battle, but rather the dread scourge as it affects those who do not go to the front themselves but send their own there, or as the subtitle well puts it, "those who wait and wonder." There are poems, stories, essays and arguments of widely varying merit, "Permission" being a tale excellent in matter and in manner. The author sees no courage in "the monastery idea of retirement from the world" but if she is speaking of the Anglican Church, her own words in another part of the book may account for her opinion, for she says: "The Church . . . has clung to shadows after the substance has departed."——The plot of "The Ruby Cross" (Benziger, $1.25), by Mary Wallace, involves a charming heroine and a scoundrel villain, and is unfolded adroitly. The climax is capped by a sort of triple elopement, which emphasizes the Church's uncompromising stand on the question of marriage.——Maurice Brandon, with a cigarette between his lips and "a look of supreme boredom on his handsome young face," together with Convers, Doris, Vivian Caryll, Audrey, Hugh Chenyl, and many other well-named persons make Ethel Dell's "The Safety-Curtain" (Putnam, $1.50) the legitimate successor of the late Laura Jean Libby. The "striking and forceful" tales ascribed to Miss Dell by the publishers, have, unfortunately, been omitted from this volume.

The subtitle of "Elizabeth Bess, a Little Girl of the Sixties" (Macmillan, $1.25), by E. C. Scott, might well have been "a little child shall lead them." The scene is a typical New England town of fifty years ago, with its village school, kindly neighbors, Fourth of July celebrations, etc. Elizabeth Bess Bradford is a real little girl with all the curiosity peculiar to one "going on six." The difficulties in which she finds herself and her perfect confidence in "brover Wee-um's" power of solving them should amuse grown-ups as well as the younger folk. Cleverly interwoven with the children's adventures is a quiet romance happily consummated in the finding by "Elizabeth Bess" herself of Howell Bradford, missing since Gettysburg. The freshness and very human character-presentation of this Catholic author's book will make the reader wish for more of its kind.——"About Peggy Saville" (Putnam, $1.25), is Mrs. George de Horne Vaizey's story of an attractive prank-loving girl whose parents sent her to school at a vicarage where there were many persons into whose lives she wove her own in an interesting way.——To the child whose Christmas present somebody forgot to buy full amends can be made by securing for the little neglected one the sumptuous volume of Joel Chandler Harris's "Nights with Uncle Remus" (Houghton Mifflin, $3.00), which Milo Winter has so appropriately illustrated with thirteen droll pictures in color. The fact that Mr. Harris was a Catholic is an additional reason why our boys and girls should know their Uncle Remus perfectly.

"Deeds not creeds," writes Dr. Charles Foster Kent of Yale, in the preface to his "The Social Teachings of the Prophets and Jesus" (Scribner's, $1.50), "alone are essential." The stock phrase gives the measure of Dr. Kent's insight into the teaching of the Redeemer of the human race. Of His disciples, Jesus Christ demanded the complete acknowledgment that He is in very truth, the Incarnate God. On this truth is His mission based, and if Jesus Christ is not God, Christianity is a fraud and the philosophy which Dr. Kent builds upon the system, can be nothing but a delusion. Books of this kind explain why Protestantism, in so many quarters, has rejected the Divinity of Jesus Christ, and supply a convincing reason why the attendance of Catholics at non-Catholic schools is a danger to Faith. Except his adoring pupils, there is no greater fool than the man wise in his own conceit.——In "Experiments in Educational Psychology" (Macmillan, $1.00) Dr. Starch of the University of Wisconsin has written a book which will be found suggestive by advanced students. There is very little theory in this volume, intended for the laboratory, and while some of the experiments may seem of doubtful utility, teachers will find the suggestions on motor and visual imagery, in Chapter VIII, calculated both to lift their own minds out of the professional rut and to stimulate the minds of their pupils.

To every organist the names of Guilmant, Saint-Saëns, Widor and César Franck are as familiar as the very instrument on which he plays. In his volume, "The Organ in France" (The Boston Music Co., $2.00), Wallace Goodrich aims at giving a description of the organ as known to these great composers, and which guided them in their efforts. During the past twenty-five years there has been a revolution in organ construction, especially in America. The modern instrument may be called an orchestra. Its place is the theater as well as the church. The great French composers wrote not necessarily and exclusively for the church, but for an organ whose purpose was to aid and embellish the church service. Consequently when their compositions are performed on the present-day organ with its amplified registration and electrically controlled contrivances, they do not render at all the effects intended by the composers. Even though the American editions are annotated especially to overcome this difficulty they nevertheless fail to do so. The result is that these masterpieces lose their best charm. The purpose of this very technical book is to give American organists an intimate knowledge of the organ for which the masters wrote. This will enable them to effect their own registration and thus do justice to the compositions.

"American Adventures" (Century, $3.00), is a glorified guidebook to a number of Southern cities. In the course of 681 pages, Mr. Street pleasantly conveys a large amount of information on geographical and ethnological matters, tells a number of good stories, and succeeds fairly well in proving that his vision is not obscured by the smoke that rose from Sumter in April, '61.——"Palestine, the Rebirth of an Ancient Nation" (Knopf, $1.25), by Albert M. Hyamson, is a timely book owing to the present campaign in that interesting country. The volume will not attract the pilgrim or the archeologist, as it concerns itself with a history of the Zionist movement, but it should prove interesting to those whose hopes are centered in the colonization of Judea, the restoration of the Hebrew nation and the enjoyment of political and religious liberty by the exiled Jews of the world.——"Medical Research and Human Welfare" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.25), by W. W. Keen, M.D., is a record of personal experiences and observations during the professional life of fifty-seven years of the Emeritus Professor of Surgery at Jefferson Medical College. Dr. Keen describes, with the vividness of an eye-witness, the general progress of medicine through the discoveries of anaesthesia, bacteriology, and aseptic surgery. It is a valuable record of events, but one which will be chiefly interesting to Dr. Keen's many friends.

Mr. Shane Leslie's "Forgotten Passages in the Life of Florence Nightingale" is the most interesting paper in the October Dublin Review. That distinguished woman's letters to Cardinal Manning indicate how near she once was to the Church and they also give a merciless analysis of Anglican inconsistency. She concludes:

> The Church of England could not have stood in any country but England, because she is such a poor historian. I have always thought that the great theological fight had yet to be fought out in England between Catholicism and Protestantism. In Germany it was fought out 300 years ago. They know why they are Protestants. I never knew an Englishman who did, and if he inquires, he becomes a Catholic.

Malcolm V. Hay shows how John Lorenz Mosheim, "the discredited and forgotten Lutheran historian," was "The German Ghost of Gibbon" on whom the latter relied for many of his "facts." A reviewer quotes with commendation these stanzas on "The Children's War" from Katherine Tynan's "Late Songs":

This is the Children's War, because
  The victory's to the young and clean.
Up to the Dragon's ravening jaws
  Run dear Eighteen and Seventeen.

The light is yet upon their eyes,
  The dream is still within their eyes,
Their cheeks are silken as a girl's—
  The little Knights of Paradise.

O men, with many scars and stains,
  Stand back, abase your souls and pray!
For now to Nineteen are the gains,
  And golden Twenty wins the day. . . .

A seasonable poem in Miss Margaret Widdemer's "Factories" (Holt, $1.25) is the following "Country Carol":

Where the patient oxen were, by the ass's stall,
Watching my Lord's manger, knelt the waking cattle all;
'Twas a little country Maid vigil by Him kept—
All among the country things my good Lord slept.
Fair was Rome, the city, on that early Christmas morn,
Yet among the country-folk was my Lord born.

Country-lads that followed him, blithe they were and kind,
It was only city-folk were hard to Him and blind;
Ay, He told of lilies, and of grain and grass that grew,
Fair things of the summer fields, my good Lord knew,
By the hedgerow's flowering there He laid His head—
It was in the country that my Lord was bred.

When the Cross weighed down on Him on the grievous road,
'Twas a kindly countryman raised my good Lord's load;
Peasant-girls of Galilee, folk of Nazareth,
These were fain to follow Him down the ways of death—
Yea, beyond a city wall, underneath the sky,
Out in open country did my good Lord die.

When He rose to Heaven on that white ascension day,
Last from open country did my good Lord pass away;
Rows of golden seraphim watched where He should dwell,
Yet it was the country-folk had my Lold's farewell;
Out above the flowered hill, from the mossy grass
Up from open country did my good Lord pass. . . .

EDUCATION

"The Value of the Classics"

IN the volume bearing the above title, recently edited by Andrew F. West, Dean of the Princeton Graduate School, and issued from the Princeton University Press, a copious array of arguments is put at the command of the champions of the classics. The arguments have been selected from those set forth last summer by the eminent educators and their allies from many walks of life who gathered at Princeton to plead the cause of the old masters. The book makes interesting and useful reading, and affords us the opportunity once more to call attention to some at least of the reasons of the faith that is in us, that the classics are the best instruments in the hand of the teacher to train the minds of the coming generations.

Mr. W. W. Keen, President of the American Philosophical Society, Philadelphia, is not mistaken when he says: "As a basis of universal culture the classics stand in an impregnable position." ("Value of the Classics," p. 250).

Viscount Bryce tells us that the modern world needs the ancient writings as much as ever, "not only because they furnish perpetual delight as models of style, but also because by their very unlikeness to modern conditions they touch the imagination, stimulate thought, enlarge our view of man and nature." They are interwoven into the very texture of modern literature "and are the common heritage of civilized peoples, the permanent foundation on which the republic of letters has been built." And the real, the prevalent reason, says President Wilson ("Value of the Classics," p. 131)—"for holding every man we can to the study of the classics," is the scant capital which would be left us to trade on "were we to throw away the wisdom we have inherited and seek our fortunes with the slender stock we ourselves have accumulated."

The Tenure of the Classics

SUCH facts need to be emphasized. For 2,000 years the classics have been in possession of the educational field. We might add 500 years to that period and not be mistaken. For classic education began on the day when Greek boys were sent to school to the Iliad and the Odyssey and Greece as a nation learned its value when her tribes gathered at the Olympic games to hear Herodotus read of their country's glorious struggle to "make the world safe for democracy," and when later on Athenians watched the net of doom closing around the Theban king in the immortal tragedy of their greatest dramatist. But even should this not be taken into account, its influence began when Cicero, Horace, Lucretius, Virgil and Hortensius looked to Athens for their masters in the art of eloquence and song, and Roman boys parsed and scanned their Homer and Alcæus. The classics of Greece took hold then of the hearts and the imaginations of the masters of the world, and Greece though conquered by the legions of Rome soon captured the minds of her new lords. The classics have been in possession ever since. Not a nation of the Western world has risen to greatness and power, or filled its destiny in the pages of history that did not bow to the rule of these high sovereigns of the mind. In the period of the savage incursions of the Alani, the Hun, the Vandal and the Goth, the classics still kept their hold on the succeeding generations. Augustine and Jerome, Gregory Nazianzen, and Basil, Prudentius and Lactantius lit their torches in the midst of the surrounding darkness at the altars where still glowed the white flame of their genius. The Middle Ages worshiped at their shrine. The Renaissance paid them an almost idolatrous worship. In the days of Elizabeth and Anne and the Georges in England, under Louis XIV in France, when Charles V was Emperor in Germany and Spain, when Leo X and Gregory XIII were Popes, the world bowed to the classics' dominant sway. Towards the end of the seventeenth century and ever since, slowly and stubbornly other rivals tried to dispute their claims. But these old rulers had such a hold on their wide-spread kingdom that even now they have not been superseded and on the contrary are gaining new and more loyal champions every day. One of their claims is founded on long tenure of office. Long possession is in their favor.

The Original Teachers

THIS long tenure of office has also been beneficent and useful. The classics have laid the basis of our educational structure. The temple of literature was practically completed when these old masters passed away. Moderns have rounded off its proportions, added here and there to its exquisite beauty, placed in its niches and shrines some figures which may compare with those which elder hands had carved. But new lines, new types, new molds, have not been devised. The Greeks alone had brought to perfection every form of composition of which the modern world now boasts. We have practically added not a single one to the list which they left us. First of uninspired writers, the Greeks invented or perfected the drama, the satire, the elegy, the epic, the ode, the humorous and philosophical dialogue, the memoir, the epigram, the biography, the philosophy of history. They were the first to codify the laws of thought, to chart the currents and the tides of the soul. Aristotle delved into the recesses of the human heart. Longus gave us one of the first novels. The ground-plan of that educational temple of which we are so proud is the work of Greek genius. The Greeks and their imitators of Rome cleared the soil and surveyed it for us. We are tilling and building on the fields which they were the first to mark out. We cannot get away from that stern historical fact.

Inspiration from the Classics

THE foot-falls of these great masters echo everywhere in the temple of knowledge. Old Aristotle walks arm in arm with Thomas Aquinas in the cloisters of the University of Paris and whispers great secrets to the high-souled Mercier at Louvain, to Suarez in his Jesuit cell. Plutarch, in English dress, tells Shakespeare how Caesar died and Antony swayed the mob. Virgil becomes Dante's guide in the nether world, and the great Florentine is proud to hail the Mantuan bard as his master. Bossuet, like Alexander who slept with the Iliad under his pillow, ever has his Homer close at hand and, after the majesty of the Bible, knows no greater inspirer than the surge and the thunder of the Odyssey and the siege of Troy. Tasso and Camoens are at their best when they listen to the echoes of the singer of the Aeneid. The wit of Lucian flashes out in the caustic satire of Swift and the biting sarcasm of Voltaire. Milton drank deep at their crystal springs. The kindly humor of Horace echoes in the pages of Addison, the portrait sketches of Theophrastus glow again in the character sketches of La Bruyère. The impassioned eloquence of Demosthenes vibrates in the pages of Fox and Chatham. Newman confesses that he had only one master to teach him the secrets of his golden prose, Cicero, the most Roman of all Rome's sons. Those old masters were the guests of More and Erasmus at Chelsea, they came to the solitude of the Virginia hills and were the masters of Patrick Henry and Thomas Jefferson. If they inspired these lords of language and thought, we may well submit to their sceptred sway.

Contributors to Modern Civilization

MANY forces have contributed to the shaping and molding of modern civilization. Prominent among these forces, namely—the Hebrew, the Gracco-Roman, the Anglo-Saxon, the Gallo-Celtic in its manifold subdivisions and forms, the Graeco-Roman holds a peculiar position of honor. From the Hebrew we derive the story of the primitive revelation and the later through the Judaeo-Christian heirs of that revelation, a knowledge of the perfect manifestation of the Divinity, the Sacred Person of Our Lord. From the Anglo-Saxon we get our concept of modern liberty and democracy, though these are by no means the exclusive privilege of the Anglo-Saxon race, from the Gallo-Celtic, and from its cognate sources come the high idealism and the far-seeing spiritual outlook on men and things, Rome and Greece give the keen sense of proportion, mental equilibrium, serenely wise and balanced thought. We cannot understand modern civilization in its fullness if we do not understand the processes to which it owes its birth. These are to be found in the civilization of Athens and Rome. These have as their mouthpieces the great authors upon whose wisdom, the succeeding ages have been nurtured. It were folly to cut ourselves adrift from these influences and to ignore the pit from which we have been dug.

A great architect, Mr. Ralph Adams Cram, quoted in the Princeton volume (p. 333) says that without intelligent knowledge of the past, "as it has shown itself in its religion, its philosophy, its social organization and its art, it is impossible to interpret history, to comprehend the present or to determine the future." According to the same writer Greek and Latin are the languages of "the great epochs of vital civilization, Hellenic, Roman, medieval, and through them alone we come to the heart of the true culture that stands as an eternal reproach to our own barbarism." With Mr. Cram, we believe that the classics have no adequate substitute as educators, beyond them there is no equal revelation of eternal values. It were, to say the least, imprudent, and many would call it unwise and downright folly, to sell these old lamps which have lit the pathway of the noblest and the best down the archways of time, for the baubles and the trinkets which the unwary would substitute in their stead. "Through Greek and Latin," says Mr. Cram, "and through them only, can we come into actual personal contact with that great past, which is the only sound basis of enduring culture and righteous civilization."

SOCIOLOGY

May Poles and Amusements

THE doctrine, which the Eighth Harry first read in the eyes of Anne Boleyn, and afterwards bequeathed to the English nation, was almost as much hated as the Catholic Church, by a sect called "Puritan." The Established Church persecuted the sect, and many of them fled to Holland. In 1620, they petitioned, and received from James a grant to settle in the Colonies. In 1621 the Pilgrim Fathers landed on American soil, and founded the town of Plymouth. The name "Puritan" originally implied "purity from Rome." In the Puritan calendar all holidays, both of the Catholic and English Church were omitted. They kept Christmas, in a mild fashion, but he sinned grievously who ate mince-pie on that day. Amusement in any shape was anathema.

Another party of English emigrants landed a few years afterwards. Those did not hold Puritanism strictly, and consequently were forced to move farther up the coast to the present site of Boston. In 1625, when those "roysterers" set up a May pole, the Pilgrim Fathers sent an armed force which promptly cut down the May pole, and forced the whole party of lawbreakers to fly across the Blackstone into the wilderness. Then began a persecution of Catholics and Anglicans and every other sect by the fanatical Puritans, which lasted even beyond the Revolution. General Washington, in his time, publicly rebuked them for their "childish custom" of burning the Pope in effigy. The puritanical spirit did not die with the close of the Revolution. The Puritan rose again, and walked around, and through our nation, with his head as high as the heavens. He carried the ax of bigotry on his shoulder, and had an irresistible impulse to cut down every May pole, to destroy every vestige of Catholicism, for Catholics taught their children a wrong doctrine about God, and Catholics were loose in their morals. Their faces were not long enough.

Our Modern Puritan

THE soul of the man puritanically inclined is always troubled. Let him by mistake wander into a large room of a Catholic parochial school on some Sunday afternoon in May, as an entertainment is being held. Perhaps the first object of his vision is the May pole in the center of the stage; the second, an image of Our Lady near one corner of the same stage. The place is filled with anxious fathers and mothers. The Sister at the piano is playing softly. Suddenly a crowd of little tots rush on the stage from both sides, and circle around the pole. They break circle and form a line at the stage front. They fall back, they cross over, they sway from right to left, they march to time in the figure eight. They sing a song of May, bow, and gracefully retire. Another party of larger children come on, and though our visitor's heart is thumping his side with rage at the transgression which is perpetrated against God and man, yet he is forced to admire the rhythmical movements of those innocent children. But he crushes down his better self and allows the old man to have possession. He must remedy this terrible abuse.

On his way home, he must pass an Italian Catholic church. To his horror he sees a long line of boys and girls dressed as angels filing out of the church. It is a May procession, and his blood congeals as he sees a statue of the "Virgin" emerge, borne on the shoulders of four sturdy youths. Preceding and following the statue are little girls, acting as flower-bearers. Flowers are thrown to right and left as the procession moves on. And those are to march around several blocks of the city? It is too much for our Puritan friend; to him it is not only unlawful amusement, but idolatry. He is passing the ball-park. A game is in progress, and he recognizes several boys who should be at catechism in the neighboring Catholic church. In a moment, he takes in the whole situation. Catechism-class is over, and the boys have retired to the park to play ball: and Heaven bless the mark! the young curate is there, encouraging the boys in what our friend regards the most degrading of sins. He hurries on as if pursued by the spirit of retribution. He walks briskly across the park, crosses a creek, and close by the path, is camped a jolly crowd of young folks. The man recognizes sons and daughters of his Catholic neighbors, and draws the right conclusion. It is a crowd of Catholics having a kind of picnic on Sunday. In wild despair, he raises his suppliant hands towards heaven, and resolves to take a firmer stand against all who favor amusements of any kind.

The Biblical Warrant

NOW if our separated brother would reflect deeply on some Biblical passages with which he is quite familiar, he would, perhaps, be enlightened on three points. The first is that innocent amusement helps to dispel dangerous temptations, the second, that innocent amusement gives glory to God, and the third, that Our Lord not only did not condemn, but once took part in innocent amusement. Can our friend recall the passage, where "whensoever the evil spirit from the Lord was upon Saul, David took his harp and played with his hand, and Saul was refreshed, and was better, for the evil spirit departed from him?" Now, if the evil spirit came upon Saul on Sunday, or, in fact, on any other day, the remedy ought not to be applied, for it was a kind of innocent amusement and pastime for David and Saul. Thus, it would seem, we ought to yield to temptation rather than indulge in innocent amusement. Again, did David give glory to God when he marched with the Ark and seven choirs? when he danced with all his might before the Lord? "And David and all the house of Israel brought the Ark of the Covenant of the Lord with joyful shouting, and with sound of trumpet." It is true, that David's wife, Michol, on seeing him leaping and dancing, despised him in her heart. But David said, "Before the Lord who chose me rather than thy father, and than all his house, and commanded me to be ruler over the people of the Lord in Israel, I will both play and make myself meaner than I have done: and I will be little in my own eyes." We know that any one little in his own eyes gives glory to God.

At a marriage in Cana, too, were gathered many men and women, and we can justly suppose they were making merry. Our Blessed Lord with His Apostles was passing close to this place, and a messenger was dispatched to invite Him to the feast. Surely the Lord was not looking for amusement, and indeed would countenance no amusement that lay even within the shadow of the occasion of sin. Yet He accepted the invitation. The wedding festival that followed the ceremony of marriage was always in accordance with the means of the participating parties. Those people were evidently poor. Imagine Our Lord taking in the whole situation, yet listening to His Mother's suggestion, and resolving to contribute even through a miracle, to the happiness of the young people, and their guests. To do this, He had to use His Divine power for the first time; but by so doing, He sanctioned lawful amusement for all time.

NOTE AND COMMENT

War Insurance

THE United States Treasury Department announces that the war-insurance policies issued up to November 28 aggregated $1,032,938,000. General Pershing himself, thousands of officers and tens of thousands of men have already taken out such policies. Any man or woman, of whatever age, engaged in the active military or naval service of the United States, can obtain this Government insurance. The beneficiaries are limited to wife, husband, child, grandchild, brother or sister, stepbrother or stepsister, adopted brother or adopted sister of the insured, as well as parent, grandparent, or stepparent, either of the insured or of his or her consort. The cost for each thousand dollars of insurance is from sixty-five cents a month for persons at the age of twenty-one, to one dollar and twenty-five cents a month for those of the age of fifty-one. While this insurance is not compulsory, all eligible persons are urged to avail themselves of the opportunity offered them. The low cost and the secure protection assured will enable every soldier to provide for those dear to him.

The Ozanam Association

THOSE who have had the privilege of studying the activities of the Ozanam Association of New York City, have fully recognized the powerful influence it is exerting for the good of its members and for general civic usefulness. It has lately given a demonstration of intensely loyal patriotism. More than 500 members of the Association have enlisted in the country's service, a very remarkable figure, when it is taken into consideration that the clubs are composed for the most part of boys. The November number of the Ozanam Bulletin records on its "Honor Roll" the names of 275 Ozanam boys who have joined the United States army and navy, and adds the following modest comment:

> The Ozanam Association is justly proud of the splendid list on page 1 of the Bulletin. As we go to press word comes that nearly as many more as are shown there are entitled to the honor, having entered the service since the list was compiled. The principal cause of our gratification, however, lies in the fact that more than ninety-five per cent. of the number entered the service as volunteers. The country needed them and with no consideration of self they sprang to her support. We regret that space did not permit the recording of the branch of the service chosen by every boy. It can be stated, however, that every military activity now has an Ozanam representative, from aviation down.

In the same issue is reproduced a letter of commendation addressed to one of the clubs for its active share in taking the census by the Director of Military Census in New York City, M. E. P. Goodrich, in which he says:

> I am taking the first opportunity that has been afforded me to express my appreciation of the splendid work of your Association. You have been unusually efficient in the work and faithful to the trusts given to you. The reports indicate that you have registered 3,900 people, a truly remarkable showing for one organization . . . The thanks of the citizens of the city are due you for your unselfish devotion and cooperation, and as Director of the New York City works, I assure you of my heartfelt gratitude.

No better commentary could be desired on the work of the Association. Its worthy purpose is so well set forth in the Bulletin of the Association that it would be difficult to find a more worthy object of charity in New York City; and in other cities a more effective work of zeal than to institute and support the Ozanam Association.

Anti-Catholic Propaganda in the Allied Camp

CATHOLICS all over the world, writes a correspondent to the New York Evening Post, are disturbed at the injection of a definitely anti-Catholic propaganda into the already sufficiently confused war situation. With supreme indignation they behold the malicious grouping in the Allied press of "Anarchists, Socialists and Clericals" as alleged accomplices for the undoing of Italy.

> The feeling engendered by the existence of such a propaganda is not allayed by the disclosure of a secret treaty apparently binding the Allies in advance to a policy of ignoring any diplomatic move by the Pope in the direction of peace. It falls with sinister fidelity into tune with the almost unanimous charges in the press of the Entente nations, since the recent heartrending disaster to our gallant Italian ally, that the catastrophe was brought about by "Papal treachery."

The Pope's peace proposals, we are insolently told, have sown anarchy in the Italian armies. The fact, says the writer, was the very opposite. The existing unrest in the world called forth the peace note of the Pope instead of being caused by it. The elements of disruption that have brought ruin to Russia have long been active in all the nations of Europe. "The responsibility for the state of Italy rests with the same elements which are responsible for the state of Russia. In that responsibility the Pope has certainly no part." A further responsibility lies on those who rejected or ignored the Pope's peace proposals. These proposals, the correspondent adds, are as a mirrored image of President Wilson's own peace message.

> With one exception, the differences between these messages are differences not of principle but of detail. That exception is the incorporation by the Pope in his message in place of America's war aim—"to make the world safe for democracy"—an aim which the Pope stated thus: "First, the fundamental point must be that the material force of arms shall give way to the moral force of right."

The Catholic Church has done all in her power to combat the disruptive elements in Italy, as Cardinal Gasparri says in the dispatch from Rome, November 27, 1917:

> The Catholic Church has always regarded true patriotism as a Christian duty and a Christian virtue, and still so teaches. . . . When the disruptive propaganda began to affect the morale of the Italian army, the clergy in general and also the army chaplains, following the example of the chaplain-in-chief, labored to counteract it and to elevate the morale of the troops. More than once the army chaplains informed the chaplain-in-chief, who informed the supreme civil authorities, of the disruptive movement that was creeping in—and all that long before the publication of the Papal note.

This answer to the malicious slander is absolute and decisive. It is of course natural, as the correspondent of the Evening Post writes, that those who are to blame should endeavor to excuse themselves at the expense of some one else. But they are pursuing a short-sighted policy:

> May I point out the danger to the Allied cause of attempting to make a scapegoat of the Pope? Ignoring the millions of Catholics who have died for that cause, there are still millions of French, Irish, Italian, Belgian, Portuguese, and other Catholics fighting in the Allied armies. Secretary Baker places the Catholics now in the United States forces at over thirty per cent of the total forces. The whole of South America is Catholic. Three-fourths of the Catholic world lie outside of the Central Powers, and are mostly in active sympathy with our cause.

Toleration by the Allies of this slanderous campaign is a great delusion. "There can be no more disruptive element in the Allied camp than those who now traduce the Pope, for an insult to the Pope is an insult which every Catholic feels impelled to resent."

The Name "Catholic"

TO throw further light on the proper answer to the query, "'Catholic' or 'Roman Catholic'?" which is ably discussed by Father Hull in the current Catholic Mind, the Bombay Examiner takes the following extract from "an American contemporary," to show how firmly the term "Catholic" is embedded in general literature:

> There can be no possible misunderstanding when people speak of "Catholic Emancipation"; or when Tennyson in "Queen Mary" makes Elizabeth refer to Philip of Spain as "the proud Catholic prince"; or when Ruskin, in "Fors Clavigera," writes "concerning these Arabian Knights of Venice and the Catholic Church"; or when Leigh Hunt says in his autobiography that "Dante's heaven, is the sublimation of a Catholic church"; or when Carlyle says that "The ideas and feelings of man's moral nature have never found so perfect an expression in form as they found in the noble cathedrals of Catholicism"; or when Lecky, in his "Rationalism in Europe," says that "The Catholic reverence of the Virgin has done much to elevate and purify the ideal woman, and to soften the manners of men"; or when Hawthorne says, "I have always envied the Catholics their faith in that sweet, sacred Virgin Mother"; or when we say that Belgium is a Catholic country; or when Becherelle's Dictionary says that in French "the word 'Catholic' is used only in connection with the Church in communion with Rome"; or when the Turkish Government distinguishes between the Orthodox and the Catholics.
> "In a word, the world has fixed the use of the word 'Catholic' to suit itself and, as that use happens to be in accord with the true meaning, it is useless to attempt to change it." We may add that in colloquial speech, not less than in literary English, the term "Catholic" is used with the same exclusive application to the Church which is in communion with Rome. "Are you a Romanist?" asked the land agent of Mr. Dooley. "A which?" said he. "Are you a Roman Catholic?" "No, thank God, I'm a Chicago Catholic!" "'Tis the same thing," said the agent.

With the object, therefore, of teaching our non-Catholic fellow-citizens just what our name is, Catholics should avoid using the term, "Roman Catholic" and insist upon being called "Catholics" merely. It is not necessary to emphasize the Roman headship of our Church, for everybody is aware of it, and we should not accept from non-Catholics a name which was none of our making and which the Church does not use in her official formulas.

The War.—On the western front no fighting of a general character has taken place and no substantial gains has been registered on either side. In the various sectors held by the British continued raiding activities by the enemy and by Marshal Haig's troops were reported. Northeast of Hargicourt and east of Messines the enemy captured a few British outposts, but similar assaults northeast of Armentières and north of the Ypres-Menin road were fruitless, while southeast of Cambrai the British successfully repelled a series of violent attacks on their lines. In the neighborhood of the Ypres-Staden railway British outposts were driven in over a front of 700 yards. Considerable activity has also developed in Lorraine and Alsace. One of the most important of the local actions almost constantly going on in this territory occurred on the Lorraine front north of Roillon, west of Blamont, where heavy drives against the French positions were checked with serious losses to the enemy. In upper Alsace a German surprise attack at Gluskervald, southwest of Altkirch, was beaten off.

Bulletin, Dec. 17, p.m.-Dec. 24, a.m.

The situation on the northern Italian front has once more taken on a serious aspect. The continued Austro-German thrust southward between the Piave and the Brenta rivers resulted in the early part of the week in the capture of the vital position of Monte Asolone, west of Monte Grappa and halfway between Cismon and the hills of San Nazario. Monte Asolone is the last of the mountains higher than 4,000 feet at the head of the Brenta Valley, and from its summit the remainder of the Italian positions can be observed and shelled. The Italian defenses south of Asolone consist of a ridge of hills some seven miles across, but not more than 2,000 to 3,000 feet high. Should the enemy get his heavy guns in position on the crest and shoulders of Monte Asolone, these lower hills can be brought under practically continuous fire. Four miles below the ridge lies the town of Bassano, at the head of the Venetian plains, the evident objective of the invader, who is trying to reach them before the heavier snows of winter set in. Realizing the danger the Italians delivered a series of fierce counterattacks on the positions wrested from them on the Asolone. Berlin claims that these were repulsed. Rome states that some of the ground has been won back.

On the Saloniki front, General Sarrail has been superseded in the command of the Allied forces by General Guillemet. In Palestine General Allenby has strengthened his hold upon Jerusalem by the capture of commanding positions around the Holy City. Reports of Dec. 23 state that on Dec. 21 the British, crossing the Nahr-el-Auja four miles north of Jaffa seized Khurbet, Hadrah, Sheik Muhannis, Teer-Rekket and El Nakhras. Early in the week Sir Eric Geddes, First Lord of the Admiralty, announced that one British and five neutral merchantmen, a British destroyer and five armed trawlers had been sunk some time previous in the North Sea by German raiders. One of the two British destroyers convoying the merchantmen—the Partridge—was sunk, the other was damaged but succeeded in reaching port. The total tonnage of the merchant ships lost, which were on their way from Scotland to Norway, was 8,000. The American submarine F-i was rammed by the F-r in home waters and sunk, nineteen of the crew being lost.

Nation-wide Prohibition

By a vote of 282 to 128 the House of Representatives on December 17 adopted a resolution proposing an amendment to the Federal Constitution prohibiting liquor traffic in the nation. As the resolution which passed the Senate in August was slightly amended before being brought before the House, it went back to the Senate for concurrence. On the following day the Senate passed the resolution by a vote of 47 to 8. Immediately it was sent to the Secretary of State, who will notify the Secretaries of the various States of its adoption. As concurred in by the Senate the resolution was changed from the form in which the Senate adopted it last summer, when the time allowed for the necessary ratification by three-fourths of the States to make it operative was fixed at six years. In the resolution just adopted by the House and concurred in by the Senate, the time-limit is extended to seven years. Senator Borah, of Idaho, raised the question of the constitutionality of the resolution owing to the fixing of a time-limit to the ratification. He maintained that Congress had no right to fix such a time. An amendment offered in the House by Representative Lea, of California, providing that the prohibition should not apply to light wines and beer was rejected by a rising vote of 232 to 107. The resolution adopted by the Senate and House is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each house concurring therein), That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the Senate, to become valid as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the Legislatures of the several States as provided by the Constitution:

Section 1. After one year from the ratification of this article, the manufacture, sale or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

Section 2. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Section 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the Legislatures of the several States as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress.

Leaders of the prohibition forces claim that the amendment will be accepted by the State legislatures. Mr. William J. Bryan, who has long supported the measure, predicted that the nation would be dry in three years and that the liquor question would not figure in the national election of 1920. Twenty-eight States already have prohibition or have laws making their territory dry. If these States and eight others adopt the proposed amendment in the seven years allowed for State action, the manufacture, sale and importation of liquor in the United States will be prohibited.

The Luxburg Plot

On December 20 additional revelations of German intrigue in Argentina were made by Secretary of State Lansing when he made public from the secret archives of the State Department another "sheaf" of the telegrams of Count von Luxburg, former German Chargé d'Affaires in Argentina. A careful examination of the thirty-eight telegrams given to the press by the Secretary of State shows that Count von Luxburg and the Berlin Foreign Office officials considered President Hippolyte Irigoyen of Argentina as their friend; that they counted upon him to support Germany against the United States; that they were expecting him to organize a counter-movement among South American nations, especially Chile and Bolivia, against the United States, and that the Count and the Berlin Government were enabled to settle the submarine controversy with Buenos Ayres by a secret agreement on the basis that the German Government would agree to spare Argentine ships from attacks by German submarines, and that President Irigoyen would promise to prevent Argentine ships from proceeding to the submarine blockade area, although at the very time of this secret agreement Germany was sinking the ships of other neutrals, such as Norway, Sweden, Holland, Denmark and Spain. Every effort was made on the part of German officials to keep this last agreement secret, Germany being afraid that if other neutrals should learn of this agreement to spare Argentine ships, they would insist upon a similar favored treatment, and this would be a blow to submarine warfare if it should force Germany to restrict her sinkings to the merchant vessels of belligerents only.

As a result of the publication of the telegrams given to the Press of Buenos Ayres at the same time they were made known in Washington great indignation was manifested against von Luxburg and his accomplices, as it was felt that the telegrams gave a false idea of Argentine's position towards the United States. It is possible that Argentine may declare war against Germany.

The German Peace-Feeler

Another German peace-feeler is being circulated in Washington. This "feeler" is said to have been received through neutral diplomatic channels and purports to state in a general way the terms on which the German Government would be willing to make peace. No official confirmation of these terms has been obtained. Their substance is as follows:

The future of Alsace-Lorraine to be settled through a plebiscite of its inhabitants; Germany to be remunerated for her lost African colonies, and the money to be devoted to the rehabilitation of Belgium, Serbia, Rumania and northern France; Russian occupied provinces to become independent; Poland to become an independent State, so-called, under Austrian suzerainty; a peace conference to deal with questions of disarmament, freedom of the seas and similar international matters; Turkey to remain intact; Rumania, Serbia and Montenegro to recover their original boundaries, with right of egress to the sea for Serbia.

These terms differ slightly from the "peace-feeler" circulated through neutral diplomatic channels last August in Washington. Then Germany's terms were reputed to be:

Restoration of Belgium and northern France, to be paid for out of the sale of Germany's colonies to Great Britain; Alsace-Lorraine to be independent States; Trieste to be a free port; Serbia and Rumania to be restored and Serbia to have a port on the Adriatic; the Balkan question and the status of Turkey to be subjects for negotiation; disarmament and international police; freedom of the seas with Great Britain in control of the English Channel until the projected tunnel is built between Dover and Calais.

From what can be gathered at Washington it is unlikely that the Government will consider peace at the present time. The Berliner Zeitung reports that Emperor William contemplates assembling the sovereigns of Europe in a peace conference, as was done after the Napoleonic wars.

Canada.—The Unionist Government of Sir Robert Borden has been returned to power and conscription upheld in the recent elections. Out of a total number of seats in Parliament of 235, the results indicate that the Unionist Government can claim a majority of at least 48. The Borden Government carried six and the Laurier Opposition carried three of the nine Canadian Provinces. Sir Robert Borden carried New Brunswick, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Nova Scotia, Quebec and

The Unionist Victory

Prince Edward's Island. The issue before the people was conscription. The English-speaking sections of the country voted solidly for it, French-speaking Canada as solidly against it. Of the 65 members whom the Province of Quebec sends to Parliament, 62 Liberals were elected with majorities in each case running into the thousands. Only in three English-speaking ridings of Montreal were Unionist members returned for the whole Province of Quebec. Ontario elects 82 members and is returning over 70 for the Unionist Government. Canada west of the great lakes shows an almost unbroken Unionist sentiment. The four Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia jointly return 56 members. Of that number not more than two, at most three, supporters of Sir Wilfrid Laurier have been elected. All the Cabinet Ministers are elected with the exception of two French-speaking Ministers from Quebec. These are Albert Sevigny, Secretary of State, and P. E. Blondin, Postmaster-General, now at the front with the French Canadians. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was beaten in the city of Ottawa by 500, but was elected for a Quebec City seat by almost 2,000 majority.

Ireland.—At the beginning of Advent Cardinal Logue issued the following very significant letter on the war and conditions in Ireland:

Cardinal Logue and The Republic

Rev. Dear Father: The misery and suffering which this lamentable war entails not only on belligerents, but on neutral countries, has given rise to a widespread and earnest longing for peace. Yet, as far as human action is concerned and human judgment can forecast, there is little hope of peace in the near future. The ruinous conflict still goes on, with the sacrifice of young lives by tens of thousands, a waste of treasure which will cripple the countries engaged for generations, an ever-growing accumulation of present and future evil consequences, and all this with very little tangible result. The pendulum keeps swinging, from side to side, with no decided leaning to either.

Moved by this unavailing sacrifice of human life and the sufferings of multitudes so dear to his paternal heart, the Sovereign Pontiff made a disinterested and authoritative appeal, such as his neutrality and position justified, to the belligerent Powers. This appeal, where not misrepresented or coldly received, has hitherto had no practical effect. Some, at least, who have treated it with scant courtesy, have since been given reason to reconsider their view of its importance for their own best interests. Since the rage, the pride, jealousies, ambitions and conflicting interests of men leave little grounds to hope for an early peace, it is meet that we should have recourse to Almighty God, in whose hands are the destinies of men, and who can direct their ways and inspire their counsels. We must endeavor, by purifying our motives and desires, to render ourselves more worthy of His favor. Then we may hope, by fervent, persevering prayer, to move His mercy and obtain the blessing, which we so sadly need, of a just and lasting peace. Knowing that we cannot appeal more effectually to the Sacred Heart of our Divine Lord than through the intercession of His Blessed Mother, we should endeavor to enlist the powerful aid of this Queen of Peace in moving Almighty God to mercifully grant our petition.

Nor is it for the general peace of the world only that we should sue. We have troubles and unrest and excitement and dangers here at home, which render domestic peace necessary. Whether it be due to the demoralization which this world-war has brought to almost every country, or to the fate which seems to hang over our own unhappy country, blasting her hopes when they seemed to brighten, an agitation has sprung up and is spreading among our people which, ill-considered and utopian, cannot fail, if persevered in, to entail present suffering, disorganization and danger, and is sure to end in future disaster, defeat and collapse. And all this in pursuit of a dream which no man in his sober senses can hope to see realized: the establishment of an Irish republic, either by an appeal to the potentates of Europe seated at a Peace Conference or an appeal to force by hurling an unarmed people against an empire which has five millions of men under arms, furnished with the most terrible engines of destruction which human ingenuity could devise. The thing would be ludicrous if it were not so mischievous and fraught with such danger, when cleverly used as an incentive to fire the imaginations of an ardent, generous, patriotic people.

We have, therefore, need of peace; peace among the warring nations which will bring relief to so many suffering peoples; peace at home, which will enable us to unite quietly, prudently and perseveringly, in consulting for the best interests of our common country. If men by their designs, their conflicting interests, their mistaken views, stand in the way of this blessing of peace, we should have recourse to the Prince of Peace, beseeching Him, through the intercession of His Blessed Mother, to grant us both general and domestic peace; above all, to grant us that peace which surpasseth all understanding: peace with God, peace with ourselves, and peace with our neighbor.

On November 30 Mr. de Valera visited Roscommon and in answer to a question about the pastoral letter said: "I decline to assume the office of judge in regard to opinions which his Eminence has considered expedient to communicate to the clergy and laity of his diocese." In the speech which he delivered on this occasion the Sinn Fein leader laid down the Catholic doctrine on the origin of authority and the forms of government and in the end quoted these words of Leo XIII:

> Neither does the Church condemn those who, if it can be done without violation of justice, wish to make their country independent of any foreign or despotic power. Nor does she blame those who wish to assign to the State the power of self-government. The natural law enjoins us to love devotedly and to defend the country in which we had birth, and in which we were brought up, so that every good citizen hesitates not to face death for his native land.

This passage was no doubt quoted in explanation and justification of the policy of Sinn Fein.

Rome.—The device adopted by Benedict XV, "Misereor super turbam," "I have compassion on the multitude," seems to have been providentially adopted,

The Pope's Active Impartiality

for it sums up in a most expressive way the loving-kindness which has characterized since his election the efforts of the Father of Christendom. Apart from his unavailing endeavors to stop the carnage of the war, he has interested himself in suffering humanity without distinction of creed or nation. Some of the evidences of his all-embracing charity have been recorded by the Bulletin de L'Alliance Française, in a recent issue, which quotes from the circular letter sent by Cardinal Gasparri to the bishops, pointing out the desire of the Supreme Pontiff "that no distinction of religion or race or language should be made among prisoners."

In behalf of the Armenians the Holy Father made representations at the court of Constantinople, and it was no fault of his if the Turks gave only illusory promises. His letter to the American Jewish Committee of New York on the subject of antisemitic violence protested vigorously that

> The natural law should be observed and respected no less in the case of the children of Israel than in the case of the rest of men, for to fail in its observance on the sole ground of diversity of religious profession would be contrary both to justice and religion.

The gratitude of the Jews is a matter of common remembrance. His munificence towards France as a nation and not merely to French Catholics is well known, for he has given generously out of his resources, slender at best and much reduced at present. Retaining communications with the belligerent nations, Pope Benedict obtained protection, to a degree that perhaps will never be known, for the victims of the war in all parts of the world. Many of those condemned to death, especially in Belgium, owe their lives to his intercession; for others he obtained a mitigation of their sentence.

One of the most striking of his services has been his efforts to obtain information concerning the "missing." With this purpose in view he established a new office at Rome with Mgr. Tedeschini at its head, whose work it is to make inquiries concerning prisoners of all nations. By his encouragement a similar bureau was established at Paderborn under the care of Mgr. Schulte; another was set up at Fribourg in Switzerland under the direction of the Mission Catholique, and a fourth at Vienna. Through his efforts precious details were forwarded to those whom it concerned of those of the Allies who were engaged in action in Belgium during the first campaign of the war. Lists of the dead, and wounded, last messages, information as to the place of burial, and in some cases plans of the cemeteries with means of identifying graves, were sent to the Red Cross at Geneva and to the Government of France.

At his request names of the missing were published in the camps in Germany and France, and by this means many of both sides, whose fate had hitherto been shrouded in obscurity, were discovered and the anxiety of their families removed. Through the instrumentality of the Catholic bishops in Bulgaria he obtained lists of prisoners taken during the retreat of the Vardar. In Turkey he instructed Mgr. Dolci, Vicar Apostolic to Constantinople, to visit the camps where the soldiers of the Allies, lost at the Dardanelles and elsewhere, were detained, to give them material and moral assistance; and to learn their names. He likewise obtained from the Turkish Government protection and care for the graves of the soldiers of the Allies who fell at Gallipoli.

These are some of the details which indicate that the Holy Father, while preserving the strictest neutrality, has taken the first place in those beneficent offices of charity which have marked all the neutral nations. He has had compassion large enough for all peoples, and has never been betrayed into identifying neutrality with indifference. His impartiality has been ceaselessly active in every phase of charitable assistance.

Russia.—From reports supplied on December 16 by the Bolsheviki, it appears that out of 237 Delegates to the Constituent Assembly 85 are Bolsheviki, 115 Social Revolutionists and 10 Constitutional Democrats, the rest belonging to other parties. Though 80 Delegates were then at Petrograd, no attempt was made to hold meetings. Trotsky proclaimed a merciless warfare against the Constitutional Democrats, and the Bolshevik Delegates, on an order from the Government, left Petrograd, and 150 Ukranian Delegates held a session at Kiev.

Factional Chaos

On December 16 Lenine's decree abolishing all military titles and distinctions went into effect. Hereafter officers are to be elected by the soldiers, and the rejected officers become privates with a corresponding reduction in salary. It is said that at the front colonels and their orderlies have been made to exchange functions.

Moreover the Bolsheviki have suppressed all the law courts of Petrograd, substituting for them new revolutionary tribunals and Trotsky has issued a decree dismissing all Russian ambassadors and their staffs because they ignored the Bolshevik decree ordering them to denounce the Kerensky Government. The Bolsheviki are reported to be gaining ground steadily because they represent the iron hand and it is dangerous to oppose them. The fact that thousands of bodies of those who came to a violent death were removed from the canals and rivers of Petrograd the week of December 2 is very significant. Force is the only law in Russia now and the revolutionists are sternly using it. The Bolsheviki have decreed the confiscation of all church property, lands, money, plate and jewels, and the abolition of religious instruction in the schools.

Dispatches dated December 16 announced that the Bolshevik troops in Odessa attacked the arsenal where the Ukrainian Rada was gathered, but they were driven off and defeated. It appears that the Bolshevik forces at Kiev were overcome and disarmed, large quantities of their guns and ammunition being seized. The Ukraine refuses to recognize the Bolshevik Government. On December 19 Petrograd was declared in a state of siege by the Executive Council of the Workmen's and Soldiers' Delegates. Great disorder prevailed owing to the looting of wine-cellars, shops and restaurants. On December 19 the fighting in the Odessa region between the Ukrainians and Bolsheviki was reported to be increasing in severity and the ruling body of Odessa and the Bolshevik Government were exchanging ultimatums.

Civil War Continues

The Basis of Durable Industrial Peace

EDWIN V. O'HARA, LL.D.

IN the midst of the world-war, statesmen are engaged in outlining the basis of durable peace, a peace which will not be provocative of yet other wars. But every war has created more problems than it has settled and the present one will be no exception to the rule. Granted that statesmen will find the formula for an abiding peace among nations, it will be seen when the smoke clears away that other problems of scarcely less magnitude press sorely for solution. Among these the premier will be the unrest of the proletariat, which at the beginning of the war was already flamed with evil portent, and which, by the action of the solvent forces of the present international struggle will be found at the close of hostilities to be volcanic. Social students and especially those guided by the Catholic Church may well be occupied with the conditions of durable industrial peace, which is just as important for the spread of God's kingdom as peace among nations.

The first condition of durable peace among the dispossessed multitude will be such a share of the product of industry, such an income from their labor as will permit them the chief elements of a human, not to say a Christian, existence. The demand that men shall have a sufficiency for suitable housing, comfortable clothing and nourishing food is no mere echo of Socialistic clamor. It is their right as children of God; for without these things they cannot ordinarily lead normal lives, rear healthy children, improve their minds, practise their religious duties and fulfil the destiny for which God has created them. Such sufficiency of material goods is normally required for the reasonable development of the human person, a development to which God's designs subordinate the earth and everything on the surface thereof.

Many readers will regard this statement as a truism as to its content, but as pitched in too high a key in view of the fairly good conditions of the laboring class in America, especially when their lot is compared with that of the proletariat in Europe. Let us see. At the outset we may remark that the almost complete cessation of immigration from England, France and Germany during recent years would indicate that the working people of those industrial countries did not find American conditions notably better than conditions at home. But it is small comfort to be better than that which is conceded to be dismally bad. What are the conditions of the laboring class in America?

As to possessions: At the outbreak of the war the situation was full of danger. According to a widely accepted authority, 2 per cent of the people in the United States owned 60 per cent of the wealth; 33 per cent of the people—the middle class—owned 35 per cent of the wealth. The remaining 65 per cent of the people—the laboring class—owned 5 per cent of the wealth. We know that war-time production has sharply accentuated this dangerous concentration of wealth and has still further reduced the holdings of the many.

As to income: Before the war, between a fourth and a third of the men employed in factories and mines received less than $10.00 a week and from two-thirds to three-fourths of them received less than $15.00 a week. To compute the annual income of these men it will be necessary to discount the annual wage-rate by about 20 per cent for unemployment. The Immigration Commission which reported in 1909 studied the incomes of nearly 16,000 families, the members of which were engaged in manufacturing and mining industries. The incomes of 64 per cent of these families were below $750.00 a year, and the incomes of 31 per cent were below $500.00 a year. The families averaged 5.6 members each. For a family of such size between $700.00 and $750.00 a year was conceded by all investigators to be the minimum of decent subsistence. Thus more than one-half of the families were below the standard of decent subsistence and nearly a third were in abject poverty. How far had we fallen from the "American standard" according to which the family should be supported by the income of the father!

Eight million women are industrially employed in America. Upwards of two-thirds of the women in industrial occupations received less than $8.00 a week, the very minimum of decent subsistence anywhere in the United States before the war. Nearly one-half of them received less than $6.00 a week. About one-fourth of these women were "adrift" from home and were entirely self-supporting; and 90 per cent of those at home contributed largely to the support of aged parents or other dependents by turning in their earnings to the family purse.

The position of the laborer has rapidly become worse with the increase of cost of living in the past few years. It will be said that wages have increased since the beginning of the war. So they have; but not in proportion to the increase in cost of the necessities of life. Few things emphasize more strongly the difference between labor and other commodities than their respective responses to the increased supply of gold. The price of all commodities except labor began to soar with the importation of gold, and described a curve exactly parallel with the curve which indicated the extent of gold shipments to New York, lagging behind the increased gold supply by two months. On the other hand, such rise in wages as occurred, has, except in a comparatively few occupations, been the result of actual or threatened strikes. All over the country organized labor has been in the throes of conflict and has but in few instances secured a rise in wages proportionate to the general rise in the cost of living. And unorganized labor is for the most part relatively much worse off than five years ago, for its wages have hardly increased perceptibly.

Another feature of low wages is worth considering. An investigation by the Federal Children's Bureau showed that the babies whose fathers received less than $10.00 a week died during the first year at the rate of 256 for every thousand; whereas babies whose fathers received $25.00 a week died at the vastly lesser rate of 84 for every thousand. We have already noted that one-third of the men workers get less than $10.00 a week.

The condition of working classes was accurately described by Leo XIII, in his famous Encyclical, "Rerum Novarum," wherein the illustrious Pontiff remarks that "The concentration of so many branches of trade in the hands of a few individuals has brought it to pass that a small number of very rich men have been able to lay upon the teeming masses of the laboring poor a yoke little better than that of slavery itself." And not content with pointing out the evil, Pope Leo demanded that "Some remedy must be found, and found quickly, for the misery and wretchedness pressing so heavily and unjustly at this moment on the vast majority of the working class."

What is the remedy? Shall it be sought in an enlightened conscience among employers? To a very limited extent. For the prevailing type of industrial organization is the corporation, in which the stockholders and board of directors know nothing and care nothing about the conditions of labor in the establishments from which their income is derived, for distance, it is said, disinfects dividends. Moreover the executive officials cannot let their personal humane feelings affect the question, for everything is controlled by the inexorable demand for interest and dividends. The remedy will be found very slightly indeed in the enlightened conscience of the employer.

Will the remedy be found in labor organization? Partly. Labor unions have been a powerful influence in improving the status especially of skilled labor. Unfortunately less than 8 per cent of wage-earners in this country are members of organized labor—only about 2,000,000 out of 27,000,000. There seems little reason to hope that the unskilled masses of labor can soon be brought into effective organization.

It remains for the State to intervene and by the exercise of its authority to prohibit the violation of that "dictate of natural justice" which Leo XIII declared to be "more imperious and more ancient than any bargain between man and man, namely that the remuneration ought to be sufficient to maintain the wage-earner in reasonable and frugal comfort—sufficient to maintain himself, his wife and his children in reasonable comfort." Minimum-wage legislation does not involve the fixing of wages by the State. It involves only the prohibition by law of unreasonably low wages. A housing code does not tell us how many rooms we shall have in our houses; it simply prohibits dwellings unfit for human habitation.

In the midst of the present labor unrest there is no proposal to the advancement of which Catholic students of social-economics can devote themselves with more benefit to the laboring man and with more credit to their religion than the movement for the payment of a living wage. To secure to the laborer a sufficiency whereby he may live as befits the dignity of a human being is a religious duty. It will lay the cornerstone in the temple of durable industrial peace.

The Washington Masonic Memorial

MICHAEL KENNY, S.J.

"WASHINGTON, First of America's Masonic Presidents," is the title of the leading article in the October New Age Magazine, organ of the Thirty-third Degree Scottish Rite; and an editorial acclaims it a complete refutation of "Jesuit writers who assert that although Washington did join the Masonic fraternity in his youth: yet as a full-grown and experienced man he took no particular interest therein. We have the goods on them in this particular also, but they don't know it." The reference is evidently to AMERICA's refutation of the Masonic claim, apropos of the projected Masonic monument to Washington in Alexandria, Va., that the First President was Master and Founder of the lodge erected there in 1788. The article cited Washington's own evidence in 1798 of his thirty years' absence from the lodge, and his denunciation of

"the diabolical tenets" and "pernicious principles" which were even then inoculating American Masonry. The American Freemason, whose editor displays a candor and capacity unusual among writers of the craft, promptly advised the abandonment of the project, asserting that Washington had done less for Masonry than Masonry had done for him.

The Blue Lodge exponent supposed that the costly monument was intended to honor Washington; but the crafty Scottish Rite had quite another purpose. They were already strongly entrenched in the capital. Their numerous lodges are conspicuous by their sign and symbols through its streets and avenues, and they have not only a large Masonic representation in national officialdom, but in every Government department they have erected a separate Masonic club to keep a watchful eye and directive hand on the inmost executive and diplomatic activities of the Republic. When the dangerous evils of this organized clubbing, in the heart centers of our national Government, under the direction of a secret extra-legal government whose "edicts must be respected and obeyed without examination," were exposed in AMERICA for August 24, 1914, the American Freemason deprecated the institution or continuance of such procedure. But Scottish Rite chiefs, less ingenuous than the Blue Lodge magnate, are not disposed to let such things as historical facts or the spirit and letter of the Constitution interfere with their fixed designs. They have since continued to strive to fix in every Government department their separate oath-bound Masonic clubs, thus enlarging the relative influence and members of Masonic officials and multiplying their facilities to glean and co-ordinate information useful to the rulers of the Craft; and they boldly advertise the meetings of these organized Masonic officials in departments set up and maintained by the votes and taxes of all citizens alike.

Their control of the seat of power, or at least the unhampered working of their well-oiled machinery, has not satisfied Masonic ambition. "Masonry is the religion of symbolism," and their power in the nation's capital must have a symbol. George Washington was and is "first in the hearts of his countrymen," and shall so remain. He is "woven forever into the fabric of American institutions, and the nation is what it is because of what he was." Hence a monster Masonic memorial at Alexandria, raising to the skies its stately dome within view of the capital and strikingly impressive from its points of vantage, would imprint the importance and power of Masonry on citizens, legislators, and the myriad pilgrims from State and Territory, who would hardly search Washington's writings to learn his slight connection with Masonry that was, and his resolute hostility to Masonry that is. Meanwhile the figment of his Masonic zeal will spur the craft to swell the proposed $667,220 Memorial fund.

Therefore the renewed attempt to prove Washington "an enthusiastic Mason, gladly mingling with the brethren at the lodge or elsewhere and ever deeply in earnest about his Masonic connections." The only facts submitted to prove him a Mason of any sort are those already stated in AMERICA, namely, that he entered the Fredericksburg, Va., lodge in 1752, when he was twenty, and became a Master or Fourth Degree Mason in 1753. But thereafter there is a big Masonic gap. The next craft record of this "enthusiastic Mason" is dated June 24, 1779, twenty-five years after his admission to Fourth Degree; and it merely states that the American Union lodge presented him with a public address and cheered him on his departure, procedures not peculiar to Masons during Washington's public career. The minutes of the same lodge, December 27, 1779, are said to include the item: "Visitors present—Bros. Washington, etc." This is the only instance cited of Washington having set foot in a lodge since he was twenty-one. The New Age writer's failure to find another in the Masonic records of forty-six years is striking confirmation of Washington's own statement in 1798 that he had not been in a lodge "more than once or twice in thirty years."

The remaining records consist of formal replies made by Washington to public Masonic addresses, a courtesy he was wont to extend to all groups of citizens. Only two of these are included in the twelve volumes of Sparks' exhaustive collection, and neither entry nor address nor other item states or hints that he ever set foot in the lodge of Alexandria; though Brother Clegg labors deftly to leave that impression, for which he presents not a tittle of evidence. He shows that "Brother Washington" was invited, with others, to open that lodge in 1788, but he fails to record that Washington replied, or accepted, or that, though it was but a few miles from his home, he was even once present at its meetings. To divert attention from this striking proof of his lack of interest in Masonry Brother Clegg immediately adds that "He accepted the position of Master and was also urged to hold the position of General Grand Master," thus leaving the guileless reader to infer that acceptance and offer took place in Alexandria, and in 1788. Yet the writer knew that Washington's only acceptance of Mastership was in 1753, and that the offer of Grand Mastership of Virginia was made in 1771, and that Washington declined it. This entry would have enabled Brother Clegg to narrow the twenty-five years' gap in Washington's Masonic connections, but he fails to avail himself of it. It would dissolve rather than solidify his airy figment that Washington "was an enthusiastic Mason gladly mingling with the brethren at lodge."

In fact, all the records this specious propagandist could scrape together in a four years' hunt make it manifest to the observant reader not only that Washington as President never attended a lodge, but that his own affirmation of thirty years' abstention was an under-statement, the scant entries extending his period of one or lonely island in the Tiber, or even hastened their death by intentional maltreatment. In Rome when a slave had killed his master, it was the custom that all his slaves should be put to death. The barbarous custom prevailed when, as Tacitus tells us, after the Prefect of the City, Pedanius Secundus, had been murdered by one of his slaves, the 400 slaves of the murdered official were all put to death in spite of their proved innocence and the cries for mercy which arose on all sides in their behalf. The treachery and cruelty practised by the Spartans on their helots, the organized slave-hunts which they turned loose upon their victims, put to shame the horrors of the African slave-trade, and are a foul stigma on the race and the civilization which practised them.

In the second century before Christ, the island of Delos was the center of the slave-trade. Strabo states that as many as 10,000 might be sold there in a day. Rome of course soon became the headquarters of the infamous traffic and though it is almost impossible to form an estimate of the actual number of slaves at any one time, specific instances may give us an insight into the extent of the evil. Aemilius Paulus, one of the most humane of the Roman conquerors, after his victory over Perseus and the overthrow of the Macedonian empire at Pydna, acting under the orders of the Senate, sold 150,000 captives into bondage. Marius after defeating the Cimbri and Teutones is said to have sold the same number, and though the figures are open to suspicion, it is undeniable that they amounted to the thousands. Cæsar was not, as Roman soldiers go, a cruel man. Yet in the second book of his "War in Gaul," he tells us without a tremor to mar the perfection of his splendid prose, that after the defeat of the Aduatuci, he sold 53,000 prisoners. Pliny informs us that although Caecilius Claudius had lost a great portion of his estates, he left at his death over 4,000 slaves. Some individuals, though evidently the cases were exceptional, possessed as many as 20,000.

For all these suffering thousands, not a word of compassion or sympathy from the poets, orators or statesmen of Rome! Surely the exploitation of man by man had reached its acme. It was not only a fact recognized as fitting by the laws, it was a whole philosophical and economic system. It was the very morality of paganism. But it was a morality and a system which while having the most disastrous results on the economic welfare of the State by its degradation of labor, had the most pernicious results on the character of the slave and the master; on the character of slave, for while his body was being tortured, his conscience was too often, so to say, destroyed. If liberty for him meant nothing, if family, husband, children, wife were idle words, so too were the words virtue, honesty, chastity, purity. He had but one duty, to obey his master. We are told in a comedy of Plautus, who has drawn a perfect picture of slave-life in Rome, that whatever the master commands, is right. The frightful consequences of such a tyranny are too easy to understand. The slave was robbed of his right to think, his honor, his very soul. The system degraded the master also. That degradation can be summed up in a single sentence. It paralyzed the moral sense of the slave-owner. When a man has an absolute right of life and death over his fellows, when he sees them ready to do his bidding, right or wrong, cringing and fawning before him under fear of the lash, it hardens the heart it makes men irresponsible, proud, selfish and cruel. When men no longer treat men as men, but as chattels things, they lose the sense of their own manhood and degrade themselves to the level of the beast. It was the very thing that happened in pagan times. The gyves were fastened heavily indeed on the master and the slave. Rome and paganism were helpless to stem the evil. Only the Divine hands of Him who has ever compassion on the suffering multitude could break the galling chain. And so it was broken, as we shall see.

Our Brothers' Keepers

RICHARD A. MUTTKOWSKI, Ph.D.

AMONG the so-called preliminary campaigns following the entrance of the United States into the great war the Liberty Loan and Red Cross campaigns proved tremendous successes. Following them the appeals of the Knights of Columbus and of the Young Men's Christian Association for the "war-camps" have received a generous response. Yet while the purpose of the two prior campaigns was well understood, some misapprehensions exist as to the status of the war-camps, this oddly enough despite the publicity which accompanied the President's approval of the camps. One of the misapprehensions is that the camps are military in purpose. The answer is simple enough: the camps are for military men, but aim to provide recreation and to look after the general welfare of the troops. Yet this single misunderstanding has, to my certain knowledge, caused many to withhold or stint their donations, more so among Y. M. C. A. contributors than among Catholics.

A second misapprehension, purely Catholic in bearing and prompted perhaps by fraternal envy, is that the Knights of Columbus will use the work in the camps to further their own interests as an organization. President Wilson has made clear that the Knights of Columbus were selected because they form a representative body of Catholics, and secondly because social welfare-work is one of the specialties of the Order. Let me state this clearly: It was not intended to entrust our young men to Catholics belonging to a specific organization, but to a Catholic organization representing the Catholics of the United States. The distinction is apparent to him who will see. It is obvious that only an organization which is prominent numerically, and whose work is along recreational lines could be considered. The objection is invalid and it is so regarded by those who offer it, for it is usually coupled with a "racial" argument to lend it force, apparently with the idea that two weak arguments, like a blind man being led by a cripple, may support each other and give a semblance of strength. It is sufficient to note that the camps are not intended for fraternal, nor for racial, specifically "Irish," aggrandizement. The objection is silly, a weak excuse to evade contribution.

A third misapprehension is that the camps are solely a Knights of Columbus enterprise, financed entirely by Knights of Columbus, and destined to benefit Knights of Columbus only. Such restrictions would be fatal, and are not entertained for one moment. As announced by the Knights of Columbus leaders, the K. C. camps include all Catholic men, primarily, and in addition all non-Catholics who care to take interest. All Catholics are to be served, whether Knights or not. Now, it is not meet that 400,000 Knights of Columbus should carry a financial burden which properly should be apportioned to 4,000,000 Catholic men, and therefore contributions are asked from all Catholics. Many of the laity, particularly a few persons prominent in rival fraternal circles, have been loath to contribute, because the cause of another Order seems to be advanced. I also regret to say that not a few priests have failed to support the work as it deserves.

"But why should there be camps, particularly Catholic camps?" is a rather naïve question heard more frequently than one expects. It should hardly seem necessary to emphasize the need of welfare-work among our soldiers if they are to be kept mentally, morally, and physically at their best. Arduous drill and routine duties cannot fill all hours of the day. Recreation must be and unless lawful opportunity for it is provided in the camps it will be sought elsewhere, and then of the illicit type.

"But why Catholic camps?" One may as well ask "Why Catholic schools, or churches?" "Why Catholic societies? Why Catholic publications?" The question indicates a woful lack of thought. The prevailing anti-Catholic activities will not cease in the camps and cantonments. Prejudice, intolerance, and animosity will receive merely a military background, and will be as pronounced as elsewhere, or perhaps even accentuated. It is possible, indeed almost certain, that the exercise of religious duties will at times be interfered with under the plea of military exigencies. But since facts are convincing, let me give facts. I quote from the letter of a valued clerical friend:

> One Sunday, S—— B——, whom you know, asked for permission to attend Mass. He got this answer, verbatim: "To hell with your damned Catholics, and your whole damned religion." He was refused . . . During ambulance instruction, one officer asked in all earnestness why the Germans are so brutal. Another answered with full conviction, "Because they are Catholics."

Similar accounts have come to me from other sources, and the conditions they depict are by no means roseate. The attacks continue in the camps, that is evident.

"But we have the priests, our army chaplains! Why don't they do something?" Yet what can the chaplains do when there are so few? Again I quote my friend: "Yesterday I had a long talk with Bishop —— on the sad conditions in our camps. He said, 'We Bishops must keep "mum." The laity alone can do something in present conditions.'"

"The laity alone can do something." Indeed, it is the great opportunity for the laity to help their own and through them others. President Wilson has recognized that a series of circumstances exist in the military camps which are beyond the scope and control of either military or religious agents. He has therefore placed the mental and moral welfare of our soldiers in the care of the people themselves, delegating two organizations, the Knights of Columbus and the Young Men's Christian Association, for the actual ministrations. Liberty loans and Red Cross funds have their recognized places; but to keep men fit, temptation must not merely be removed, but healthy recreation must be substituted, and welfare work thus becomes perhaps as important as the military and Red Cross work. In effect, the President has made us our brothers' keepers. And the extent to which we realize our responsibility can be measured in our willingness to support the selected organizations. They are our delegates, for they minister directly to our own.

Arnold Bennett and Dogma

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In a selection, made up from articles contributed by Mr. Arnold Bennett to an English journal and issued by an American publisher, there is this characteristic utterance upon a book of essays by G. K. Chesterton:

> I merely voice the opinion of the intelligent minority (or majority) of Mr. Chesterton's readers when I say that his championship of Christian dogma sticks in my throat. In my opinion, at this time of day it is absolutely impossible for a young man with a first-class intellectual apparatus to accept any form of dogma, and I am therefore forced to the conclusion that Mr. Chesterton has not got a first-class intellectual apparatus. . . . I will go further and say that it is impossible. in one's private thoughts, to think of the accepter of dogma as an intellectual equal.

It is quite of a piece with this, at least, frank expression of Mr. Bennett's arrogance, that he should fall foul of a Catholic writer like Dr. Barry, who in protesting against "the plague of unclean books," thereby writes himself down as not Mr. Bennett's "intellectual equal."

Brooklyn. JOHN JAYCIE.

A Psychiatric Clinic for Irish Patriots

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In his new book about "The Irish Issue in Its American Aspect" Mr. Shane Leslie lays before his American audience much information which might improve their acquaintance with certain historical aspects of Irish affairs. The sketches of which the book is made up are written in the style which has become familiar to Mr. Leslie's readers, many of whom are ready to bear with statements that are not wholly acceptable for the sake of scintillations which lend interest to every page. Those of us who have an interest in Ireland are delighted when any writer in her praise is able to find a sympathetic audience in the new Irish world. Perhaps it is only the super-sensitive amongst us, of whom I suppose I am one, who are irritated by the sacrifices he is at times prepared to make for the sake of a turn of expression. An example of this occurs when, at the end of his sketch of Parnell, whom he has first been comparing to Randolph Churchill, he says: "Both were cast out to die alone in madness and despair." Is this fair to Parnell? No matter for that, but is it fair to those who think the Parnell epoch in Ireland should bear some other stamp than "madness and despair" connote? This is followed, on the very next page, by a discussion of "treason" and "betrayal" as applied to the Redmonds, Irishmen in America being supposed to comment—it seems to me a very un-Irish comment, and much more an echo of English contempt—"That they got nothing for it, not even a staff billet for Willie Redmond or an Order of Merit for John." The laudation that follows hardly takes away the bad taste left by that.

Pearse, again seems to have been a man of quite normal mind and quite masculine manners, yet it is here said of him that while he was conducting a school which all admired, "in the background Pearse was forever conspiring with the phantoms of his own mind." Another madman, my dear American friends, madder even than Parnell, perhaps. Kettle, also, "stood with naught but a mystic's dream between him and the great horror." Only half-mad, perhaps. Of course Casement was mad. "Like Gordon he was intractable to his superiors and believed in a vague inspired mission." "Against such Quixotes no bribery, no persuasion can avail." In the same way "John Mitchel was the most brilliant, the most downright, the most dreamshot of the patriots of 'forty-eight." The Dublin rebels were "pleading for the life and right of a small nationality," but, in keeping with all Irish political effort, "with suicidal gesture and distorted phrase." O'Connell is spared the suggestion of madness, although he had

As an American, I feel an unconquerable impulse to fight wherever I see my liberty endangered; and I fail to see where the pantheist leaves me any more freedom than has my image in the glass. What freedom can you expect in a "manifestation"? Just the freedom which the manifestor grants it—which is simply none at all. My image in the glass does not have to be there, but it cannot get there unless I make it possible by placing myself before the mirror, and once there it does as I make it do.

If we are merely parts of the great Divine essence, then, like any other part, we move and think and act just as that essence directs. My arm is not free to scribble these sentences unless I direct its action; for my arm is a part of me and as such subject to my direct dominion. And if men are parts of god, it is as absurd to speak of individual human liberty as it is to speak of brains in a clothes-brush. This the consistent pantheist admits without much reluctance. We are the toys of Divinity, flung, either by its free-will or in obedience to fixed laws, into a seemingly separate existence. Once more philosophy has thrown away free-will and with it all law and duty and obligation and morality.

For without individual freedom of will there is no place in the dictionary of pantheism for our meaning of a wrong act. Matricide, rape, the defrauding of widows and orphans, and that long catalogue of crimes which make desolate the land cannot in any sense be called moral wrongs. The murderer, the seducer, the firebrand, the traitor are merely parts of the deity, and hence they act under direction and cannot do otherwise than they do.

And in what possible sense can we say that this universal deity acts wrongly? It has no duty to anyone; for no one but itself exists. There is no one to place a binding law upon it or oblige it to carry out such a law were it to exist. If this be true, then the criminals in the world, who are after all only manifestations of the deity, did not the slightest wrong when they betrayed innocence, snatched the very food from the mouths of the poor, and spitted screaming babies on the points of their swords. All of which implies that our moral codes will stand a thorough overhauling, and that some extremely primitive concepts of life will go by the board in a thrice.

Supposing, however, that the Deity is really the author of the world's crime—and I am using the word in its properly understood sense—then we have the disgusting picture of a Deity, a being of essence Divine, who freely burdens itself with the atrocities of Cain and Messalina and Sir Henry Morgan and the Paris Apaches. We find ourselves confronted with a Being which by its infinite intelligence put into the world a wonderful order and plan, and yet which deliberately frustrates that order in a thousand and a million cases by senseless crimes. Though incomprehensibly vast in the breadth of its understanding, it either does not recognize, even as men recognize, the inherent destructiveness of sin, or else, recognizing its true nature, it none the less freely and deliberately embraces the things which to the utmost of their power set at naught the plan which that same Deity has fixed in the universe. In either case we have reduced our Deity to the level of the lowest degenerate that walks the streets of our cities. Thus pantheism which started out to make all men gods, ends by reducing God to the condition of the most disgusting criminal.

There is no denying that at first sight, especially when draped in the opalescent robes of the East, pantheism seems a flattering balm to our souls. But if, logically followed out, it first makes us equal to God and then makes God equal to the clay beneath our feet and the criminal whose presence we feel a profanation; if it deprives us of our individuality; if it strips us of free-will and makes us the toy of some irresponsible deity; if it inevitably makes the philanthropist and the murderer alike unworthy of praise or blame, it is not a doctrine to flatter the vanity, but to pervert the human intelligence. Man must by the force of his nature bow before some deity. Yet who dare say that the savage who enshrines in his hut a flat-nosed idol of clay is more to be ridiculed for his cult than the scientist who admits to the sanctuary of his mind this pantheistic god of contradictions?

The Galling Chain of Slavery

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

WE claim freedom as our birthright. At the dawn of manhood, we gladly exercise the privileges of perfect citizenship. Liberty to us is a blessing as widespread as the sunshine, the fruits and harvests which nature yields. It is with difficulty therefore that we try to estimate the condition of the slave, the degradation of labor and the influence which they produced on social life and morality in the pagan world.

The laborer today is at least free. True, his lot is not ideal, yet it is neither hopeless nor altogether unhappy. In paganism on the contrary, the condition of the laborer was one of supreme degradation and misery. To be convinced of this, we need only cast a glance at the history of those two peoples who are considered to have reached the height of human grandeur and glory, Greece and Rome. Science and philosophy, poetry and the arts, statecraft and military achievements crowned them both with a halo of greatness which the long lapse of ages has not been able to dim. But to those who from the standpoint of justice and reason examine the social constitution of these two commonwealths, the crown of glory which they wear seems tinsel indeed, when they look at the cornerstone on which their empire rested. For that constitution was founded on the contempt of labor. It meant nothing else but the exploitation of a whole people by a handful of rich, powerful and cruel men. The whole social organization of Greece and Rome was but the realization of the phrase that Lucan puts on the lips of Cæsar: "Humanum paucis vivit genus." "The human race exists and toils for the pleasure and gratification of the selfish and favored few."

In Greece, the sole function of the citizen was to serve the State in the exercise of public functions, to ennoble it with the monuments of literary, artistic or political genius and to defend it with the sword. Everything else was thought unworthy of him and beneath the dignity of the freeman. Even in Rome in the earlier stages of its sturdy civilization, if agriculture was held in honor, and dictators after defeating the enemy were not ashamed to return to the plough they had left standing in the half-finished furrow, every other kind of labor was held in contempt and the contempt kept pace with the growing power and sway of the Republic.

In Sparta and Lacedemon, owing to the distribution of the public lands made by Lycurgus, under the condition that they could be transferred to others by inheritance only, the whole country gradually passed into the hands of a few hundred landed proprietors. In Italy, for somewhat similar reasons were formed those extensive latifundia or estates, which, according to Pliny, became its ruin. It must have been galling to thousands of slaves groaning in irons to realize that while a few pampered idlers lived in luxury given over to the excesses of vice, a whole people was groaning in poverty and degradation, bereft in a sense of their own personality, often reduced to starvation, with no other means to sate their hunger than the pittance doled out to them by the Emperor or the Senate, or the remains flung to them in contempt from the tables of their masters.

It is no wonder that, realizing their degradation, the people were led to despise all manual labor and to look upon it as fit for slaves only. This idea pervaded every class of society. The opinions expressed on the subject by the noblest exponents of Greek thought and culture, the high-minded Plato and the keenly logical Aristotle, became the watchword of the noblest. Even Cicero, whose thought, in its humane tendency, runs far ahead of his times, writes: "All laborers are engaged in a vile occupation, for nothing honorable can be found in the workshop of the toiler."

These ideas had filtered down to the lowest levels of society. The result can be imagined. The free man, even of the lowest position, left to the slave every kind of manual and mechanical occupation, everything almost that presupposed physical labor. Slaves worked in the mines; slaves reared those splendid piles of the Pantheon, the Coliseum, the Column of Trajan, the Mole of Adrian which still excite our wonder: slaves built those marvellous highways, over which the Romans marched to the conquest of the world. The industries, the trades, the mechanical arts were in the hands of slaves. They were the builders, the road-makers, the field and house servants of the chosen few. They ministered to their wants, their pleasures, their caprices and their vices. If now and then a free man decided to work in order to gain his livelihood or to cancel a debt, even then he could seldom escape from his misery. It was impossible for him to compete with slave-labor. Slavery was the normal condition of the laborer. If a man toiled, he was a slave, and Homer says that Jove takes from the slave one-half the qualities of a man. Aristotle attempted to prove that slaves are of a quite different nature from the rest of mankind, as distinct from the free man as the soul from the body, and the man from the brute. And from the pages of Plato, the philosopher and Aristophanes, the comic poet, in Greece, and from the works of Varro, Terence, Plautus and Seneca in Rome, it can be seen that the slave had no rights which the free man was bound to respect.

He was not recognized as a man. He was classified as a tool, a machine, a chattel, good for the uses of the farm or the house. As long as he might be of any service he should be treated so as not to spoil his market value. When sick or no longer able to work through weakness or old age, he was left to rust away or to die alone.

If under Claudius and the Antonines, even under Domitian and Nero, a few laws and decrees were passed to mitigate the horrors of slavery, and if a great jurisconsult like Ulpian dared ask that slaves be treated as men, it may still be said that the power of the Roman master over his slave was practically absolute. He could employ him in any labor, even the most dangerous. He could sell him at will. He could hire him out to another master under any conditions. He could maltreat and mutilate him and subject him to the most cruel torments. He could put him to death. He did so at times for the merest trifles. If Cleopatra tried the effect of deadly poison upon her slaves, Vedius Pollio flung one of those unfortunate wretches into a fish-pond because he had broken a precious vase. It is true that such acts of inhuman cruelty were uncommon, not through any sentiment of humanity, but merely out of the regard which the masters professed for their own interests and property. Self-interest alone was the policy which dictated the treatment of the slave. When age, accident or disease had incapacitated these wretched beings for work, their masters abandoned them on a lonely island in the Tiber, or even hastened their death by intentional maltreatment. In Rome when a slave had killed his master, it was the custom that all his slaves should be put to death. The barbarous custom prevailed when, as Tacitus tells us, after the Prefect of the City, Pedanius Secundus, had been murdered by one of his slaves, the 400 slaves of the murdered official were all put to death in spite of their proved innocence and the cries for mercy which arose on all sides in their behalf. During ambulance instruction, one officer asked in all earnestness why the Germans are so brutal. Another answered with full conviction, "Because they are Catholics."

Similar accounts have come to me from other sources, and the conditions they depict are by no means roseate. The attacks continue in the camps, that is evident.

"But we have the priests, our army chaplains! Why don't they do something?" Yet what can the chaplains do when there are so few? Again I quote my friend: "Yesterday I had a long talk with Bishop —— on the sad conditions in our camps. He said, 'We Bishops must keep "mum." The laity alone can do something in present conditions.'"

"The laity alone can do something." Indeed, it is the great opportunity for the laity to help their own and through them others. President Wilson has recognized that a series of circumstances exist in the military camps which are beyond the scope and control of either military or religious agents. He has therefore placed the mental and moral welfare of our soldiers in the care of the people themselves, delegating two organizations, the Knights of Columbus and the Young Men's Christian Association, for the actual ministrations. Liberty loans and Red Cross funds have their recognized places; but to keep men fit, temptation must not merely be removed, but healthy recreation must be substituted, and welfare work thus becomes perhaps as important as the military and Red Cross work. In effect, the President has made us our brothers' keepers. And the extent to which we realize our responsibility can be measured in our willingness to support the selected organizations. They are our delegates, for they minister directly to our own.

Arnold Bennett and Dogma

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In a selection, made up from articles contributed by Mr. Arnold Bennett to an English journal and issued by an American publisher, there is this characteristic utterance upon a book of essays by G. K. Chesterton:

> I merely voice the opinion of the intelligent minority (or majority) of Mr. Chesterton's readers when I say that his championship of Christian dogma sticks in my throat. In my opinion, at this time of day it is absolutely impossible for a young man with a first-class intellectual apparatus to accept any form of dogma, and I am therefore forced to the conclusion that Mr. Chesterton has not got a first-class intellectual apparatus. . . . I will go further and say that it is impossible. in one's private thoughts, to think of the accepter of dogma as an intellectual equal.

It is quite of a piece with this, at least, frank expression of Mr. Bennett's arrogance, that he should fall foul of a Catholic writer like Dr. Barry, who in protesting against "the plague of unclean books," thereby writes himself down as not Mr. Bennett's "intellectual equal."

A Psychiatric Clinic for Irish Patriots

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In his new book about "The Irish Issue in Its American Aspect" Mr. Shane Leslie lays before his American audience much information which might improve their acquaintance with certain historical aspects of Irish affairs. The sketches of which the book is made up are written in the style which has become familiar to Mr. Leslie's readers, many of whom are ready to bear with statements that are not wholly acceptable for the sake of scintillations which lend interest to every page. Those of us who have an interest in Ireland are delighted when any writer in her praise is able to find a sympathetic audience in the new Irish world. Perhaps it is only the super-sensitive amongst us, of whom I suppose I am one, who are irritated by the sacrifices he is at times prepared to make for the sake of a turn of expression. An example of this occurs when, at the end of his sketch of Parnell, whom he has first been comparing to Randolph Churchill, he says: "Both were cast out to die alone in madness and despair." Is this fair to Parnell? No matter for that, but is it fair to those who think the Parnell epoch in Ireland should bear some other stamp than "madness and despair" connote? This is followed, on the very next page, by a discussion of "treason" and "betrayal" as applied to the Redmonds, Irishmen in America being supposed to comment—it seems to me a very un-Irish comment, and much more an echo of English contempt—"That they got nothing for it, not even a staff billet for Willie Redmond or an Order of Merit for John." The laudation that follows hardly takes away the bad taste left by that.

Pearse, again seems to have been a man of quite normal mind and quite masculine manners, yet it is here said of him that while he was conducting a school which all admired, "in the background Pearse was forever conspiring with the phantoms of his own mind." Another madman, my dear American friends, madder even than Parnell, perhaps. Kettle, also, "stood with naught but a mystic's dream between him and the great horror." Only half-mad, perhaps. Of course Casement was mad. "Like Gordon he was intractable to his superiors and believed in a vague inspired mission." "Against such Quixotes no bribery, no persuasion can avail." In the same way "John Mitchel was the most brilliant, the most downright, the most dreamshot of the patriots of 'forty-eight." The Dublin rebels were "pleading for the life and right of a small nationality," but, in keeping with all Irish political effort, "with suicidal gesture and distorted phrase." O'Connell is spared the suggestion of madness, although he had some bad qualities, and Smith O'Brien has no more against him than being "a relative of Sir Cecil Spring-Rice."

But taking them by and large there is not much left for Mr. Leslie's American readers to conclude than that every Irish patriot is more or less a lunatic, or that nobody but a lunatic would be an Irish patriot. This may be just what American readers require to be told. It will confirm them in the view so many profess to hold that the struggle for liberty, which in all other countries is esteemed to be a rational undertaking, is in Ireland an aberration of disordered minds. Personally, with the admiration I have for Mr. Leslie's talents, I could wish, for his sake as well as my own, that he had been able to see the possibility of patriotism in Irishmen finding high expression without the stimulus of insanity to prompt its spokesmen; as also that their misadventures might be ascribed to the normally human causes which produce them, and not set down to a blind fatalism by which men are to be afflicted because it is Ireland they serve and not some other country.

Catholic Employment Bureaus

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Living near one of the large normal schools of the State and fully conversant with the trials of the Catholic graduate in his efforts to secure positions, I have followed the recent letters in regard to the methods of one or more of the employment agencies with great interest. I know only too well that the charges are true. One case, for instance, which has come to my notice, is that of a competent, experienced Catholic teacher who was compelled to wait for three years for an appointment in her own city, while a dozen teachers not of our Faith and totally without experience were placed. The city to which I refer has a fair percentage of Catholics, but the charter declares that not more than one Catholic may at any time be a member of the board of education.

I think that it behooves AMERICA as the foremost Catholic magazine and the mouthpiece of a great teaching Order to point out some means by which Catholics can in all fairness gain remunerative employment. I am sure that other Catholic publications would be ready to second its efforts.

In addition it seems to me that it is high time that the Catholic universities and colleges of this country should start employment bureaus not only for the graduates of their institutions but also for undergraduates. Actual employment given to ambitious members of Catholic colleges and universities through a faculty organization, aided by alumni and others, sounds like a fairy tale to the student body of our colleges. As a whole, an innovation of this kind would be very welcome; for, strange to say, the Catholics most fortunate in this world's goods do not throng Catholic colleges. These suggestions come from a student who desires to aid.

Teach Them What to Read

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The issue of AMERICA for December 8 contains an editorial which emphasizes a matter that should be insisted on. Certainly we should teach our Catholics what to read. The conclusion of the editorial should be read and pondered by all teachers. Many graduates from our schools, it is much to be feared, never heard the names of some of our great Catholic authors; few know anything about our leading Catholic papers and reviews; their libraries at home may not contain a single Catholic book. Who is to blame, if the young have no taste for Catholic reading? All teachers should devote some time to reading from standard Catholic books and magazines, or at least to recommending them. Teachers should also inform their pupils where Catholic literature can be procured, for many Catholic graduates do not even know so elementary a detail of Catholic life.

Ridicule of the Irish

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In one of the most prominent amusement houses of Worcester, Irish character and personality have been recently subjected to a highly distorted and utterly obnoxious portrayal. It is not uncommon to see Irish wit confounded with blatant foolery; to see the upright, though unpolished son of toil represented as an uncouth simpleton. Such delineations are common, though none the less to be condemned. But the climax is reached when the kindly, grey-haired Irish mother, who, with her daughters, typifies the highest ideals of refinement and purity is replaced by an intoxicated woman brought forward as typical of the womanhood of the isle across the sea.

When such a representation is tolerated upon the vaudeville stage, those who permit it should be subjected to the censure of all Irish Americans worthy of the name, who profess any respect for the dignity of Irish-American womanhood. But, sad to relate, those of the audience who seemed to enjoy the shameful spectacle most were the ones on whose brows the Apostles' Creed was plainly stamped.

How can we expect modern society to entertain any respect for the land of our fathers, and its sons, when we condone such exhibitions by sitting idly by and, worse still, by applauding?

Catholic Child-Caring Agencies

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In common, no doubt, with many other Catholics, I lately received a letter and a pamphlet from the Child-Placing Agency of the State Charities Aid Association. The letter reminds me that "We must keep the hearthfires burning," an opinion from which I in no wise dissent, though, with the high price of coal, I conceive that the task is not without difficulties. It states, further, that after the war we "shall have a great many more needy children," and that we must place these children in "real homes." To help this excellent work, I am asked to contribute $65.10, since this sum "is the average cost of learning the facts about a homeless child, of finding a thoroughly good home, and of placing a child in it."

It is, of course, a commonplace with Catholic social workers that the proper place for the child is the home. God forbid that I should do or say anything to keep any poor little waif from the place which Almighty God designed for him, just as surely as He designed the swaying nest for the fledgling. But, as it seems to me, Catholics who supply the State Charities Aid Association with funds, may not only miss an opportunity to help really meritorious charities for children, but may actually work, through every dollar of their contribution, against the interests of the dependent Catholic child. Everyone knows the heartless attitude of that misnamed Association when, in 1916, the envenomed "uplifters" marshaled their forces against the Catholic child-caring institutions, and when they strove to hale before the courts as felons, men and women one day of whose consecrated lives knew infinitely more of real, helpful love for God's poor, than is written in the whole history of commercialized "charity" in this great city. Nor can Catholics forget the part assumed by Mr. Homer Folks at that time, and it is this gentleman's signature which closes the letter of appeal. Furthermore, the list of the Board of Managers, printed in the pamphlet is almost a roster of the forces that have, unwittingly perhaps, reproduced in this Christian century and community, the anachronism of a "charity" which sees in God's poor not the image of Christ Jesus, the Man of Sorrows, but obstacles to social progress, specimens to be analyzed in a sociological laboratory, and duly registered in a card-catalogue. True, the list contains one Catholic name, but that same name was appended to an appeal for a Luther memorial, issued last spring. In the latter case, as I am informed, the name was used without duc authorization. Possibly, then, it has slipped into the S. C. A. A. list through an unfortunate error.

Catholics who are able to contribute $65.10 for child-caring purposes, will invest that sum wisely by sending it to the Sisters of Charity in charge of the New York Foundling Hospital, or they may consult with profit Mr. Edward J. Butler, Catholic Home Bureau, 105 East Twenty-second Street, or the Rev. Samuel A. Ludlow, Catholic Guardian Society, 237 East Twenty-first Street. There is very little danger that the non-Catholic charities will be neglected, and, after all, charity begins at home. Besides, contributions to Catholic charities are always devoted to charitable purposes, and not to defray the heavy "overhead charges" that seem inevitable when charity ceases to be a virtue and becomes a trade.

The Catholic Woman and Suffrage

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The woman movement has come to stay. It is economically appropriate to the age. There is a core of honesty and justice in it which, properly directed, will make it a good and useful thing, not the evil predicted. The Catholic woman who fails to appreciate this cannot well serve her country and her Church. I have been watching and studying this thing for years and I am as certain of the arrival of universal woman suffrage as I am of the sunrise tomorrow. The Catholic women who severely ignore or attack woman suffrage are failing to meet a necessity of the times; not only civic matters, but religious, are involved. To such Catholics as these I would sound a note of warning and ask them not to let the enemies of religion "beat them to the polls." Let those who have brought religion into politics learn that they cannot use "female" politics against religion.

Feminism is an ugly attendant, but we are not going to destroy feminism by attempting to destroy woman suffrage. Though feminists claim it, woman suffrage is not feminism. It is merely a civic and political matter. It is the duty of Catholic leaders, men and women, to redeem the movement from radical control, not only in the States where it has arrived, but in the States where it is coming. Woman suffrage is not in itself destructive to the home. Nothing can break up the harmony of a home where sanctity sits on the hearthstone. Sanctify the woman movement and woman suffrage will produce good results.

Those who revere womanhood and desire the day of better things in the home and in the State, cannot serve this good purpose by opposition to woman suffrage, or by censure and ridicule of suffragists, nor can they afford to be indifferent to the question. They must have the common sense to see that it is a matter of immediate importance; they must realize that it has come to stay; they must have the imagination to see its needs, and they must have the foresight to guide it away from pernicious influences. To do otherwise is simply to bury one's head in the sand. Unfortunately a great proportion of devoted Catholic women have done this very thing, while the twentieth-century sectarian devil smiles up his political sleeve.

Every practical Catholic woman, including the nursing and teaching Sister, should exercise her rights as a citizen. Woman suffrage must not be given over to the control of the feminists, or the sectarian politician, or the Socialists, or the anti-Catholics, or any class of fanatics. The Catholic woman, sane, devout, forward-thinking, womanly, has a duty to perform from which she must not shrink. Not by remaining aloof with her eyes and ears closed, but by coming forward, modestly yet fearlessly, with faith in immutable principles, can the Catholic woman serve the cause of womanhood in this, the twentieth century of our Lord.

Women are going through a very trying period, but they will always be the creatures God made them, whether they vote or not. It is a matter of utmost importance, in these striding times, for Catholic women to know how to vote, and to know they can be good Catholic women as well as voters, that the polls have no power to destroy their religion or their womanly virtues, but may be useful in maintaining the standards of both. The hope of suffrage is the Catholic woman.

Ecclesiastical Architecture

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The article by Miss Larmour in a recent issue of AMERICA treated of a most interesting subject and at the same time suggested consoling reflections on the progress of Catholic architecture in the United States. Everyone, who has taken the trouble to mark it, must have noticed a gradual but clearly discernible development. Almost every diocese in the land is proud of one or more churches recently erected, which by their dignity and beauty lift the mind of beholders to heavenly desires. No attempt has been made as regards standardization of styles or types. But the styles are purer; the types simpler. European cathedrals, grand as they are, serve no longer as models for humble parish churches, and justly so. Simple types in Gothic, whether English or French; simple types in Romanesque, whether Italian, French or German, now prevail. Although our churches are better architecturally than they were, they are still far from perfection. This is an age of transition, an age in which we are throwing off building traditions of the immediate past and taking up again the traditions of the early and medieval periods. This is apparent in many a basilica and Romanesque type, which, however, still has a strong foreign flavor and atmosphere.

Our art in church building is not yet indigenous or native. Ecclesiastical architects still adhere too closely to imitation instead of assimilation. There is not enough of adaptation of the old to suit the requirements of our time. More assimilation of the fine spirit of past masterpieces is what is needed. Of course there are many great problems that confront us. Our forefathers did not find any objection to columns; they did not worry about acoustics, seating capacity, exits, or fresh and warm air. Foreign churches, like foreign dwellings, do not suit our conditions of church and home life. Therefore the old models can serve only as a source of inspiration. As art, however, always yields to demand, good churches are more in evidence. Books on architecture and travel create good taste and culture in this matter. Skill is appreciated only by one who knows, and he who knows selects an architect who can give him what he wants.

However, the development is going on. Architects, clergy and laymen realize the fact that architecture is an art, and being an art is based on certain fundamental principles: simplicity, order, unity, variety, proportion and adaptation—all of which produce harmony. Any religious art after all is but a medium, whether it is the art of literature, music or architecture, through which the spirit of our religion is expressed; and being the handmaid of religion, must be subservient to it. This is important, since art in the true sense conceals itself. In churches the religious idea must dominate the medium.

Again architecture, as an art, is essentially and inevitably the unconscious expression of a national spirit, for it reflects the history, character and temperament of a people; moreover an indigeneous style is produced by important factors, wealth, leisure, civilization, and culture. We cannot, therefore, but hope for great strides in the near future, since we possess all these requisites, together with a sincere and abiding faith that will soon find its expression in this great art, for the honor and glory of the Church and its Founder, Jesus Christ.

The New Year

AS the old year lies dying, bathed in blood, and the new trembles anxiously to its birth amid wars and rumors of wars, the familiar greeting of a Happy New Year comes haltingly to the lips. Grim forebodings of untold sufferings, privations of every kind, torture of body and agony of soul, seem all too likely to be our portion during the next twelve months. The joyous care-free existence, which, thanks to the most democratic of governments, has been our portion for so many decades, has departed from our land, and our beloved country, drawn unwillingly and in spite of unquestioned long-suffering forbearance, into the maelstrom of war, now stands on the brink of heavy sacrifices.

It is a time for service, not happiness. There can be no joy or contentment during the next twelve months except in the realization of duty fully and nobly done. Only little souls can be satisfied to seek their accustomed pleasures and their life of ease when the whole world is in the throes of bitter pain. Such assuredly are not AMERICA'S readers. All cannot go to the front in defense of our liberties, but all without exception have their places to take in the march towards victory. All must share in the common duty, in sincere devotion, in the sense of responsibility, in obedience to lawful authority, in sadness, anxiety and hope. In thought and act we must spend ourselves for our native land, giving generously and deliberately and continuously of our time, our convenience, our goods, and should the demand be made, of our lives, our own and those dear to us. The flag is calling to each one of us to rise to the heights of heroism and self-oblation. The year, that is now beginning, is rich in opportunity to make our lives sublime; it will be heavy with lifelong shame and regret, if, at its close, it has brought us mere selfish indulgence, little or no privation, only a black record of barren emotional aspiration. We must set our faces sternly, this year, not towards the pleasant places of joy, but towards the grim altar of sacrifice.

Only the Streets

"MY boy grew up on the city streets," testified the Catholic mother of a sixteen-year-old boy who was tried last week in New York, charged with murdering another boy of his age. The witness explained:

When Timmie came home from work in the pencil factory he would eat his supper and go out to meet the boys. I never knew what he did. I never asked. Just so he came home at ten o'clock. I was so tired when night came. * * * * I know he learned things he shouldn't on the streets. What can I do? What can any mother do? Does it help now that I washed and darned and stayed at home, not knowing where my children went because I was always too tired?

What a pity it is that the son of that poor tired mother did not have some safer place than the streets to pass his evenings in! If "Timmie" had been accustomed to seek recreation in an attractive boys' club of which a zealous young priest had charge perhaps that sorrowing mother would not now reproach herself for being too tired to know where her son was spending his evenings. For sad experience proves that in our large cities, those who especially need the Church's care and protection are the boys and girls that have finished their schooling and gone to work. That is so perilous a period in the lives of these young people that it is very necessary that safe and attractive amusements and forms of recreation should be provided for them. In order to protect the faith and morals of city boys and girls in their 'teens, the establishment of parish clubs and recreation centers would seem to be very necessary, if the work begun in the parochial school is to be continued and perfected.

How to Become Good and Great

CAESAR can hardly be censured for speaking, even loudly, in praise and defense of his own household. But it is well that a few coherent thoughts should be borne along on the foaming current of his diction. Otherwise, he cannot complain if the neighbors rank him as a common scold, or request the appointment of a jury de lunatico inquirendo.

In Cincinnati a "Publicity Department" issues a weekly news-letter "in defense of 1,100,000 distillers, dealers and employes engaged in the liquor business and allied industries"; the managers, moreover, engage to send "plate matter" to any publication which desires it. All this is perfectly legitimate, and from time to time items of value have appeared in the news-letter, as green oases in a dry and useless desert of figures and unwarranted inferences. Thus in the current issue, the following challenge is republished from the columns of a Washington daily:

> Will some Prohibitionist supply us with the names of six men of the first class in the entire history of the world that have been total abstainers? If six cannot be produced, will they produce three, and if not three, will they produce one? We never heard of him.

The paragraph indicates that the writer never heard of St. John the Baptist, but to name the other five would be taking this anti-prohibitionist too seriously. The point of his argument is not easily discerned, but it seems to suggest that the great men in history became great by reason of their devotion to the bottle. If this inference be legitimate, our religious and secular educators, our professional men and the heads of "big business" should forthwith appoint a committee to investigate the power of port and whisky in the process of forming virtuous women, and men who are great and good. No educational system which lasted long enough to secure a line in history ever prescribed alcohol as an awakener of the unfolding minds of growing children. Any attempt at this time to introduce Bacchus into the schoolhouse would, it is confidently asserted, be rejected even by our most advanced "educationists" and be welcomed only by certain stupid members in the trade, and by janitors of bibulous habits. Alcoholic beverages may have their uses, but many centuries have failed to prove that they are essential, or even useful, in the process of attaining physical, mental or moral greatness.

Stop, Look, and Listen!

THE story runs that, with cunning art, a national park guide once constructed a very striking warning-sign, which he placed near the edge of a dangerous precipice. But after two years he removed it. During that time, he argued, no man and not even a beast had fallen over the declivity. This undoubted fact, he concluded, was proof positive that the warning-sign was wholly unnecessary.

The legend bears a close, even a family resemblance, to the scholastikoi of Hierocles, and may easily be as old as that cynical philosopher. Indeed, there are grave authorities who aver that it was hoary in the days when the Pharoahs wagged their beards and chuckled over it, in the lighter moments when they were not engaged in building the first pyramids. It is probably as old as the fig-leaf costume, coeval with fallen human nature. In our wisdom and our keen perception of the unfitness of things, we smile at its absurdity, even as we re-enact it in our own lives. The warning-sign near some precipices should be kept intact forever. There are some grievous errors which all of us may make in the moment of relaxation which we allow ourselves in a day of fancied security. And there are great gulfs in the spiritual life that yawn and take into their unsounded depths the unwary traveler who, because he has often made the journey, deems himself absolved from the precaution of watching his step, and then stopping to look both ways for a safe path, before proceeding.

We are creatures of habit, but unfortunately good habits, unlike their bad counterparts do not, with equal facility, hollow out so deep a groove. That is only another way of saying that there still remain in us the vestiges of original sin, and hardening tendencies intensified by sins for which we, and not our old father Adam, are directly responsible. Keep to the warning-sign; see that no harsh wind destroys it, and from time to time give it a good coat of moral paint, the luminous kind that shines like a radium-treated watch-dial. Then you will be able to see it even in the darkest storm of passion, and its shining will guide your following steps through the blackest night of discouragement.

A Word to Our Readers

THE general public is probably aware that the stress of the times has brought more than his share of hardship to the publisher. The mailing rates have undergone a marked increase, and in the one item of paper AMERICA will be obliged to expend a sum which doubles the appropriation for 1917. This alone is a matter of serious moment, but the increase in expenditures does not stop with these two departments. Every department of AMERICA will call for a larger outlay in 1918. The price of labor in the city of New York, for instance, has reached a point far beyond the maximum of previous years, and as it seems probable that labor of the kind required by the publisher will become scarcer in the course of the year, we cannot indulge the hope that in this department any relief is in sight.

AMERICA has not followed the example of other reviews in increasing the subscription price, and the Editors trust that this step will not be found necessary. Our readers would be of very great assistance to us, if with their own renewals, they would send us a new subscriber. If the number of subscribers is doubled, the necessity, which now seems imperative, of advancing the price can be averted. The Editors also ask the indulgence of subscribers in taking the continued arrival of AMERICA as evidence that their money has reached its proper destination. The custom of sending special receipts for each subscription means for us a very large postal bill. Finally, the Editors trust that the unswerving loyalty of the many whose friendship has been a source of valued counsel and encouragement will enable them to continue in the defense of Catholic truth to which they have devoted their lives.

He Did not Save

IT is an historical fact that before the revolt of Luther there existed in Christendom unity of faith, of authority, of discipline, of sacramental life. No Catholic apologist denies that there were gross evils to be reformed. Popes and Saints were the first to proclaim that need. Luther might have cooperated at that great task along the lines which the Church laid down and which she sanctioned. But the role of a reformer in the Catholic sense was scarcely to his liking. From the task of the reformer guided by the doctrines and the authority of the Church he turned to the more congenial one of originating a new evangel and founding a sect. Pastor Junius B. Remensnyder, in the Christian Herald for December 12, tells us that Luther's purpose was only to save, not to destroy, and that the last thought in his mind was to break in twain the unity of the Church of God.

It is possible that at the outset of his revolt, Luther did not formally make up his mind to rend asunder the seamless robe of the Church and destroy her unity. That was a task too great in itself and too terrifying even for this colossus of rebellion and disorder. But when men build on false principles and are guided by illogical premises they are led whither they would not go. And dragged ever further and further by their principles, there comes a time when either they are blinded to their consequences or when these principles have so deeply affected their lives that they have not the courage and the heart to disown them and retrace their steps. The principle laid down by Luther, the principle of the private interpretation of the Bible, his cardinal tenet that there is no other fountain of revealed truth for the Christian than the Bible, a dumb though inspired book, of which the individual was constituted sole judge, is in itself a principle of schism, of disunion and disintegration. For fifteen centuries, the Church interpreting and expounding the Bible, in the light of her history and tradition, and infallible in her doctrinal and moral decisions in this regard, had been the rule of faith in the past. But Luther was an individualist. He would submit to no rule outside of the individual himself. According to him therefore the individual interpreting the Bible according to his own whims, fancies and passions was the final arbiter of faith and morals. Man's private judgment was the final umpire to decide the issues of life and death for the soul.

That is a principle of death. For the individual judgment is fickle, without authority, unstable as the passions of the men who read the sacred volume. It has ruined the faith of millions. Induced to consider the Bible and the Bible only as their infallible guide, they soon came to look upon it as a human document and then to discard it altogether. The first followers of Luther would believe nothing which they did not at least imagine that they saw in the Bible. Now thousands reject everything they see there and laugh at the folly of Luther himself, who could believe what they call the silly tales of the book. The Bible thus interpreted by the individual has brought anarchy into Christendom. Luther, even if he wished it, could not destroy the Church, for it is God's.

But he has had the dreadful power of tearing millions from the center of unity and dragging them from the solid groundwork of truth to the shifting sands of heresy and error. The principles of Luther destroyed the cohesion of the body of the Faithful under the rule and headship of one pastor. Luther did not save. He did not unify. He sowed discord, hatred, stirred the evil passions of his generation, abused great powers for selfish ends. He had it in his strong nature to exert a magnetic influence over the men of his day. An impartial survey of his life convinces the student that he did not use it well. He was a destroyer, not a true reformer. At the end of the sixteenth century alone there were no fewer than 270 conflicting sects, the brood of one false principle. It is a sad commentary on the ruinous rule of faith which he had devised.

Reading for "Amusement"

IN "Life and Literature," Lafcadio Hearn's recently published book of lectures, there is a good passage about the unprofitable character of the so-called intellectual activity of those who read merely for amusement. He observes:

> Thousands and thousands of books are bought every year, every month, I might even say every day, by people who do not read at all. They only think that they read. They buy books just to amuse themselves, "to kill time," as they call it; in one hour or two their eyes have passed over all the pages and there is left in their minds a vague idea or two about what they have been looking at; and this they really believe is reading. Nothing is more common than to be asked, "Have you read such a book?" or to hear somebody say, "I have read such and such a book." But these persons do not speak seriously. Out of a thousand persons who say, "I have read this," or "I have read that," there is not one perhaps who is able to express any opinion worth hearing about what he has been reading. . . .
> A young clerk, for example, reads every day on the way to his office and on the way back, just to pass the time; and what does he read? A novel, of course; it is very easy work, and it enables him to forget his troubles for a moment, to dull his mind to all the little worries of his daily routine. In one day or two days he finishes the novel, then he gets another. . . . At the end of a few years he has read several thousand novels. Does he like them? No; he will tell you that they are nearly all the same, but they help him to pass away his idle time. . . . It is utterly impossible that the result can be anything but a stupefying of the faculties. He cannot even remember the names of twenty or thirty books out of thousands, much less does he remember what they contain. The result of all this reading means nothing but a cloudiness in his mind. That is the direct result. The indirect result is that the mind has been kept from developing itself.

Those who are not yet addicted, beyond all hope of recovery, to the best-seller habit can profitably lay to heart the foregoing truths. What better New Year's resolution could these unfortunates take than an iron determination to read with care every week a real book which will make them think? In all probability the average man does not find the mental effort involved in reading the short-lived novels that every year pour from the press in millions to be much greater than that required for watching motion-pictures or even for taking his meals with relish. As for the intellectual development attending the novel-reading habit, it is practically nil. Early atrophy of mind menaces young men and women who worse than waste their time by devouring volume after volume of second-rate fiction. For all development necessarily means exertion and pain, but they who habitually read, only for amusement, quantities of books, which cost their authors a very scanty expenditure of gray matter to produce, will ultimately find themselves in a hopeless state of intellectual stagnation.

THE LIGHT AND GLOOM OF HAWTHORNE

"LET the reader imagine himself my guest, and that, having seen whatever may be of notice within and without the Old Manse, he has finally been ushered into my study. There, after seating him in an antique elbow-chair, I take forth a roll of manuscript and entreat his attention to the following tales." The years are declining to the century, since Hawthorne, in the "Mosses from an Old Manse" penned this invitation. From the moment of entering "between the tall gateposts of rough-hewn stone" we determined to be critical and unguestlike. We agreed that "The glimmering shadows that lay half asleep between the door of the house and the public highway were a kind of spiritual medium, seen through which the edifice has not quite the aspect of belonging to the material world"; we straightway noted that the subject-matter of Hawthorne's tales, seen through the medium of his presentation, had something of the same unearthly aspect. Under his coloring, the orchard and the garden grew golden; but it was not till we lingered on the river brink, that we discovered his wizardry. The unlovely Concord, its muddy bed and tawny hue, the meadow grass along its sedgy border, became a fairy stream under the magic of his portrayal. We became eager for the "elbow-chair" and the "roll of manuscripts." We would there discover how other unlovely Concords, symbolizing the themes of his writings, would be transformed by his magician's wand. As Nathaniel Hawthorne is in many respects the greatest writer of prose America has produced his best works certainly deserve a place on the Catholic's book-shelf.

Around the Old Manse was a "veil woven of intermingled gloom and lightness." Over Hawthorne, too, there hovers a dual personality. The world, with reason, pronounced him gloomy and morbid. To those he loved, however, he was the best of playmates, lightsome and joyous, the author of the "Note Books" and the stories for children. "Grandfather's Chair" and the "Tanglewood Tales," representing the happy hours spent with his own children, have been fruitful for the world of childhood ever since. They have a glow of happiness, so winsome, so gentle and so delicate, that we share Julian Hawthorne's surprise; reading his father's pitiless tragedies for the first time, he marveled how such a man, as the father he knew, could have written such books. Akin to these tales, for freshness and naturalness, are the "Note Books," published posthumously, and never intended by the author for the profane eye. They are the random thoughts of a man untrammeled by an audience, closely observant, intensely meditative, weirdly fanciful, with strange mysteries of reality always facing him. What a mosaic these "Note Books" are, of the prattle of children and the commonplaces of the day, the jottings of travel and the queer, queer bubblings of fancy. What a delightful companion this Hawthorne must have been, how warm and genial, if Puritanism had not been dominant in him.

To the world and to us, Hawthorne has raised the barriers. Calmly calculating and measuring humanity by his years of brooding, he shows us his other face. He offers the "Mosses from an Old Manse," the "Twice-Told Tales" the four longer romances, as his claim to literary renown. By such he must be judged. Taking the content of his stories as the norm, there is an almost chronological order of climax in his works. His shorter papers are rich with the ingredients of his masterpieces. Some are as miniatures, that lack only enlargement; others are, as if the artist were testing his powers, by portraying, in detail, a corner of the larger landscape. The pieces nearest to reality, but least Hawthornesque, like "Sights from a Steeple" and "The Apple Dealer" are mere trifles, chapters of observations suited to the powers of a boy. Clothed in the witchery of his style, they become clever and delightful. Not far removed from these in subject-matter, are his historical attempts, scenic effects in the style of Scott, such as "The Gentle Boy" and the "Tales of a Province House." Hawthorne longed for a historical background, with the dust and mellowness of years, on which to lavish the wealth of his fancy. Not finding it in New England, he endeavored to give the sense of far-off things to the times of the early Puritans. Even here, as shown by "Lady Eleanor's Mantle," he is beginning to grope in the more occult regions of allegory.

An advance towards his more typical and original creations, are his tales of fancy, exemplified by the "Hall of Fantasy" and the "Virtuoso's Collection." His oddity of thought is more pronounced and he rears the most gorgeous air-castles in literature. These are the vagaries of a solitary ramble, the flimsy and cloud-like imaginings of a mind allowed to roam at will. His allegories assume a darker hue in "The Bosom Serpent" and "The Minister's Black Veil." His Puritan inheritance of a morbid outlook on life, intensified by isolation and solitude, make of him the stern judge of man's soul. Examples of this type, bearing the most characteristic impress of his genius, are "Young Goodman Brown" and "The Birthmark." These are stories that "Number the sable threads in human life, and drop the golden ones from the reckoning." Hereafter, he haunts the recesses of moral depravity, he lays bare the secrecy of the bosom, concealed passions, decay of the heart, hypocrisy, inexorable fate and doom. "Purify the heart" recurs with dreadful monotony. It is the refrain that rings in the reader's ears, long after he has closed the "Mosses from an Old Manse" and the "Twice-Told Tales."

The sketchy and unsubstantial "Blithedale Romance" hardly deserves mention, with his three longer romances, his marvelous triology of sin. Various and more joyous interpretations of these latter works may be given, but their primary moving force is this idea of sin. In "The Marble Faun," sin has its genesis in a natural being, unawakened to evil. The immediate effects of sin, concealed and confessed, are contrasted in "The Scarlet Letter," while the lingering curse of a sin committed long ago, is traced through generations in "The House of Seven Gables." These books are essentially similar to one another, and to his more mature, shorter stories. Like the latter, they are sometimes faithful pictures of the real world, with a coloring of history, wildly fanciful, and with an uncanny weird probing of the heart. Compared with one another, their development and method proceed along like lines. In each of them a concrete symbol, a statue, an embroidered letter, a blasted house, is the basis of the story. There is the same adherence to one overmastering idea, the same unbroken thread of a single plot, the same meager limitation of actors, that seem rather symbols than characters. There are no harrowing details, few intensely dramatic situations, only a cold-blooded psychological dissection and a brooding sort of agony that is more piercing in that it is so repressed. The romances grow, not by the addition of successive incidents, but by an intensive study. Each sentence pours a more lurid luster on the central moving force, till it glows like a living fire; it becomes a haunting specter; it freezes one like a piercing, long-drawn-out cry of horror in the night.

As the Manse became a fairyland under the witchery of his style, so his style throws a hypnotic veil over his stories. Soft as the fall of dew, graceful and easy-flowing as his own Concord, Hawthorne's style is the perfect medium for presenting his unimpassioned tragedies. To be Hawthornesque, his style is like the placid surface of a sun-kissed pool, along whose bed crawls a grotesque serpent. The beauty of the medium emphasizes the horror of the subject.

Christmas on Crusade

Here shall we bivouac beneath the stars,
  Gather the remnant of our chivalry
About the crackling fires, and nurse our scars,
  And speak no more as fools must, bitterly.

The roads familiar to His feet we trod;
  We saw the lonely hills whereon He wept,
Prayed, agonized—dear God of very God!
  And watched the whole world while the whole world slept.

We speak no more in anger; Christian men
  Our armies rolled upon you, wave and wave,
But crooked words and swords, O Saracen,
  Can only hold what they have given—a grave!

We know Him, know that gibbet whence was torn
  The pardon that a felon spoke on sin:
There is more life in His dead crown of thorn
  Than in your sweeping horsemen, Saladin!

We speak no more in anger; we will ride
  Homeless to our own homes. His bruised head
Had never resting-place. Each Christmastide
  Blossoms the thorn and we are comforted.

Yea, of the sacred cradle of our creed
  We are despoiled; the kindly tavern door
Is shut against us in our utmost need—
  We know the awful pastime of the poor!

We speak no more in anger, for we share
  His homelessness. We will forget your scorn.
The wild bells ring throughout the Christmas air;
  God homeless in our homeless homes is born.

Dictionnaire Apologétique de la Foi Catholique. Quatrième Edition Entièrement Refondue sous la Direction de A. d'Alès. Fascicule XIII: Loi Ecclesiastique—Mariolatrie. Paris: Gabriel Beauchesne.

The present instalment of this work maintains the high standard of scholarship to which AMERICA has called attention in previous notices. The article on ecclesiastical law treats the subject from the general point of view, having as its object to show how the Holy Spirit has directed the Church in its formation of a body of laws for the regulation and sanctification of the mystical body of Christ. Father d'Alès shows that the Church has repeatedly approved the devotion to the Holy House of Loreto, but that the tradition of the actual translation of the material dwelling is not a matter of faith, although it has been a matter of common acceptance in Catholic circles for six centuries. For those who wish to make a thorough investigation of the arguments for and against the actual fact of translation the author has added a useful bibliography. George Bertrin discusses the fact of Lourdes, the visions and the miraculous cures in a scientific and satisfactory manner. Marriage under the two headings of a natural contract and a sacrament is set forth briefly, cogently and thoroughly by E. Power, S.J. More than half the fascicule is devoted to the Mother of God, her place in Scripture, in tradition; her Divine maternity, perpetual virginity, her eminent sanctity, the Immaculate Conception, the Assumption, and her universal intercession. The final article takes up the general question of devotion of Mary, showing its place and development at various ages of the Church, its logical position in Catholic theology, and its fidelity to dogma and tradition. Throughout the fascicule the apologetical point of view has been rigorously observed. It is an arsenal of facts and arguments for the refutation of attacks on the Faith, and will be found invaluable by controversialists of the more profound type. The dictionary deserves a place in the library of priests and seminaries. J. H. F.

The Acáthist Hymn of the Holy Orthodox Eastern Church in the Original Greek Text and Done into English Verse. Edited by W. J. BIRKBECK, M. A., and the Rev. G. R. WOODWARD, M. A., New York: Longmans Green & Co., $1.25.

This beautiful liturgical hymn in honor of Our Lady which is commonly attributed to Sergius, Patriarch of Constantinople, 610-641, is sung in Russian churches on the Saturdays of Lent and is called Acáthist because none may sit while the hymn is being chanted. We are told that almost the earliest prayer a Russian mother teaches her children is one to Our Lady, and later they learn to say: "Meet it is indeed to bless Thee, the Theotókos, the ever-blessed and all-blameless, and Mother of our God. More honorable than the Cherubim, and incomparably more glorious than the Seraphim; Thee, who didst bear without corruption, God the Word, Thee, verily the Mother of God, we magnify." Later still, when seven or eight years old, Russian boys and girls learn to sing the "Acáthist Hymn" in Mary's honor. It consists of thirteen contakia, which is a sort of litany of her titles and gifts, and between the contakia are inserted twelve oikoi or stanzas, describing the chief events of Our Lady's life. Here, for example, is the eighth stanza followed by a portion of its contakion:

When in flesh came hither Christ
And angels sung to greet Him,
Shepherds heard their merry strain
And ran anon to meet Him
As their Shepherd. There they spied
The Lamb of God and proffer'd
Praise to Christ on Mary's lap,
And homage to her offer'd.

Hail Mary! Mother and as dam
Alike to Shepherd and to Lamb:
Hail Mary! For Thou dost enfold
Mankind, as sheep upon the wold.
Hail Mary! For Thou art a screen,
Defense against the foe unseen:
Hail Mary! For Thou dost suffice
To ope the gates of Paradise.
Hail Mary! For with earth today
The heav'ns entune a merry lay:
Hail Mary! For today glad earth
Unites with heav'n in holy mirth.

Those who prefer the "Acáthist Hymn" in its original Greek will find it all on the left-hand pages of this little book, and the Rev. G. R. Woodward announces that he will gladly help anyone who wishes to sing the hymn. W. D.

There's Pippins and Cheese to Come. By CHARLES S. BROOKS. Illustrated by THEODORE DIEDRICKSEN, Jr. New Haven: Yale University Press. $2.00.

Autumn Loiterers. By CHARLES HANSON TOWNE. With Drawings by THOMAS FOGARTY. New York: George H. Doran. $1.25.

Days Out and Other Papers. By ELIZABETH WOODBRIDGE. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $1.25.

These are books of essays gracefully written in a lighter vein. Mr. Brooks's handsome volume is largely literary in its character. Mr. Towne's pleasantly describes a leisurely auto-tour he and his friend, "Peb," made through the Berkshires, and Miss Woodbridge's book contains twenty-two mildly humorous papers familiar to the readers of the Atlantic's "Contributors' Club." The dozen essays in "There's Pippins and Cheese to Come" need no "Rhetoricating Floscules" to set them off, for the author has a delicate sense of literary values, a pleasant wit and a Lamb-like gift for turning a phrase. This passage from the charming paper, "Any Stick Will Do to Beat a Dog," will give the reader a taste of Mr. Brooks's quality:

I, myself, like dogs—sleepy dogs blinking in the firelight, friendly dogs with wagging tails, young dogs in their first puppyhood with their teeth scarce sprouted, whose jaws have not yet burgeoned into danger, and old dogs, too, who sun themselves and give forth hollow, toothless, reassuring sounds. When a dog assumes the cozy habits of the cat without laying off his nobler nature, he is my friend. A dog of vegetarian aspect pleases me. Let him bear a mild eye as though he were nourished on the softer foods. I would wish every dog to have a full complement of tail. It's the sure barometer of his warm regard. There's no art to find his mind's construction in the face. And I would have him without too much curiosity. It's a quality that brings him too often to the gate.

Mr. Towne has admirably succeeded in bringing to his readers the autumn atmosphere of western Massachusetts. The village-store in South Williamstown, which he describes, had its like in many a New England county thirty years ago, but it is now passing away. Nothing could be more in keeping with the "Autumn Loiterers'" adventures than Mr. Fogarty's pictures. The titles of Miss Woodbridge's short essays, "An Unlovely Virtue," "The Cult of the Second-Best," "The Wine of Anonymity," "Manners and the Puritan," etc., are sure to attract the reader, but it is not wise to run through many of the papers at a sitting, for the writer's wit sometimes grows thin, and there are occasional evidences of that New England smugness that often makes the Atlantic Monthly so irritating to people unfortunate enough to be born west of the Hudson. Illinois in 1818. By Solon Justus Buck. Springfield: The Illinois Centenary Committee, 1917.

This is the introductory volume of a historical series that deserves warm commendation. The State of Illinois to commemorate the event of the centenary of her admission into the Union, has in preparation a complete history of what happened from the time of her early exploration in 1673 down to her present existence as a commonwealth. The purpose of the initial volume is to portray the social, economic and political life of Illinois at the close of the territorial period, and in addition, to tell the story of the transition from colonial dependence to the full dignity of a State in the Union. The first half of the book is primarily descriptive; the latter half narrative. It opens with a description of certain elements, then dominant in the whole northern part of the State, which have long since disappeared from its boundaries, namely, the Indians and the fur trade. The author then discusses the land policy of the United States towards the early settlers and examines the distribution of the population with an attempt to locate the extreme frontier in the year of admission. Then successive chapters deal with the economic, social and intellectual conditions of the early inhabitants. Among all the topics treated, the struggle for constitutional recognition as an independent State is the best told. It was not a severe struggle, but it was a movement of national and local importance. For on the one hand it announced the advent of the slavery discussion in Congress, and on the other the birth, however feeble, of political factions and party strife in Illinois. The volume is enriched by many good illustrations. P. H. M.

Handbook of the New Thought. By Horatio W. Dresser, Ph.D. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.25.

A very ancient wish is evidently father to the New Thought; yet the latter is "brought out" as a child of the present age and a member of the immanentist family. What matters the name? Pragmatism may make personal convenience the test of truth; Idealism may erect consciousness into the creator of its own world; Christian Science and the New Thought may teach that the spirit in man is the source of its own immortality. One motive principle underlies them all: the principle of self-centration. Whether the ultimate that is sought be the ultimate of truth, or of goodness, or of life itself, the spirit of the present age offers but one precept: Look for the ultimate in yourself. Only be sure to find a name for it; for man has an unfortunate habit of refusing, in the long run, to be satisfied with himself.

Whatever the inherent worth of the New Thought, a candid and fairly consistent statement of it is given us by Dr. Dresser. His predictions of its future mission may be left for the future itself to verify. What is of real interest is his account of its historical origin. It appears that about a century ago a native of Maine, named Parkhurst Quimby, labored under a malady which he was assured was incurable. How far his ailment was real and how far imaginary, we are not informed, though there is hint of a somewhat morbid temperament in matters both physical and moral. However, in his real or fancied extremity, Mr. Quimby seems to have reasoned with himself as follows: I ought to be curable; any one ought to be curable; it is a perversion of nature that man should perish in his prime. But I am assured that medical science cannot cure me. Therefore, medical science is a failure; and I must look elsewhere for the health to which I am entitled. Acting on this conclusion the patient tried suggestive healing, and was completely cured. Believing his discovery to have wider significance, he began to practise it on others, and met with considerable success. From his reflections on these results there arose a further train of reasoning, which, at the cost of some search through Dr. Dresser's pages, may be fairly analyzed as follows: These persons' diseases were under subjective control. Therefore all disease is under such control. But most persons "believe" that disease, both physical and moral, is an objective fact. Therefore the great mass of humanity is deluded. This delusion, however, is corroborated by the authority of physicians and theologians. Therefore these two classes of authority are untrustworthy. But they cover, as a matter of fact, almost the whole field of human well-being and misfortune. Therefore man's only salvation, his only means of realizing his true destiny, lies in the emancipation of the individual from all external authority, and his education to complete self-sufficiency. Here, then, is the New Thought—or is it rather the ancient wish? It is just as new, and just as true, as the assertion: "You shall not die the death; you shall be as gods."

Now, in spite of the obvious fallacies of the above argument —from its first assumption, "I ought to be curable," down to its last conclusion, "I must be self-sufficient"—there is nothing very strange in the mere existence of such philosophy. It is natural enough that the power of psychic states over the nervous element in bodily disease—in itself no more than a simple physical law—should be mistaken by morbid sensibilities for a new explanation of life. Neither is it strange that those who benefit by its use should sometimes, under the common impulse of self-love, try to make a religion of it. The worship of self exists in many a less candid form than this. But the really strange feature of the present situation is, that the New Thought gives its whole case away by frankly claiming to be the true Christianity. This is where vaulting ambition o'erleaps itself indeed. Had Christ's miracles of healing been the end of His mission, instead of only a means thereto, such a claim might have had at least a specious foundation. But somehow Christendom has an inveterate habit of picturing its Founder in a certain situation which the New Thought can neither explain nor endure. For every picture of the healing of the paralytic or the raising of Lazarus, ten-thousand images of the Crucified greet the upturned gaze of human misery. That "He was offered because it was His own will," and that "when He hath let out His own sheep, He goeth before them," neither Dr. Dresser nor any of his confrères dare deny. Hence, no explanation of this cardinal fact is even so much as attempted in the pages before us. It is simply treated with an ominous silence.

Christianity without the Cross! One is forcibly reminded of the story of a great contemplative, who once dispelled a glorious apparition by calmly demanding the evidence of certain scars. He knew those marks to be "the Sign of the Son of Man," which no Antichrist could counteract.

A Defense of Idealism: Some Questions and Conclusions. By MAY SINCLAIR. New York: The Macmillan Co. $2.00.

The introduction to this book shows how very emotional is Miss Sinclair is her philosophic attitude. She likes the pan-psychism of Samuel Butler awfully much: "I like to think that my friend's baby made its charming eyelashes, that my neighbor's hen designed her white frock of feathers, and my cat his fine black coat of fur, themselves; because they wanted to; instead of having to buy them, as it were, at some remote ontological bazaar." So she takes an inch from Butler, and stretches it to an ell. It makes her feel quite limp to depart from William James, the darling! "The monist who hates pragmatism and loves the pragmatist; who, let us say, abhors William James's way of thinking and adores his way of writing; who, in the very moment of hostility, remains the thrall of his charming personality and brilliant genius, that monist is in no enviable case." Altogether, the case is terribly pathetic, especially so, when with a Bergsonian élan vital Miss Sinclair leaves pragmatism quite bald. Indeed, her élan is very good in such onslaughts. But in battling for idealism, she has no weapons. The fact that there are illusions, hallucinations, and what-not, due to poisoned nerve-centers and other pathological conditions, is about the only hand-grenade she can fling at realism. This fact will never convince the "Tommies" that all reality is "in the irreducible, ultimate fact of selfhood"; and that, while they "carry on over there," the busy Berthas do not matter, since, "in ultimate analysis, matter may be resolvable into terms of immaterial being." The Case is Altered. By BEN JONSON. Edited with Introduction, Notes and Glossary by WILLIAM E. SELIN, Ph.D. New Haven: Yale University Press. $2.00.

This is the twelfth play of Ben Jonson that has been edited with scholarly thoroughness by the Yale Studies in English. As in the previous publications, the scope and purpose of this book are scientific and pedagogic, rather than esthetic. It is a splendid example of that current scholarship which substitutes laboratory analysis of verbal minutiæ, a painstaking precision of sources and textual criticism for a literary appreciation of the soul and spirit of the play. Such research work is commendable and highly beneficial, inasmuch as it illustrates the meaning of the text. But a vast amount of the cross-reference to very ancient and less ancient authors, the tabulated percentages of Latinized words and idioms, would be as surprising to Ben Jonson, as they are valueless to us, who are stupid enough to believe that a play is a work of art, and not a biological specimen.

It is gratifying to note that, despite potent reasons to the contrary, Mr. Selin recognizes the play as true Jonsonian. Though Jonson's name appears on the title page of the earlier copies, in later contemporary editions the name is strangely omitted. Neither is the play included in the collected works, which were published under the supervision of the poet. Jonson may have collaborated so extensively in its composition, that he could not truthfully claim the authorship; perhaps he regarded it as an unsuccessful experiment in romantic comedy, before he realized that his true power lay in satiric comedy. Whatever the reason may be, Mr. Selin in his introduction has presented the facts of this long-disputed question with a thoroughness and clarity that are beyond criticism. The text is a faithful reproduction of one of the more corrected contemporaneous copies, but no changes have been made in the spelling or punctuation.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The concluding number of the Catholic Mind's fifteenth volume appropriately opens with Cardinal Wiseman's beautiful sermon on "The Nativity of Christ," which is so full of the spirit of Bethlehem. The other paper in the issue is Archbishop Moeller's stirring address on "Catholic Patriotism," which he delivered last Thanksgiving Day to the soldiers of Camp Sherman, Chillicothe, Ohio. The index at the end of this number shows that the little fortnightly's latest volume has nearly 600 pages containing some sixty articles on a wide variety of subjects of interest and importance to Catholics.

Mother Mary Loyola has written for those whom the war has bereaved of their dear ones a little book of comfort, called "Blessed are They that Mourn" (Kenedy, $1.00). The reflections in the volume have the characteristics which have made this author's ascetical works so helpful to their readers; her keen spiritual discernment, her warm sympathy, her skilful use of illustrations and her remarkable familiarity with Holy Writ. In sixteen short papers, bearing such titles as "Cheerful Givers," "Rachel," "Plentiful Redemption," "Women Receive Their Dead Raised to Life," "The Reunions of Heaven," etc., the author offers sorrowing Christians the only solid and effective motives for comfort there are. Father Thurston writes the preface and the frontispiece is a fine reproduction of Fra Angelico's "The Resurrection."——The Rev. Frederick A. Reuter has gathered into a volume fifty-two "Readings and Reflections for the Holy Hour" (Pustet, $1.25), consisting largely of anecdotes about the Saints' love for the Holy Eucharist.

"Somewhere Beyond" (Dutton, $1.25) is the title of "a year book of Francis Thompson," which Mary Carmel Haley has compiled. Though this great Catholic poet, who made it his life-work to > Teach how the crucifix may be

> Carven from the laurel-tree,
> Fruit of the Hesperides
> Burnish take on Eden-trees,
> The Muses' sacred grove be wet
> With the red dew of Olivet,
> And Sappho lay her burning brows
> In white Cecilia's lap of snows!

his high thoughts, it would seem, cannot always be easily enough "detached" to grace to the best advantage the pages of a year book, nevertheless, the compiler has succeeded pretty well in choosing for each day some rich jewel of thought or expression from the poetry of

> Beauty's eremite
> In center of this lowly body set,
> Girt with a thirsty solitude of soul.

"Ralph Connor," who is the Rev. Charles W. Gordon, now a Canadian regiment's Protestant chaplain on the western front, makes the Dominion, as it was before the war, the scene of his latest novel, "The Major" (Doran, $1.40). The career of Larry Gwynn, his hero, is described from boyhood days till he goes to the war, just after marrying bonny Jane. There are interesting pages showing how Canada, like the United States, is now the melting-pot of the European races.——"The Sin That Was His" (Doran, $1.55), by Frank L. Packard, is a story rather ingenious in construction and fairly interesting. The plot, however, in which a man of dissolute and wasteful habits masquerades as the parish priest, not shrinking from the sacrilege of pretending to offer the Holy Sacrifice, is very distasteful to Catholic sensibilities.——"The World and Thomas Kelly"

(Scribner, $1.50), by Arthur Train, is a dull book, full of misinformation about the manners and morals of our little brethren, the rich.

In "The Parish Theatre" (Longmans, $1.00) the Rev. John Talbot Smith, LL.D., has put into definite form the aim, present conditions and needs of the frequent and popular amateur productions which are becoming so large a factor in the social element of parishes. The book lays down a clear and workable method of using this form of Catholic activity in America. An appended list of nearly one hundred adaptable plays, with a brief description of each, will prove useful to ambitious managers and actors.——"The New Hymn-Book for Church and School" (Benziger, $0.50), by Hans Merx, is a combined hymnal and prayer-book edited by the Superintendent of Church Music for the Archdiocese of Chicago. Thirty-nine hymns, with melodies and range well adapted to congregational singing, are provided for the various seasons of the ecclesiastical year, for use at Low Mass, Benediction, and for processions. The book contains only ninety-three pages, and may be conveniently carried in the vest-pocket; but this advantage is somewhat offset by the brevity of the hymns, twenty-one of which have only one verse each.

"Selections from the Old English Bede" (Longmans, $1.20), by W. J. Sedgefield, Litt. D., professor of English language in the University of Manchester, has for its purpose to arrange for beginners a text and grammar based upon the Old English dialect, namely, the early West Saxon dialect of King Alfred. The text of many Old English manuscripts is not the same as the early West Saxon of the standard grammar and confusion is the result for the beginner. The "Selections" are partly historical and partly anecdotal. The book is also furnished with an ample vocabulary and a brief summary of Old English accidence to enable one to use it by itself as a means of learning Old English.——Just as the laboratory manual is an aid to the general-chemistry student in acquiring the principles of his science through their practical applications, so "Knowing and Using Words" (Allyn & Bacon), by Lewis and Holmes, is a book which aims at developing for the high-school student of English, through practice work, the knowledge of the principles underlying his spoken and written language. Under the guidance of an earnest teacher its methods will develop habits of observation, thoroughness and accuracy, as well as a clear and concise expression of thought. It helps to rout the enemy of all scholarship: slovenliness and inattention.——"Easy Spanish Plays" (Allyn & Bacon), by Ruth Henry, contains within the small compass of forty-seven pages eight simple farces, all quite amusing in situation and sufficiently varied in natural dialogue to cover a fair amount of ordinary Spanish conversation. Besides the brief notes and the vocabulary there are appended some suggestions, practical and stimulating, on the organization and management of clubs whereby the study of Spanish may be rendered more enjoyable and its social use more popular.

Here are some new text-books that will interest teachers: "Burke's Speeches at Bristol, Previous to the Election, and Declining the Poll" (American Book Co., $0.20) has been edited and annotated in a thorough, scholarly manner by Father Edward Bergin, S.J., Professor of Rhetoric in St. Stanislaus Seminary, Florissant, Mo., and ought to find favor with lovers of Burke both in high school and college classes. His "Conciliation" speech is more commonly used in American high schools, but it is a difficult piece to analyze and beyond the grasp of the average student. Burke's "Bristol" speech is more interesting and more easily mastered.——In the publishers' announcement of Claxton and McGinnis's "Effective English" (Allyn & Bacon, $1.25) we are told that "The authors have produced a volume more practical and attractive than others in the field." The book has its good points, but the foregoing claim is too sweeping.——"Cæsar in Gaul and Selections from the Third Book of the Civil War" (Ginn), by D'Ooge and Eastman, is a well-edited text-book for the second-year Latin class. There are pictures, good notes and a serviceable vocabulary.——Those who use M. A. DeVitis's "Spanish Reader for Beginners" (Allyn & Bacon, $1.25) are led through various parts of Spain and Latin America and important cities, public institutions and notable buildings are well described. The illustrations are very helpful and there is a good vocabulary.

In the January Century is an interesting biographical letter from Francis Ledwidge, the Irish soldier-poet, who was killed in Flanders last July. He tells what made him a poet, explains under what circumstances his best things were written and sends his correspondent some hitherto unpublished stanzas on "Pan." Following the letter is a long poem entitled "The Lanawn Shee," written the month of his death, and containing such characteristic lines as these:

She told me of a sunny coast
  Beyond the most adventurous sailor,
Where she had spent a thousand years
  Out of the fears that now assail her.

And there, she told me, honey drops
  Out of the tops of oak and willow,
And in the mellow shadow Sleep
  Doth sweetly keep her poppy pillow.

Nor Autumn with her brown line marks
  The time of larks, the time of roses,
But song-time there is over never,
  Nor flower-time ever, ever closes.

And wildly through uncurling ferns
  Fast water turns down valleys, singing,
Filling with scented winds the dales,
  Setting the bells of sleep a-ringing.
